The fourth plea (which was pleaded to both counts) stated, that the charter-party in the first count mentioned was as follows: "It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. R. M'Andrew & Co., of the good ship or vessel called the new steamer Smyrna of the —, of — tons or thereabouts, now at Newcastle, and Messrs. T. Barker & Co., of London, merchants, that the said ship, being tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to one usual loading place guaranteed for cargo in all this month (i. e. October), or as near thereunto as they may safely get, and there load for the factor of the said freighters in the customary manner a full and complete cargo of about 1,500 tons of coal, which the said merchants bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she may stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions and furniture, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Alexandria, Egypt, or so near thereto as she may safely get (cargo to and from alongside and at merchant's risk and expense) and deliver the same on being paid freight, as follows: 30*l.* per keel of twenty-one tons and one-fifth, with fifteen guineas gratuity, in full of all port charges and pilotage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage always excepted); the vessel to be addressed to the charterer's agent, paying the one usual consignment commission of 2*l.* per cent., to have a lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight and demurrage, captain to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter, freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash at current exchange, 125 tons to be allowed the said merchant per weather working day (if the ship is not sooner despatched) for unloading, and all days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 30*l.* per day; penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight." And that the agreement in the second count mentioned was the same charter-party with an extension of time mutually agreed on by the plaintiffs and the defendant for being ready for cargo until the early part of November 1863; and the defendant says, that at the times of the making the said charter-party and agreement in the first and second counts respectively mentioned, the said steamer so being at Newcastle as in those counts mentioned, was at a place there far distant from the usual place there for loading to which the said steamer was to sail and proceed, and the said steamer before reaching such usual place would necessarily be exposed to divers dangers of seas, rivers and navigation, all which the plaintiffs and the defendant at the said time well knew, and that the said voyage in the said charter-party mentioned and referred to was a voyage from the place at Newcastle at which the said steamer was at the time of making the said charter-party and agreement to the said usual place at Newcastle for loading, and from thence to Alexandria; and that the said steamer during the said voyage, that is to say, during such part of the said voyage as took place before the said steamer sailed or proceeded from the said usual place on her way to Alexandria, and after she had received on board a part of her said cargo, and before any breach of the said charter-party or agreement, was hindered and prevented by the dangers of seas, rivers and navigation then happening from receiving and loading on board the residue of the said cargo, and was thereby greatly and necessarily delayed therein, which are the supposed liabilities of contract in the first and second counts respectively complained of.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

Horace Lloyd (Biron with him), for the plaintiff.—The voyage contemplated was not to commence till the ship started with her cargo from the loading-place, and the exception as to accidents of navigation did not apply till then. The case of Crow v. Falk (1) is exactly in point; there the vessel was at Liverpool, and was to load and sail with a cargo from thence; and it was held that the voyage did not commence, and the exception did not apply till she quitted Liverpool. It is quite true that in Bruce v. Nicolopulo (2) Pollock, C.B. said, he could not subscribe to Crow v. Falk (1), but the other Judges expressed no such opinion; and Martin, B. says, "Assuming Crow v. Falk (1) to be good law, this case is clearly distinguishable." And in the latter case of Valente v. Gibbs (3) Crow v. Falk (1) was upheld, the two cases being, in fact, identical; and Cockburn, C.J. expressly said, he did not dissent from it. The question here, no doubt, is, whether the present case falls within Crow v. Falk (1) and Valente v. Gibbs (3), or within Bruce v. Nicolopulo (2). The averment as to the commencement of the voyage does not further the matter, as it is merely an averment of a legal consequence from previous facts.

[WILLES, J.—The charter-party contemplates dangers in getting to the place of loading, "as near thereto as she can safely get."]

That is in our favour; she need not go nearer than is safe. The obligations of the shipowner are four: First, the ship with convenient speed is to proceed to the loading place within a guaranteed time; secondly, she is to take her cargo; thirdly, being loaded she is to proceed to Alexandria, where, as I say, the voyage commences; fourthly, she is to deliver her cargo. And then there comes an exception of certain risks "during the voyage," which does not apply till the voyage commences, i. e. till she starts loaded.

[WILLES, J.—It is quite consistent with the plea that she arrived at the loading place and there was run into.]

Even if so, the voyage had not commenced. But in addition to this, the word "guaranteed" is used, and there is an absolute and unconditional warranty that she will be at the loading place.

Res., for the defendant.—The exception applies during the voyage. In Crow v. Falk (1) the words are, "Should at Liverpool receive and load, and being loaded proceed," and therefore the voyage contemplated was from Liverpool. In Valente v. Gibbs (3) no one ventured to say that a voyage does not commence till the goods are on board. Here the words are, "shall with convenient speed sail and proceed to the usual place of loading," and the ship was as much bound to sail to the loading place to take her cargo as to proceed afterwards with it. I define voyage to be after the vessel has started and while she is on her way. Secondly, as to the word "guaranteed." Its use does not imply a condition; but that, if there be a failure in time, the charterer shall be exonerated.

Lloyd, in reply.—First, the definition of voyage on the other side is incorrect; for then in Valente v. Gibbs (3) the voyage would have commenced from Genoa. The charterer is not interested till the vessel is at the loading place. Suppose she started from another place for another person, that clearly would be another voyage. The voyage commences when the vessel starts with the cargo on board. Secondly, I say, that if the vessel is not at the loading place, a liability is incurred by the shipowner.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant. The action is founded on a charter-party by which the ship was to proceed to the usual place of loading and there load, and then proceed to Alexandria, with the usual exceptions as to the dangers and accidents of seas, rivers and navigation during the voyage. It seems, on the facts stated in the plea, that the vessel broke ground to proceed to the usual place of loading; whether she arrived there is not quite clear, though I should conclude she did, as part of her cargo was shipped; but it is unnecessary to decide this, as it is clear she broke ground and went towards the place of loading, and if she had not arrived was prevented from doing so by the dangers and accidents of seas, rivers and navigation. One question then is, whether it can be said that the word "voyage" includes this preliminary transit to the place of loading; and the next question is, whether, assuming that the preliminary transit was part of the voyage, the use of the word "guaranteed" in the charter-party shews that the parties intended the exception not to apply. The first question is a general one, and the second question is one on the construction of the particular contract. The first and general question is, whether, if a charter-party provides that a vessel shall proceed to a port for cargo and then proceed on her voyage with such cargo, the exception in the charter-party as to the dangers of the seas, rivers and navigation applies only when the cargo is on board or to the preliminary transit. Now, what is the meaning and object of the exception? But for the exception the shipowner would be liable, except for the act of God and the Queen's enemies; this is well known, and an exception is inserted which includes every case of accident occurring without fault. It is clear the reason for the exception applies equally to the preliminary voyage and to the time when the cargo is on board: that fact does not make it more reasonable. The origin and object of the exception apply no more to one than the other. The question is, whether it is a part of the voyage contemplated. I think the voyage means the passing of the vessel over the whole of the agreed transit; that it commences when the vessel commences to sail, and continues while she does sail. It is said, by the plaintiffs, that the question is decided by the two cases of Crow v. Falk (1) and Valente v. Gibbs (3). As to Crow v. Falk (1), there was no preliminary transit in that case, there was no voyage till the ship broke ground, and it was held that the exception did not apply whilst she was at the port of Liverpool. As to Valente v. Gibbs (3), that was a peculiar case; it was a case of penalty for delay, and all the Court decided that a delay at the port of starting was not within the contract as a delay in the voyage. It is true that the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Crowder express an inclination to hold that the voyage began at the place for loading the cargo; but that was not on the ground of taking cargo on board, but on the construction of the particular contract, which was not like the present one. Our decision does not conflict with Crow v. Falk (1), though I may say I do not concur with that case. There is no authority against our present judgment, and there is an authority for it, viz. Bruce v. Nicolopulo (2), where it was held that the preliminary voyage was to be considered part of the voyage contemplated by the contract; that is in point, and is the good sense of the matter. As to the second question, the word "guaranteed" has no technical meaning in such a case as this; it is no more than "I have promised," and means probably that the ship shall be ready in the month, provided she be not prevented by accidents happening without any fault, and if not so ready the charterer may throw up the charter-party; it may be construed as a guarantee with an exception, a guarantee subject to the ship not being prevented by the excepted perils. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plea is good, and that our judgment must be for the defendant.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what is meant by "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation . . . during the voyage"? The word "voyage" standing alone has an extensive meaning; it means a passing by water from one place or port to another place or port. This definition, however, would assist us little here; and we must construe it according to the existing circumstances. The plea says, "that at the time of making the said charter-party and agreement in the said first and second counts respectively mentioned, the said steamer so being at Newcastle, as in those counts mentioned, was at a place then far distant from the usual place there for loading, to which the said steamer was to sail and proceed, and the said steamer, before reaching such usual place, would necessarily be exposed to divers dangers of seas, rivers and navigation, all which the plaintiffs and defendant at the said times well knew." Therefore the plaintiffs and the defendant contemplated these facts, and so contemplating them, the defendant engaged that his ship should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to the usual loading place." So that, in the first place, there was a contract by which the ship was bound to proceed from where she was to the loading place—was bound to cross that distance and meet those dangers. And, further, the words are, "that the said ship, being tight, staunch and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to the usual loading place . . . and there load . . . and being so loaded proceed," not that she shall proceed to the loading place, and thence, being tight, staunch and strong, and fitted for the voyage, proceed; so that she is to be tight, staunch and strong, and fitted for the voyage, not merely from the place of loading, but also during the former part of the transit. Therefore, looking to the places in the contract where the voyage is mentioned, I think it was meant to include the previous part of the transit. Again, "sail" is a technical word, and means "start on voyage"; the case of Valente v. Gibbs (3) is a distinct authority. Therefore, taking into consideration the wording of the contract and the surrounding circumstances, I am of opinion that this is a good plea. I also agree as to the effect to be given to the word "guaranteed," which may mean either an absolute or a conditional guarantee.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The voyage commenced from the place where the ship was. The provision of the charter-party is, "shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to the usual loading place"; she was bound to make the voyage as described in the charter-party, and could not deviate in her course to the loading place; and therefore the place from which she started was the terminus à quo. The parties knew the place where she lay was distant from the loading place; and she was to sail to such place, and encounter the perils of such transit. Why should not the exception attach as much to the preliminary part of the voyage as to the rest of it? The fair meaning and intention of the matter must be considered; and the fair meaning and intention is, that these perils were to be encountered, and the exception to apply to them. As to the authorities, there are decisions in favour of this construction. In Crow v. Falk (1) Lord Denman says: "The words of the charter-party and declaration are perfectly clear. The end of the voyage is expressly marked out; the beginning is not; but the voyage could not begin before the ship's loading was completed;" that is, because in that case she would never sail till then. No argument can be brought to bear on the present case from the usual form of charter-parties; they vary in each case. In coming to the present conclusion, we are only giving effect to the intention of the parties. As to the use of the word "guaranteed," I think it does not interfere with the exception, which seems to me to apply to both parts of the voyage.

Judgment for the defendant.

[COUNTY COURT APPEAL.]

1865. { THE GREAT WESTERN RAIL-May 5. { WAY COMPANY, appellants,
v. WILLIS, respondent.

Evidence — Statement by a Servant, when not made within the Scope of his Authority.

In an action against a railway company for not delivering, within a reasonable time, cattle which had been sent by their railway, the plaintiff gave evidence at the trial of a conversation which had taken place a week after the transaction, between himself and the company's night inspector, who had charge of the night cattle trains at a station through which the trucks containing the plaintiff's cattle would pass, and in which conversation the night inspector, in reply to the plaintiff's question, "How is it you did not send my cattle on?" had said that he had forgotten them,—Held, that such evidence was not admissible.

This was an action, tried before the Judge of the County Court of Staffordshire and a jury at Wolverhampton, to recover 21*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for the non-delivery within a reasonable time of seven cows, thirty-five sheep and six pigs, delivered to the defendants at Minety, on the 12th of July 1864, to be carried to Wolverhampton, the said cows, sheep and pigs being, as was alleged, thereby much injured, and the plaintiff put to expense, and the market at Wolverhampton being lost. The cattle were delivered at the Minety station by the plaintiff about five P.M. on the 12th of July, the plaintiff paying the carriage charges, 3*l.* 11*s.*, and signing a consignment note, with conditions attached, which were set out in full in the case, but which are unnecessary for the present report. The plaintiff proved that he saw the cattle loaded into trucks at Minety, ready for a goods' train which usually leaves Minety at about seven P.M.; that he had been in the habit of sending cattle by the defendants' railway for six or seven years, and that cattle loaded in time for that train usually arrived at Wolverhampton about seven the next morning; that he and other cattle-dealers had been in the habit of sending cattle to Wolverhampton market by that train; that he informed the defendants' clerk at Minety that the cattle were intended for the next day's market at Wolverhampton; that he sent his man to meet the cattle the next morning by the first train, but they did not arrive by that train; that the next train was due at 10:30 A.M., but was late, and did not arrive till between twelve and one; that witness was in the market all day, waiting the arrival of the cattle; that the cattle were brought up to the market by his man Grant about one or half-past, and when the market was over; that he had the cattle turned out and fed, and sent them to the market at Birmingham the next day, where they were sold. That on their arrival the cattle were very dirty, and badly off for something to eat and drink, and were out of condition in consequence of the delay; and the sheep were also very dirty and out of condition in consequence of the delay.

The plaintiff further proved that he lost some 17*l.* or 18*l.* by the lot of cattle between what they cost him and what he sold them for at Birmingham; and he attributed that partly to the depreciation in the value from delay, and partly to having lost the market at Wolverhampton.

The plaintiff then proposed to state something relating to the cause of the delay in delivering the cattle by the company, which had passed in conversation about a week after the 12th of July between him and the defendants' night inspector named East, at Didcot, through which station the trucks in which the plaintiff's cattle were would pass, when the defendants submitted that a statement by a subordinate servant at Didcot, not in course of the transaction, but some time afterwards, was not admissible; but the learned Judge allowed the question to be put, and the plaintiff then stated that he said to East, "How is it you did not send my cattle on?" and he said in reply that he had forgotten them.

The plaintiff also stated that East had charge of the night cattle trains at Didcot, and that he would be on duty when the trucks in which the plaintiff's cattle were would pass through Didcot; that he knew East well, and had frequently seen him on duty at Didcot.

In cross-examination the plaintiff was asked whether the cattle were not usually taken on by the empty coal train from Didcot, which train it was suggested by the defendants was the one which left Minety at seven in the evening and arrived at Wolverhampton about seven A.M.; but the plaintiff said that his cattle were generally carried by the same train by which he sent his cattle on the 12th of July, and that other persons sent their cattle by the same train; and that the cattle usually arrived at Wolverhampton on the following morning a little after seven; that he generally got his cattle at Wolverhampton at seven, sometimes at eight, and sometimes at half-past ten, or later.

The case here set out a letter by the plaintiff's attorney to the defendants' goods manager, specifying the items composing the plaintiff's claim, but on the effect of which nothing turned. The case afterwards stated that William Grant, the plaintiff's man, proved going to the station frequently, early on the morning of the 13th of July, and that the cattle had not come up to twelve o'clock, when he left without them; that he came down to the station about ten minutes to one, and they had just arrived; that he saw the train arrive; that he took them out of the trucks, and took them into the market at Wolverhampton at once; that the cattle were much out of condition, in consequence of being kept so long in the trucks. When he got to the market it was over, and he took the cattle and turned them out to feed against the next day.

George Foxall, a cattle salesman, proved seeing the cattle in Wolverhampton market, and that they were very dirty and out of condition, but that they would be all right again in the course of a week, by being properly fed and attended to.

The defendants upon this case submitted that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited, having proved no breach of contract, and the company not being bound by the conditions of the consignment note to send the animals by any particular train, or to carry or deliver them within any certain or definite time, or in time for any particular market; but the learned Judge refused to nonsuit the plaintiff.

The defendants called two of the defendants' servants, who proved that there were only two trains by which cattle could have arrived from Minety, viz., by a return coal-train which usually arrived at Wolverhampton at about seven A.M., and a goods train which was timed to arrive at Wolverhampton at 10.30, but which was late on the morning of the 13th of July 1864, and did not come in till a few minutes after twelve; that the cattle were delivered to the plaintiff's man without delay on arrival, and were not more out of condition than cattle usually are after a journey in trucks by rail.

The learned Judge ruled that the special conditions relating to the non-liability of the defendants, for detention or delay in conveying or delivering the cattle, were unreasonable, and left it to the jury to say whether there had been an unreasonable delay in the carriage or delivery of the plaintiff's cattle, and if so, to find for the plaintiff for the agreed damages, 21*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, stating, at the request of the defendants, whether the damages were for loss of condition in the animals, or for loss of market.

The jury found for the plaintiff that there had been an unreasonable delay, and assessed the damages, for loss of market 1*l.* and injury to the condition of the cattle 7*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

The questions for the decision of the Court were:

1. Whether the learned Judge was right in admitting the evidence of the conversation with East above set forth.

2. Whether the learned Judge was right in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff, and whether he ought not to have ruled and directed that there was no evidence for the jury.

3. Whether the learned Judge was right in his direction to the jury.

T. Clarke (Digby with him), for the appellants.—The evidence of what was stated by East, the night inspector, was not admissible in evidence, and the learned county court Judge ought not to have received it. East was a mere subordinate servant, and had no authority to make any admission on behalf of the company.—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

Macnamara, for the respondent.—It is submitted that a person like East, who had the superintendence of the night department in the appellants' business, and charge of the night cattle trains at Didcot, was their agent to answer inquiries respecting matters done there in the course of such business, and that what he might state, in answer to any bond fide inquiry, by a person who had an interest in making such inquiry, would be admissible in evidence against the appellants. It is the same as if the respondent had been referred by the appellants to such person for information in the matter; in which case it is clear, that what he then said would be within the scope of his authority and admissible in evidence, and this ought especially to be the case, where those by whom he is employed are a body corporate. There is a dictum of Tindal, C.J., in Garth v. Howard (1), which supports this proposition. That learned Judge there says, "If the transaction out of which this suit arises had been in the ordinary trade or business of the defendant as a pawnbroker, in which trade the shopman was agent or servant to the defendant, a declaration of such agent that his master had received the goods, might probably have been evidence against the master, as it might be held within the scope of such agent's authority to give an answer to such an inquiry made by any person interested in the goods deposited with the pawnbroker."

The case of Clifford v. Burton (2) shews that where a wife served in her husband's shop, and carried on the business of it in his absence, admissions made by her on application to pay for goods before delivered at the shop, are admissible in evidence against her husband.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this night inspector is not to be presumed to have been authorized by the company to make admissions on their behalf of things gone by. The present case does not fall within those which have been referred to by Mr. Macnamara, and there must therefore be a new trial.

COLES v. TURNER.

Debtor and Creditor—Deed of Assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.)—Clause verifying Debts.

A clause in a deed of assignment, registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, by which the trustee is empowered to require any creditor of the debtor to verify the nature and amount of his debt, with full particulars, by statutory declaration proved before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, "or otherwise as the trustee may think fit," is unreasonable, and a deed with such a clause is not binding on a non-assenting creditor.

The declaration contained a count against the defendant as acceptor of a bill of exchange, drawn on him by the plaintiff, for 46l. 9s. 3d., and counts for goods sold and delivered, for work done, for money paid, and money due on accounts stated.

The defendant pleaded, as a defence thereto, a deed of assignment, registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.) as being binding on the plaintiff, a non-assenting creditor, as if he had executed the same.

The deed, which was set out in full in the plea, was dated the 19th of May 1864, and was a conveyance and assignment by Richard Turner, the defendant, to George Molyneux of all the real and personal estate of the said Richard Turner whatsoever (subject to the existing incumbrances thereon, and except the wearing apparel of the said R. Turner and of his wife and children), upon the following trust: "Upon trust that he the said George Molyneux, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns (all of whom are hereinafter referred to as "the said trustee or trustees") do and shall as soon as may be, and in such way or manner as to him or them may seem best, call in, collect and receive the said personal estate, effects and premises, and sell and convert into money all the saleable parts of the said personal estate and all the said real estate, with power nevertheless for the said trustee or trustees, in his or their discretion, to postpone the sale of all or any part thereof, and to lease such unsold portion either from year to year, or for a term of years, for such rents as he or they may think fit, and with power for the said trustee or trustees to make any such sales, either by public auction or private contract, or partly in either mode, and either with or without the concurrence of any mortgagees or mortgagees of the property, and subject to such conditions, upon such terms, and generally in such manner as he or they may think fit, and as to any policies of insurance, either by way of surrender to the office or offices which may have granted the same or otherwise, and to give credit for the whole or any part of the purchase-money, either with or without taking security for the same."

The deed contained a declaration of trust as to the monies to arise from such collection, leasing and sale, and which after payment of certain costs, was to pay rateably and without preference the debts due from the said R. Turner. There was then the following clause: "Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that the said trustee or trustees shall have full discretion from time to time to determine the amount of dividends which shall from time to time be declared and paid out of the monies in hand to and among the said creditors in respect of their respective debts, and to pay such dividends, at such place and in such manner as he or they shall think fit. And it is hereby further agreed and declared that it shall be lawful for the said trustee or trustees to require any person or persons claiming to be a creditor or creditors of the said Richard Turner, notwithstanding that he or they may have executed these presents, and that the amount, or alleged amount, of his or their debt or debts may have been inserted in the schedule hereto, to verify the nature and amount of such debt or claim, with full particulars, shewing the consideration thereof by statutory declarations proved before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, or otherwise, as the trustee or trustees may think fit."

The deed also contained the following: "Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that these presents shall not in anywise prejudice or affect the rights or remedies of any of the said creditors against any surety or sureties, or any person or persons other than the said Richard Turner, his heirs, executors or administrators, nor shall these presents in anywise prejudice or affect any security which any of the said creditors may have or claim for his debt; but nevertheless if such security shall be enforceable against the said Richard Turner, or his estate or effects, then and in that case such creditor, unless he shall consent to abandon the said security, shall be entitled to receive dividends under these presents upon so much only of his said secured debt as may remain after such security shall have been realized, or after credit shall have been given for the full value thereof, such value to be agreed upon between the said creditor and the said trustee or trustees, or in case of dispute, to be ascertained by two impartial valuers, one to be chosen by such creditor and the other by the said trustee or trustees, or an umpire to be named by such valuers before proceeding to the valuation."

There was also in the deed a declaration that the trustees should not be answerable for the acts or defaults of each other, nor for any loss which might befall the trust estate otherwise than through his or their wilful default, and that it should "be lawful for him or them to reimburse himself or themselves out of the trust estate all costs and expenses actually incurred in the execution of the trusts."

Demurrer to the plea and joinder in demurrer.

Prentice, in support of the demurrer.—This deed is not binding on the plaintiff, a non-assenting creditor, as several of the clauses in it are unreasonable. In the first place, there is a clause by which the trustee has power to postpone the sale of the property, and to lease it for such rents as he may think fit, and in case of sale he may give credit for the purchase-money without taking security, so that by a lease or sale to the debtor himself the debtor would be able to continue in possession of the property without the creditors deriving any benefit under the deed. Then there is a clause by which the trustee may require any creditor to verify the nature and amount of his debt by statutory declaration or otherwise as the trustee may think fit. There is then no limit to the kind of proof the trustee may insist on, and the clause altogether is unreasonable. A similar one was held to vitiate the deed in the case of Leigh v. Pendlebury (1), from which the present case is not distinguishable. There are other clauses in this deed which are also objectionable, such as that the trustee may pay dividends at such place and in such manner as he may think fit; also the clause as to the mode of valuing securities in which nothing is said as to what is to be done in case of any creditor being a lunatic or infant; and lastly, the clause enabling the trustee to reimburse himself all costs incurred, without reference to their having been reasonably or even properly incurred, and differing from the case of bankruptcy, in which if assignees were to bring any action without leave of a majority of the creditors or of the Commissioner, they would do so at the peril of losing their costs—Ex parte Whitchurch (2).

Hannay, contra.—Many of the clauses which are now objected to have passed without objection in other similar deeds which have come before the Court.

[The COURT called on him to answer first the objection to the clause which relates to the creditor being required to verify his debt.]

It is submitted that there is an important distinction between such clause and the clause which was held bad in Leigh v. Pendlebury (1). In that case the clause empowered the trustee to reject the debt altogether if the creditor failed to prove it to the satisfaction of the trustee, but there is no such forfeiture of the debt in the present case.

[SMITH, J.—What do you say would happen here if the creditor should not prove his debt in the mode required by the trustee?]

(1) 15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 815; s.c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172.

(2) 1 Atk. 210.

The clause only means that the creditor may be required to verify his debt by a statutory declaration, and there is nothing unreasonable in requiring this to be done. In Strick v. De Mattos (3) a clause in a deed of inspectorship under the Bankruptcy Act, by which every creditor before being entitled to a dividend should if required by the inspectors deliver a statement in writing of his claim, with all the particulars usual in a proof in bankruptcy, and should upon the like request verify such claim by statutory declaration, was held not to be unreasonable.

[SMITH, J.—There it was not left, as here, to the caprice of the trustee to say what proof should be required.]

It is submitted that the words "or otherwise, as the trustee or trustees may think fit," are only added to the clause in the present deed, in order to enable the trustee, if he pleases, to dispense with the proof by statutory declaration, and are not inserted there to authorize him to insist on having further and stricter proof. As said by Cockburn, C.J., in Wells v. Hacon (4), prima facie a deed agreed to by three-fourths of the creditors must be taken to be reasonable, and the Court should not presume that the trustee will act improperly.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that the provision in this deed requiring the creditor to prove his debt by statutory declaration or otherwise, as the trustee may think fit, has the same effect as the clause referred to and held bad in the case of Leigh v. Pendlebury (1), and that in case of failure by the creditor to comply with the terms of this provision, he would lose his right of having the benefit of dividends under the deed. There are two or three other objections to the deed in the present case, which are, I think, equally strong, but as this one is sufficient to invalidate the deed, it is unnecessary and would be a waste of time to discuss them. The rest of the COURT (5) concur in thinking that this case is substantially the same as, and is not distinguishable from, that of Leigh v. Pendlebury (1).

Lease—Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment—Interesse Termini—Damages.

The plaintiff being in occupation of premises under a lease from J. F., which would expire on the 4th of December 1864, obtained from J. F. a reversionary lease for twenty-one years and twenty-one days, to commence from the said 4th of December 1864, on payment of a premium. In November 1863 J. F. died, and it turned out he had no power to grant this reversionary lease. F. V., who was entitled to the premises on the death of J. F., refused to ratify the said lease, and the plaintiff was obliged to accept a lease from F. V., to commence on the 25th of December 1864, for seven years only, at a greater rent. The plaintiff brought an action against the executor of J. F. on a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in the void lease:—Held, first, that a plea that the plaintiff had never entered into possession of the premises under such lease was bad; secondly, that on a plea that F. V. did not claim the premises from the plaintiff or threaten to oust him from the possession thereof, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment; thirdly, that the plaintiff was not merely entitled to recover the premium and expenses of the void lease, but was entitled to recover the difference between the expenses of the void lease and the lease granted by F. V., and also the difference between the respective values of such leases, but that in calculating such difference in value, the transaction was not to be considered in the nature of a compulsory sale, and that the expenses of counsel, &c. were not recoverable.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, as executor of one John Furze, for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease granted by the said John Furze to the plaintiff.

The declaration stated, that by an indenture made on the 14th of February 1860, between John Furze of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the said John Furze, in consideration of 400*l.* and the other considerations therein mentioned, demised to the plaintiff certain premises from the 4th of December 1864, at which time an existing lease of the said premises would expire, for the term of twenty-one years and twenty-one days, paying 10*l.* for the first twenty-one days, and a yearly rent of 175*l.* during the remainder of the said term, and covenanted with the plaintiff that he should and might peaceably and quietly have, hold, use, occupy, possess and enjoy the said premises during the said term, without the lawful let, suit, trouble, denial, interruption, molestation or disturbance of and by the said John Furze, his heirs or assigns, or any of them, or any person or persons whomsoever lawfully claiming or to claim by, from, through, under or in trust for him, them or any of them. Yet after the making of the said indenture, and before suit, and during the said lease, one Frances Vickers, then lawfully claiming the said demised premises through and under the said John Furze, deceased, and having a good title to the same and to the possession thereof through and under him, claimed and demanded the said demised premises of, from and against the plaintiff, and threatened to oust him from the possession and enjoyment thereof, whereby the plaintiff could not and did not peaceably or quietly have, hold, use, occupy, possess or enjoy the said premises for and during the said term without the let, suit, trouble, denial, interruption, molestation and disturbance of the said Frances Vickers, so lawfully claiming through and under the said John Furze, deceased, by reason whereof the plaintiff was obliged to and did take and accept a lease or appointment of the said premises from the said Frances Vickers for the term of seven years, from the 25th of December 1864, at an increased rent of 300*l.* a year, and was put to great trouble and expense and costs in obtaining such lease and appointment, and also lost the benefit of the lease granted by the said John Furze, deceased, and the sum of 400*l.* paid for the same.

There was also a count for money had and received.

The defendant pleaded to the first count, first, a denial of the deed; secondly, that the plaintiff never had or entered into possession of the said demised premises under and by virtue of the said lease; thirdly, that F. Vickers did not claim the premises, nor had good title or possession thereof, through and under the said J. Furze, deceased; fourthly, that the said F. Vickers did not claim or demand the said premises from the plaintiff, nor threaten to oust him from the possession or enjoyment thereof; and to the last count he pleaded never indebted, except as to 417*l*., and paid that sum into court.

The plaintiff took issue on all the pleas, and also demurred to the second plea.

The following facts appeared at the trial: The plaintiff, being in occupation of the premises as tenant of the said J. Furze, by virtue of lease (dated the 9th of February 1838), which would expire on the 4th of December 1864, obtained from him, on the 14th of February 1860, the lease on which the declaration was founded. In May 1863 J. Furze died; and in November 1863 the plaintiff was informed, on behalf of a married daughter of J. Furze, that this new lease would not be recognized, on the ground that J. Furze had no power to grant it. And it turned out that in 1841 J. Furze, on the marriage of his said daughter Frances Vickers, had made a settlement of this property, whereby he retained only a life interest, with a power of leasing for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, and not in reversion or by way of future interest; so that the lease of 1860 was invalid. This being so, protracted negotiations took place during 1864 respecting the grant of a new lease by Frances Vickers, in whom the power then vested, to the plaintiff. In September 1864 an agreement was entered into, whereby a lease was to be granted to and accepted by the plaintiff after Christmas 1864, and pursuant to such agreement Frances Vickers granted the lease mentioned in the declaration.

The defendant contended that, on the facts proved, he was entitled to a verdict on the second and fourth pleas, and that he was only liable for 400*l*. the premium, and 17*l*. the expense of the lease of 1860, making together the sum of 417*l*. paid into court.

The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to a verdict on those pleas, and that, in addition to the sum of 417*l*., he was entitled to damages for the difference in the lengths, rents, and other conditions of the two leases, and that in calculating such damages he was entitled to consider the transaction in the nature of a compulsory sale. And he also claimed 65*l*., of which sum 45*l*. was the cost of the new lease, and 20*l*. the cost of consulting counsel and surveyors, &c. respecting the matter.

The jury assessed the damages (less the 400*l*. premium) consequent on the difference in the leases at 1,457*l*., assessing such difference on what are called the 6*l*. per cent. tables, and adding 137*l*. (calculated at 10*l*. per cent.) on the ground of the transaction being in the nature of a compulsory sale. To this sum was added the before-mentioned 65*l*., and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 1,522*l*., with leave reserved to the defendant to move to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff on the second and fourth pleas, and enter a verdict thereon for the defendant; and to reduce the damages to nominal damages, or such sum as the Court might direct, on the grounds that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover more than the sum of 400*l*. which he had paid, and 17*l*. expenses which the defendant had paid into court, and that the plaintiff lost nothing but what he had paid; that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the 65*l*., the costs, &c. of the second lease, or any part of it; that the plaintiff must have paid the costs of one lease, and that he was not entitled to throw those costs, or any of them, on the defendant; and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the 10*l*. per cent. which the jury gave as upon a compulsory sale.

A rule nisi was granted pursuant to such leave, and also for a new trial, on the ground that the learned Judge misdirected the jury in directing them that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference in value between the lease that was avoided and the new lease that was granted, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the 65*l*., also in directing them that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the 10*l*. per cent. claimed as upon a compulsory sale; and that the learned Judge ought to have directed the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover those several matters.

It was also arranged that the demurrer should be argued at the same time.

Lush, J. Brown and Archibald shewed cause.—The main question is, how the damages are to be assessed; and we contend that the plaintiff had the actual estate, and is entitled to recover damages in respect of the value of it. It makes no difference, whether the defect be discovered before or after the lease begins to run. An actual, present and assignable interest is conveyed, and if the term had commenced and the lessee entered, the matter would have been beyond controversy—Williams v. Burrell (1), Bac. Abr., tit. 'Leases,' (N), and Took v. Glascock (2).

This is not a case of a mere contract like Pommett v. Fuller (3) and Sikes v. Wild (4), but of a conveyance, and therefore full damages are recoverable—Smith v. Compton (5); and, further, the circumstances bring it within Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6) and Robinson v. Harman (7). Again, entry, whatever its value may be for various other matters, has nothing to do with the right of lessor or lessee to sue on covenants—Bac. Abr., tit. 'Lease,' (M), Doe v. Walker (8) and Williams v. Bosanquet (9); and an averment of entry is not traversable—2 Chitt. on Plead. 7th ed. p. 392, n. (t). With respect to the 10l. per cent., it was not, in truth, added as for a compulsory sale, but only used as an ingredient in arriving at the amount of damages. As to the second plea, if the plea means actual entry, it is bad; if only legal possession, it was disproved. As to the fourth plea, an actual eviction is not necessary—Platt on Covenants, 326.

Bovill and Garth, in support of the rule. —As to what has been said about the case of Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6), it is sufficient to say that the point of knowledge is not raised on the pleadings, and that it was not taken at the trial, where it could have been met by evidence; and without knowledge there can be no fraud. As to the second and fourth pleas, the defendant claims the verdict, because possession under the lease was necessary, and as there was none, there was no eviction from possession. With respect to the main question, the case falls within the rule that only the deposit and actual expenses can be recovered—Mayne on Damages, 96, Sedgwick on Damages, 1st ed. 160, 161, 168, 169, 179, and 180 (n.), 4 Kent's Commentaries (ed. of 1860), 580, Ireland v. Birch (10), and Sikes v. Wild (4). As to the 10l. per cent., it was clearly given on the ground that the transaction was in the nature of a compulsory sale, and the verdict cannot therefore be sustained to that extent; and as to the 65l., the portion for counsel's fees, &c. of course cannot be recovered, and the portion for expenses of the new lease cannot be recovered, for the plaintiff has got the lease, and we have paid into court the expense of the abortive one.

ERLE, C. J.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff for a breach of covenant against the defendant. The covenant on which he relies is a covenant that he should have quiet enjoyment of the premises during twenty-one years, without the lawful let, suit, trouble, denial, interruption, molestation or disturbance of the lessor, or any one lawfully claiming under him; and the breach is, that one Frances Vickers, lawfully claiming under the lessor, and having good title, claimed and demanded the premises from the plaintiff, and threatened to oust him from the possession thereof, whereby the plaintiff could not peaceably and quietly enjoy the premises. The declaration and the breach were proved. The second plea is, that the plaintiff never had or entered into possession of the demised premises under or by virtue of the said lease. The lease was granted in the year 1860, and was to commence in the year 1864, and down to 1864 the plaintiff had possession of the premises under a prior lease; therefore the lease in respect of which this action is brought was a reversionary lease, conveying an interesse termini to the plaintiff; and in the sense of having corporeal possession of the premises, the plaintiff did not have it under the reversionary lease. It was an interesse termini; the land was to vest in possession in 1864, and he was turned out by the claim of Frances Vickers in 1863. Then the allegation in the declaration is, that the covenant was broken by the demand of Frances Vickers, who had good title to claim the premises. And we think that the plea, in the sense contended for by the plaintiff, is entirely irrelevant to the declaration, and bad on demurrer. The claim is in respect of an interesse termini, and there is no allegation, express or implied, in the declaration that the plaintiff had entered into possession of the demised premises under the reversionary lease; and therefore, upon the demurrer to that plea, our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff. There is also a fourth plea to the same count, which alleges that Frances Vickers did not claim or demand the premises from the plaintiff, nor threaten to oust him from the possession or enjoyment thereof. Now, it is clear that she had title under John Furze, and had a right to say that the lease was a nullity; and it was acknowledged that she did say so, and demanded that her right should be acknowledged by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff by reason of the demand lost the interesse termini. It is clear, therefore, that the verdict for the plaintiff on this plea should stand. The remaining question is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover more than the 417*l.* paid into court. It was contended, that this covenant was to be dealt with as if there had been a contract for sale, and a contract to make title to the premises sold, and that it was subject to the rule of law, which holds good in actions by a vendee against a vendor under a contract of sale which goes off through a defect in the title,—the rule by which the vendor is only bound to pay back the money he has received and the expenses to which the vendee has been put, and the vendee cannot recover for the value of the premises. I am of opinion that this contention cannot be maintained. It is a known rule of law as to contracts for sale, and, if it were necessary to go into the question, it might perhaps be shewn that the convenience of mankind justifies the rule. In my opinion, however, the rule is confined to contracts of sale; and I think that the line is to be drawn between a contract for sale and a conveyance of an estate or interest in that to which the conveyance relates. It is clear that, if there be a lease of land in possession containing such a covenant as the present one, an entry by the lessee under the lease, and afterwards an ouster of the lessee by a person claiming under the lessor, the lessee is entitled to recover the value of the term he has lost. Thus, in Williams v. Burrell (1), the only decided case upon the point which has been cited in argument, it was held that a lessee under a void lease, who had been ejected by the successor of his lessor, had a right, in an action against the executors of the lessor for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in his lease, to recover the value of the term. But it is contended, on behalf of the defendant, that, because this was a reversionary lease, only conveying an interesse termini, the plaintiff stood in the situation of a vendee, with whom a vendor had contracted to sell and make title, and not in the position of a lessee, to whom a term has been granted, and who is in possession of that term. I am of opinion that this distinction is not maintainable. This reversionary lease conveyed to the plaintiff an interesse termini, which was a valuable and assignable interest, and he was in one sense in possession, for the interest was conveyed to and vested in him by a legal document containing this covenant; and therefore, to my mind, there is a strict analogy with the case of a document conveying a present term, under which the lessee has entered. And wherever that is so, the case of Williams v. Burrell (1) decides that the ordinary rule applies, namely, that a party who breaks his contract must pay the damages approximately arising from such breach. The dicta which have been cited from the American authorities are neutral, there being as many one way as the other, and the learned authors, whose books have been cited, do not sustain the contention of the defendant. Mr. Mayne, in his book On Damages, limits his statement of the rule to the case where nothing has passed under the instrument containing the covenant, and here an interesse termini clearly passed. It appears from Sedgwick on Damages, that although in many of the American Courts the rule is as contended for by the defendant, yet the impression of the writer is the other way. There is, therefore, no authority against our judgment; there is an authority for it; and there is the almost universal rule, that a party who breaks his contract ought to pay the damages approximately arising from such breach. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to the value of the term. The jury have given the value of the term, and the expenses to which the plaintiff has been put, up to the fullest extent, and we think that there ought to be a substantial deduction from that amount. The jury have given 10*l.* per cent. for compulsory sale, and have taken the 6*l.* per cent. tables, and we think that the plaintiff must lose the 137*l.* Then there was 65*l.* given for the expenses. It is agreed that 20*l.* shall come off for counsel's fees and such matters, and then there remains 45*l.* for the expenses of the new lease. The expenses of the old lease were 17*l.* (which have been paid into court), and Mr. Garth has convinced me that the plaintiff is not entitled to have the expenses of both leases; the plaintiff wanted a lease, and he must pay for one of them. I do not very clearly see which lease he is entitled to charge to the defendant; but I am inclined to think that he is entitled to charge the 40*l.*, the expenses he has been put to by the breach of covenant; and therefore under this head he is to have 40*l.* minus the 17*l.* Consequently the plaintiff is only entitled to 28*l.* of the sum of 65*l.*, and is not entitled to the sum of 137*l.*; and the damages must be reduced accordingly.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The main question is a very important one, namely, how the damages for the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment are to be computed. Now it is quite plain that in the case of an ordinary contract for the sale of land, where the contract is silent as to title, the law implies a contract for title. This, however, would operate with the greatest possible hardship in many cases. For example, suppose a man had contracted to sell a thousand acres of land in Northamptonshire some years ago, and it turned out he had no title, and the purchaser were to say, I demand from you not merely the money I paid, and my expenses, but I demand compensation at the rate of 1,000*l.* per acre, because the land you sold me is of that value now, and I ought to be put, not in the same position as that in which I should have been if I had never made the contract, but in the same position as if you had performed the contract. This would lead to such an enormous hardship, that, as it seems to me with very good reason, a rule of law has been firmly established, that in cases of ordinary contracts for the sale of land the purchaser is to be, not in the same position as if the vendor had performed his contract, but in the same position as if the contract had never been made. He is entitled, on the contract being broken, to a verdict for nominal damages, and he is also entitled to the money he may have paid, and the expenses he has incurred, and to nothing more. This is an anomalous rule. In all other cases, where a man gets damages for breach of a contract, he is to have, not such damages as will place him in the same position as if the contract had never been made, but such damages as will place him in the same position as if the contract had been performed. It is here sought to apply this anomalous rule, not to the case of a contract implied by law on a contract for the sale of land, but to an express contract running with land to the end of the term, a contract for quiet enjoyment. It seems to me that the same rule does not apply. There is but one authority, Williams v. Burrell (1), in this country, and that is plain. This question never seems to have arisen before, except in that case, and there the Lord Chief Justice of this Court, one of the most eminent legal authorities that ever presided on this Bench, not only says "the plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the term," but he says, "it is too clear for argument," and the two learned counsel, Sir Thomas Wilde and Mr. Serj. Channell, who appeared for the defendant in that case, did not contest that that was not the true rule as to the damages. That being so, the law, so far as the authorities are concerned, is clear. I agree with what my Lord has said about the American authorities, and will not repeat it; it is sufficient to say they are equally preponderating and throw no weight into either scale. The only remaining question upon this portion of the case is this:—it being plain that in this case the plaintiff had only an interesse termini, will that take him out of the rule which holds good in respect of a contract by which the lessee is bound, having entered into possession? I conceive that an interesse termini is a valuable marketable interest assignable at law, and that there is no substantial difference between a man who has a reversionary lease and a man who has a lease in possession. It seems to me that an interesse termini falls within the same considerations as a term upon which a man has entered. There is another point in this case on which possibly the plaintiff might be entitled to recover, viz., upon the doctrine laid down in Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6), where it is said that even in the case of an ordinary contract for the sale of land, if the vendor knew he had no title, the ordinary rule as to damages is to be applied. There are two observations to be made upon this. In the first place, Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6) has been spoken of with some dissatisfaction by the highest legal authority on this subject, Lord St. Leonards, and even if it be law, it may possibly apply only to cases of fraud: "omnia presumuntur contra spoliatores"; but in this case there is no doubt that the plaintiff and defendant have acted with the most perfect bona fides. On the other branches of the case, I agree with what has fallen from my Lord.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that our judgment upon the main point that has been raised is a judgment on a point of very great importance, because, so far as the argument has disclosed, this point has never arisen before in any Court in Westminster Hall. The case nearest to it is the case of Williams v. Burrell (1), and the distinction between that case and the present no doubt is, that in that case there was an actual entry on the premises, whereas here, the interest of which the plaintiff has been deprived was an interesse termini. But an interesse termini is a well-defined interest, as pointed out in the note to Took v. Glascock (2), being described in pleading as an interest of which a party becomes possessed by virtue of the conveyance to him, which is assignable, and which therefore seems to me to be very different from a mere contract to sell land which is not carried into execution by anything like a conveyance. That appears to me to establish at once a very distinct line upon which we can safely act in the present case. It appears to me that there is no sound distinction between the case of an interesse termini and the case of an estate where there has been an entry for a single day. The judgment of the Court therefore proceeds on that ground only. I may say as to the distinction supposed to have been established by Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6), that I do not in any way found my judgment upon the present occasion on anything supposed to have been established by that case. That case, as has been observed by my Brother Byles, has been remarked on with dissatisfaction by a great authority, and also it seems to me that the facts here do not raise the principle upon which I think the case of Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6) must have proceeded, viz., a suppression or misleading amounting to legal if not moral fraud. Upon these grounds I agree with the rest of the Court, and I also agree in the reduction of damages mentioned by my Lord.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion on all the points. In regard to the main question, it is not intended by this decision to throw the slightest doubt on the rule established by the case of Flureau v. Thornhill (11), and the cases which follow it, that where the contract goes off for want of title, the vendee is entitled to recover no more than the amount he has paid and his expenses. That rule depends on considerations which seem to me to have no relation to the present case. It was said by Parke, B. in the case of Robinson v. Harman (7), speaking of Flureau v. Thornhill (11), "The case of Flureau v. Thornhill qualified that rule of the common law. It was there held that contracts for the sale of real estate are merely on condition that the vendor has a good title; so that, when a person contracts to sell real property, there is an implied understanding that if he fail to make a good title the only damages recoverable are the expenses which the vendee may be put to in investigating the title." Here the conveyance is not on condition that the vendor has a good title. The conveyance has taken place, the lease has been made, and has passed, as far as the lessor can, the right and title to the estate. The lessor has nothing more to do; the lessee may turn his right and interest into an estate at any time by taking possession. Again, in contracts for the sale of real estate, the Courts have implied the contract respecting title, and annexed the particular consequences which attach to a breach of it. Here we are dealing not only with an actual conveyance or grant of an interest and title in the land, but with an express covenant that the lessee shall quietly enjoy the premises during the term. The first is the case of an executory contract to which the Court has annexed certain implied conditions; this is a case where the contract is fully executed, where the lessor has nothing more to do, and where he has entered into an express covenant. It seems to me, therefore, that the cases are entirely different, and that where a covenant of this description is broken, the covenantee is entitled, as in all other cases, to full compensation for the loss he thereby sustains. It is admitted that if the lessor had lived till the 5th of December 1864, and the lessee had entered, this case would be precisely the case of Williams v. Burrell (1), in which it was held that the value of the term was recoverable. It is said that the consequences of this judgment will be very serious; but it is well known that these covenants are limited to acts against which the parties are able to guard; and in this case, as in most others, the covenant is limited to the acts of the lessor. Here there is an express covenant that the lessee shall hold and enjoy the premises for the whole of the term without any let or molestation arising from the act of the covenantor, or any one claiming under him. The lessee is molested in consequence of an act of the covenantor, namely, his having made a marriage settlement. I agree, also, with the rest of the Court, that the facts do not seem to bring this case within Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6). It seems to me that here a right and title to the land has passed. There is an express covenant that the plaintiff shall have the land for the whole term; this covenant is broken, and the plaintiff is entitled to full compensation. With regard to the other points, it is plain the jury first considered what was the saleable value, and then gave 10% per cent. as for a compulsory sale. It does not seem to me that this can be likened to a compulsory sale. It is not a wilful or voluntary act on the part of the defendant; she is in equal misfortune with the plaintiff. In the case of a railway company, they act for their own interests, and voluntarily take possession. And I agree with the rest of the Court, that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on the demurrer to the second plea.

Judgment accordingly.

1865. } FARNWORTH AND ANOTHER
Feb. 10, 27. } v. HYDE.

Shipping—Insurance on Goods—Total Loss—Justifiable Sale—No Notice of Abandonment.

Where a stranded vessel was in danger of falling to pieces, and the captain sold her cargo consisting of timber, because the expense of forwarding it to its destination would have exceeded its value there, when so forwarded, the assured was held entitled to recover against the underwriter on a policy on such cargo, for a total loss without having given notice of abandonment.

Action against the defendant as underwriter for 150% of a policy of assurance on a cargo of timber shipped on board the vessel The Avon, on a voyage from Quebec to Liverpool, the value of which cargo was declared at 2,500% by indorsement on the policy. The plaintiff claimed a total loss. The defendant paid into court the sum of 34% 10s. as for a partial loss to the extent of 23% per cent.

The cause was tried, before Pigott, B., at the last Liverpool Summer Assizes. The evidence was, that The Avon sailed on her voyage on the 1st of December 1861, and in a few days afterwards got aground in the St. Lawrence, when, in consequence of the ice which surrounded her, it was impossible for her to proceed on the voyage, and she lay there on the ground during the winter. A survey was made of her, both on the 16th of December and afterwards on the 16th of January, when the surveyors advised that she should be sold; but Lloyd's agent at Quebec being of a different opinion, it was resolved not to sell her at that time. On the 29th of April the ice in the river began to break up, and then, on the 2nd of

* Decided in the Sittings after Hilary Term.

May, a further survey was made, when the surveyors recommended the ship to be sold where she lay, for the benefit of all concerned, and that, as it would be necessary, from her exposed position, to discharge the cargo before the vessel was taken off, the most prudent course would be to sell the cargo at the same time the vessel was sold. Accordingly, on the 7th of May, the vessel and her cargo were sold, and they were both bought by the same purchaser, Messrs. Julien; the ship for 450*l.* and the cargo for 750*l.* Messrs. Julien ultimately succeeded in bringing both ship and cargo to Quebec, where they sold the latter for 1,400*l.* No notice of abandonment was ever given to the underwriters, but evidence was given that the supposed value of the timber, if it had arrived in Liverpool, would have been 4,300*l.*, and the following estimate was put in at the trial of what would have been the expense of landing and carrying the timber to its destination, and its depreciation in value from having been so long in the water, viz.—

Cost of landing	350
Do. rafting it off to another vessel ...	700
Original freight	1,556
Extra freight	700
Rising freight (freight having risen between the time when The Avon was loaded, and the re-opening of the navigation after winter)	289
Deterioration, 12 per cent.	516

£4,091

This sum deducted from 4,300*l.*, the value of the timber, left 209*l.*, as to which the learned Judge left it to the jury to say whether anything was to be deducted for loss of quantity, and having also directed the jury that the question as to whether it was right to sell the cargo depended upon whether the cargo could have been practically carried, in a mercantile sense, to its destination, that is, whether the cost of bringing the cargo, added to the amount of depreciation, would have left any appreciable margin of profit, he left it to them to say, whether it was right to sell the ship, and also whether it was right to sell the cargo. The jury found both questions for the plaintiff, and the verdict was therefore entered for the plaintiff for a total loss.

In Michaelmas Term last, E. James, for the defendant, obtained a rule nisi, to set this verdict aside and to enter it for the defendant, or a nonsuit, pursuant to leave reserved, on the grounds, first, that there was no evidence of a total loss; and, secondly, that there was no evidence of a partial loss exceeding the sum paid into court, or why the damages should not be reduced to the sum actually due as for a partial loss. Against this rule—

Brett, Mellish and C. Russell shewed cause.—The question here is, was the sale of the cargo justifiable and binding on the underwriter? If it was, the property passed to the purchaser and no notice of abandonment was necessary, as in the case of a constructive total loss. It is submitted that the evidence shews that the sale was necessary. The goods were on board a wrecked ship, and there is ample evidence that the ship was lost and that her sale was proper; then, what was the duty of the assured as to the cargo? He must have got the cargo out of the ship before he sold the latter; but that could not have been done (as the evidence shews) except at a great loss, and therefore, as recommended by the surveyors, it was better to sell the cargo and ship together. The element of risk in the present case distinguishes it from that of Rosetto v. Gurney (1). Taking into account the certain expenses and the indefinite risk, it is submitted that it was not a practicable thing to send the goods on. The sale was therefore necessary and justifiable. The loss was not a constructive, but an actual loss, and the omission to give notice of abandonment would have no effect on the right of the assured against the underwriter—Roux v. Salvador (2). [They also argued that if the plaintiff was entitled only to recover in respect of a partial loss, he was entitled to a larger sum than what had been paid into court. They also referred to the following authorities—Reimer v. Ringrose (3), Knight v. Faith (4), Arnould on Insurance, 1st edit. 2nd vol. page 973,

E. James and T. Jones, in support of the rule.—There is a great distinction between an actual and a constructive total loss. In the case of a ship, to make out an actual total loss, the ship must exist no longer as a ship, and must merely serve as materials for another ship. The present is a case of goods, and in order to make out an actual total loss of goods the specific character of the articles must be gone. In Roux v. Salvador (2) the hides would have altogether lost their character as hides had they been carried on. That would not have been the case with the timber here had it been sent on; there was no impossibility of the timber arriving in England as timber, through the deteriorated condition in which it was sold. It is because there is a possibility of recovery that the necessity of a notice of abandonment exists—Arnould on Insurance, 2nd edit. p. 1025. There is no difference between the present case and that of Knight v. Faith (4). The vessel here was repairable, and was so treated by the plaintiffs; notice, therefore, should have been given to the underwriters, and even if the vessel was totally lost, her cargo of timber existed in specie and ought to have been sent on, and the expense of so doing would have been only a partial loss. The sale here of the goods was not justifiable; it was not the case of perishable goods, and the authorities shew that it was not a question for the jury what a prudent owner uninsured would have done in the circumstances—Reimer v. Ringrose (3). The principle is the same for goods as for a ship, and if the goods can be sent on at an expense less than their value at their place of destination, it is then a case only of a partial and not a total loss, and here it is found that there would have been a margin of 209% over the expense of bringing the timber to Liverpool, so that in no way can the plaintiffs be entitled to recover for a total loss, and they have not shewn a partial loss beyond the sum paid into court. —[They cited 1 Park on Insurance, 280 and 281, and Stewart v. Steele (7).]

Cur. adv. vult.

SMITH, J. now delivered the following judgment (8).—This action was on a policy on timber in the ship Avon, from Quebec to Liverpool. The Avon was frozen up in the passage down the St. Lawrence; and after survey, the ship and the cargo were sold by the master to one purchaser at separate sales. At the trial, the jury found in effect—first, that the sale of the ship was justified, on the ground that the cost of repairs would have been greater than the value of the ship when repaired; and, secondly, that it was right to sell the cargo, because it was not practically possible, in a mercantile sense, to have carried it to its destination; that is to say, because the cost of bringing the cargo, added to the amount of depreciation, would not have left any appreciable margin of profit to the owners. Upon these findings, the verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for a total loss; and the rule nisi to alter the verdict, and enter it for a partial loss, on the ground that there was no evidence on which the finding of the total loss could be supported, is now to be disposed of. Upon the first question, relating to the ship, we have to say whether there was evidence to support the finding that the sale was justifiable; and our answer is in the affirmative. We do not propose to state the evidence at length; but taking the report of the surveyors on the 2nd of May, and the statement of Julien, who purchased on the 7th of May, we think there was evidence for the jury that the ship was in imminent danger of destruction, and that a sale appeared to afford the only reasonable hope of saving any part of her value. Then, upon the second question, relating to the cargo, we have to say whether there was evidence to support the finding that it was right to sell it, because the cost of bringing the whole or any part of it to its destination would have exceeded the value thereof there; and our answer is again in the affirmative. We are not called on to say on which side, in our opinion, the balance of evidence inclines. If there was reasonable evidence for the jury, the verdict is to stand; and we think there was. We have been embarrassed by the estimate appended in sequel to the Judge's notes, by which it appears that a comparison of the supposed cost of carrying the timber to its destination, with the supposed value thereof there, showed a possible profit of 209%. That estimate, taken alone, seems at first sight inconsistent with the finding in respect of the cargo; but, as this estimate is followed by the note that the jury might say if anything was to be deducted for loss of quantity, we consider that there was evidence to the effect that in the process of saving the timber there would probably be a loss of 25 per cent. in quantity; and, although it might follow that in the case of a diminution of the quantity of timber a deduction should be made for some of the estimated expenses, such as freight, in the like proportion, yet some of the expenses might be a constant quantity subject to no deduction, such as the expense of bringing labourers to make rafts. All this was for the jury; and we cannot say that there was not evidence to support the verdict. Then, upon the facts so found by the jury, is the plaintiff entitled to recover for a total loss? As the cost of carrying the cargo to its destination would have been greater than its value on arrival, it is not disputed that there would have been a constructive total loss, if notice of abandonment had been given—Rosetto v. Gurney (1) and Reimer v. Ringrose (3). But no such notice was given; and we are therefore to say what is the legal effect of this sale so found by the jury to have been right and necessary. We answer, that such sale supervening on the existing state of things was an actual total loss. A right sale passes the property; and when the property is passed from the assured by reason and in consequence of a peril insured against, the cargo is actually lost to him, as much as if it was destroyed. We are aware that the interest of the underwriter may at times be sacrificed by a sale, where the ship or cargo might have been saved wholly or partially, if notice of abandonment had been given; but we are also aware that, if a right sale, such as was here proved, is not held to be an actual total loss, it would be for the interest of the assured, where a notice of abandonment would make a constructive total loss, to give a notice of abandonment, and leave the ship or cargo to perish unsold; and so the benefit of salvage from a sale would be lost by reason of the delay required for notice of abandonment. It must rest with the tribunal that has to deal with the questions of fact to guard against fraud and wrong; and the sale by the master ought not to be found right or valid, unless it was the best that could be done for the interest of those concerned, with reference to all the circumstances, including the time and manner of sale, and so, in a mercantile sense, necessary. The opposing considerations for and against requiring notice of abandonment where the property insured exists in specie are stated in Roux v. Salvador (2) and Knight v. Faith (4). In Roux v. Salvador (2) the policy was on hides from Valparaiso to Bordeaux. The ship was forced into Rio, and decomposition of the hides began by reason of a peril of the sea; and, because it was found not to be practicable to carry them to their destination, on account of the expected progress of decomposition, they were sold at Rio; and the loss was held to be total, although there was no notice of abandonment. The judgment is of a Court of error; it is powerful in reasoning and in learning; and, although it relates to a cargo of perishable goods in the course of decomposition, yet it extends to all cases where the adventure is brought to an end by a peril, and the goods are taken out of the power of the assured in the course of their voyage, either by physical laws working decomposition, or by political laws working detention and sale by a Court, or by circumstances of distress and danger creating what may be described as a mercantile necessity for a sale. The present case is an example of such circumstances, where a stranded ship was in danger of falling to pieces, and the expense and risk of rafting the timber, and reloading it on transshipment, and carrying it to its destination, was supposed to exceed the value of the cargo when there. Such a case seems expressly included in the part of the judgment in Roux v. Salvador (2), where it is said "that if goods damaged by the perils of the sea, and necessarily landed before the termination of the voyage, are, in the case of perishable goods, in such a state that they cannot in safety be reshipped; if, though imperishable, they are in the hands of strangers, not under the control of the assured; if, by any circumstances over which he has no control, they can never be brought to their original destination; in any of these cases the circumstance of their existing in specie at that forced termination of the risk is of no importance; the loss is in its nature total to him who has no means of recovering his goods, whether his inability arises from their annihilation, or other insuperable necessity." The judgment in Knight v. Faith (4) accords with Roux v. Salvador (2) in holding that there may be a total loss without abandonment, when there has been a right sale caused by urgent necessity, with full proof that everything was done optima fide, and for the real benefit of all concerned. There is an apparent difference of opinion in these two decisions as to the degree of imminent danger which should be held to be such urgent necessity as would justify a sale. But the sufficiency of the degree of danger is within the province of the jury, and it is useless to attempt to define a degree without a standard for measure. Lord Campbell observes on the degree of fraud; but those observations are relevant to the caution required from the jury, not to the law of the case when the necessity for the sale has been properly found. In King v. Walker (6) it was not necessary to decide that a valid sale from necessity was an actual total loss without any notice of abandonment, because it was there held that there was notice of abandonment; but the Court clearly sanctioned the rational principles respecting the effect of a valid sale from necessity laid down in Roux v. Salvador (2), saying, "It may not be easy to understand why notice of abandonment should be required in a case where the vessel cannot be made to sail except at an expense for repair which no reasonable man would incur, and is therefore properly and, in a sense, necessarily sold for the old materials." In these three cases all the authorities relating to abandonment are fully reviewed, and no useful object would be gained in repeating the review. We consider that we act on the principles laid down in Roux v. Salvador (2) in holding that the jury, finding that the sale was right under the circumstances in evidence before them, found that there was an actual total loss with benefit of salvage, although the cargo existed in specie at the time of the sale, and there was no notice of abandonment. This is the judgment of the Chief Justice, my Brother Keating and myself. My Brother Byles assents to it, subject to the remarks upon the preliminary point above mentioned.

BYLES, J.—I agree with my Lord and the rest of the Court, that if the cargo had been sold by the captain of the vessel because the expense of forwarding it to its destination would have exceeded its value when so forwarded, it was rightly so sold; that a sale under such circumstances would have changed the property; and that there would then have been, not merely a constructive, but an actual total loss of the timber. I also agree that, in the case of such an actual total loss, no notice of abandonment is necessary. But in all cases of alleged constructive loss, where the captain takes upon himself to sell the ship, and still more so when he sells the cargo, the necessity of so doing ought to be strictly proved, and the jury are not at liberty to act on conjecture. It is plain, on the figures appended to the report of the learned Judge, that the expenses of bringing the cargo to Liverpool would not have equalled the value of the cargo, when brought there in its integrity, by 209%. The jury have found that there would have been a diminution of the quantity of timber to this extent, and therefore that the expenses would have equalled the value of the diminished cargo, which alone could have been actually brought home. But I can find no evidence on the Judge's notes to support this amount of deduction from the original quantity of the cargo. It may be that there would be some deduction; but it may also be that, if any, there would be a very much smaller deduction. Again, on the assumption that such a diminution of quantity were proved, the expenses of bringing home the cargo should be calculated on the diminished quantity, but they are all calculated on the larger quantity of timber contained in the whole original cargo. It is possible (but I see no evidence to prove it) that the expenses of landing and rafting would be the same whether any portion of the cargo were lost or not. This might depend on the period at which the loss of quantity took place, of which there is no evidence that I am aware of. But, assuming the landing and rafting to be constant quantities, yet the freight, both original and additional, is at so much per load, and is calculated by the assured on the quantity contained in the entire cargo. But the freight actually payable for sending a smaller quantity would be less. Therefore, in calculating the expense of sending the diminished cargo home, too much is charged for freight. But any deduction from the charge for freight makes the sale unlawful, and indeed destroys the claim for a constructive total loss; for it does not appear on the figures that, even if the freight could be charged on the original quantity, it would do more than bring the expenses of sending home the cargo up to the value of the cargo so sent home; no excess of charge beyond the value of the cargo is shewn. I much regret that on this preliminary question I am unable to concur with the rest of the Court; but though I fear I must be in error, I do not feel at liberty to yield my opinion; for, if it be correct, the plaintiff will still be entitled to hold his verdict to the extent of a partial loss, the amount of which loss is by agreement to be settled by competent parties. And on a careful consideration of the evidence, I feel strongly that this result would be more likely to advance the real justice of the case than the verdict as it now stands.

Rule discharged.

[COUNTY COURT APPEAL.]

1865. } LEE, appellant, v. RILEY,
May 5. } respondent.

Negligence—Damage through Neglect to keep up Fences—Horse straying—Remote-ness of Damage.

Through the defect of a gate which the defendant was bound to repair, the defendant's horse got out of the defendant's farm into an occupation road and strayed into the plaintiff's field, where it kicked the plaintiff's horse:—Held, that the defendant was liable for the trespass by his horse, and that it was not necessary for the maintenance of the action to prove that the defendant's horse was vicious and that the defendant was aware thereof.

Held also, that the damage the plaintiff had sustained by the injury to his horse was not too remote, but was sufficiently the consequence of the defendant's neglect to be recoverable in such action.

The case stated that a plaint was entered in the county court of Yorkshire, holden at Halifax, by the plaintiff, the now respondent, on the 10th of November 1864, whereby he sought to recover the sum of 22*l.*, and that the following was a copy of the particulars attached to the summons served upon the defendant—

1864, Oct. 26, one black horse . . . 22*l.*”

The action was brought to recover the sum of 22*l.*, the value of a horse belonging to the plaintiff, which had its leg broken in the night time. The horse had been left safe and sound in the plaintiff's field on the evening of the 25th of October last, and was found the following morning standing there on three legs, the fourth having been broken, as was alleged, by the kick of a horse of the defendant, the now appellant. The plaint was tried before a jury, and it appeared in evidence that the plaintiff and the defendant occupied two adjoining farms, and that an occupation road extended from a highway through the defendant's farm, of which it formed part, into the plaintiff's farm, where it formed part of the plaintiff's farm, and it terminated some two or three fields' lengths within the farm. That there was a gate across the occupation road at the point where the two farms adjoined, which belonged to the defendant to repair, and had been erected by the occupier of his farm immediately preceding him some seven or eight years ago, and that being broken in two pieces, the plaintiff had given notice to the defendant to repair it about three weeks before the occurrence which gave rise to the action, and had apprised him that it was his duty to repair it. It appeared further that the defendant's horses, and particularly a large grey mare of his, had on several occasions passed through this gateway along the plaintiff's portion of the occupation road, and thence through a small gateway opening from the occupation road into a meadow field of the plaintiff, called the Rye Bank, and thence through a hedge into another field of the plaintiff, called the Pasture, being the field in which the plaintiff's horse had been left sound and well on the evening of the day in question. That the last-mentioned gateway was a small one (half a yard wide) for the plaintiff's cows to enter the close called the Rye Bank from the occupation road, and that there was a gate raised against the opening and stones placed against it on the field side to support it, but that if a horse pushed his breast against it the gate would fall down, and it was in evidence that the defendant's horses, including the grey mare, had on several previous occasions pushed the gate down, and entered the plaintiff's land through the gap. It further appeared that on the night before the horse was found lamed this gate had been fastened by one of the plaintiff's sons. Further, that the hedge separating the two fields of the plaintiff (the Rye Bank and the Pasture) had been of sufficient strength during all the summer previous to prevent the plaintiff's cattle from passing out of one field into the other. This gate was found thrown down, and recent footmarks of a horse were observed on the morning of the 26th of October on each side of it, and traced across the close called Rye Bank and through the hedge into the field called the Pasture; and in the latter field, close to where the plaintiff's horse was found standing on three legs, strong marks of horses "scuffling" were observed, and patches of black and of grey hair were found at the same spot corresponding with the colour of the plaintiff's horse, which was black, and that of the defendant's grey mare. The off hind-leg of the plaintiff's horse was broken and the horse was obliged to be killed, and on a post-mortem examination the bone exhibited an appearance of having been struck, and a piece of it knocked out by a violent blow. Such shoes as the defendant's mare had on, it was in evidence, might have caused it. About twelve o'clock the same day the plaintiff's sons went to the defendant's stable and there found his servant fomenting the off hind-leg of the defendant's grey mare with hot water. Hair was found knocked off in several places, and the colour of the mare corresponded with that of the patches of grey hair found in the field.

The defendant's mare was a large powerful animal of seventeen hands and a half high, and its shoes had attached to them large strong "caulkens," formed by the shoes being turned down at the heels. The plaintiff's horse was about fifteen hands high. There was no evidence of the defendant's mare being a vicious one. No evidence was given on the part of the defendant, except as to the value of the plaintiff's horse.

A letter was put in, dated the 28th of October 1864, from the plaintiff's attorneys to the defendant, charging the death of his horse to have been occasioned by a kick from the defendant's mare, and claiming compensation, to which no answer had been returned. On the close of plaintiff's case the attorney for the defendant submitted there was no evidence to go to the jury, and directed the Judge's attention to the case of Cox v. Burbridge (1).

The Judge decided there was evidence for the jury, and that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the grey mare of the defendant was a vicious animal; that there was a distinction between the two cases; that it might not be in the ordinary course of nature for a horse to kick a child, but that it was so for one horse to kick another, particularly a strange one when they met in a field.

The Judge, in summing up to the jury, told them that the case depended mainly on circumstantial evidence. That there was no direct evidence bringing the plaintiff's horse in contact with the defendant's, and shewing that the defendant's mare caused the injury, but that he thought there was sufficient evidence for them to take the case into consideration, and in the exercise of their judgment to consider whether sufficient ground of complaint had been made out by the plaintiff. That the plaintiff was bound to furnish them with reasonable evidence from which they might presume that the defendant's mare was the cause of the accident. That was one question; but in order to make the defendant liable, supposing that his mare had done the mischief, it must be shewn that the defendant's mare was wrongfully in the plaintiff's land. That if the defendant was bound to repair the gate, it was also his duty to keep his cattle from trespassing on other people's land. The Judge directed the attention of the jury to the fact that no evidence had been offered on the part of the defendant as to where the grey mare was on the night in question, and he told them that the points for consideration were first of all and mainly,—did the jury think the circumstances given in evidence were sufficient to satisfy them that the defendant's mare caused the death of the plaintiff's horse? If so, then whether the defendant was liable. His mare would become a trespasser as soon as it passed the gate leading to the plaintiff's portion of the occupation road. The main difficulty was, whether there was sufficient evidence to lead the jury to a conclusion that it was the defendant's mare that did the mischief. It was entirely a matter for their consideration. As to whether the defendant was liable, supposing the plaintiff did not give evidence of notice to the defendant that his mare was a violent animal, the Judge said, that he was of opinion that had nothing to do with the present question. He added, that if the defendant's mare got into the plaintiff's field, whether the plaintiff's horse began to kick first or not did not affect the question, if the defendant's mare was a trespasser. It was for the jury to consider, first of all, whether the death of the plaintiff's horse was caused by the defendant's mare; secondly, whether the defendant's mare was trespassing, and then the amount of damages. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; damages, 14*l*.

The following were the grounds of appeal:

1. That there was no evidence to support the claim of the plaintiff.

2. That the Judge of the said court was wrong when, at the end of the case for the plaintiff, he determined that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the grey mare of the defendant was a vicious animal.

3. That the Judge of the said court was wrong when, at the end of the case of the plaintiff, he determined that there was evidence for the jury in support of the case of the plaintiff, if the plaintiff proved that the grey mare of the defendant had committed a trespass by entering the fields of the plaintiff, and had, whilst committing a trespass, kicked the horse of the plaintiff.

4. That the Judge of the said court misdirected the jury at the trial, and particularly when he observed that no evidence had been offered on the part of the defendant as to where the grey mare was on the night in question. Further, when he said that, whether the defendant's mare was a violent animal or not, he was of opinion that had nothing to do with the question; nor, if the defendant's mare got into the plaintiff's fields, whether the plaintiff's horse began to kick first or not.

Maule, for the appellant.—Assuming that the defendant's mare did trespass into the plaintiff's field, and that in a kicking match between the mare and the plaintiff's horse the latter got injured, still the defendant would not be liable unless he knew that his mare had a vice of this kind; and there was in this case no evidence of the mare being vicious at all. The case of Cox v. Burbridge (1) is directly in point. There the defendant's horse had strayed on to a highway in which the plaintiff, a child, was playing, and without any fault on the part of the child the horse kicked it in the face and seriously injured it, and the defendant was held not to be liable unless he knew the horse was of a vicious temper. The county court Judge distinguished that case on the ground that though horses have not a natural tendency to kick children, they have to kick one another. That is not so; people are not in the habit of considering horses to be of that vicious disposition, and at races and on other occasions where horses are brought together, they are frequently left with little or no barrier between each other, and it is seldom found that any injury happens from that practice.

There the owner of the animal was aware of its peculiar mischievous disposition, and yet neglected to restrain it.

(2) 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 245; s. c. ante, C.P. 31.

Horace Smith, for the respondent.—The evidence shews that the injury complained of arose from the defendant neglecting to repair the gate, which was part of the fence of his field, and the authorities establish that such a damage as the one in question is not too remote, and that, as it arose in consequence of the defendant's neglect of duty to repair his fences, he is liable for it in this action. In Star v. Rookesby (3) the plaintiff had declared that he was possessed of a close adjoining to the defendant's, and that the tenants and occupiers of that close had time out of mind made and repaired the fence between the plaintiff's and the defendant's close, and that for want of repair the defendant's cattle came into the plaintiff's close, and it was held that either trespass or case would lie: trespass, because it was the plaintiff's ground and not the defendant's; and case, because the first wrong was a nonfeasance and neglect to repair, and that omission was the gist of the action, and the trespass was only consequential damage. So in an Anonymous case (4), which was an action on the case for not repairing fences, per quod una equa of the plaintiff went through a gap and fell into a ditch, there was no question raised that the action did not lie; and in Powell v. Salisbury (5), where the plaintiff had declared in case against the defendant for not repairing his fences, per quod the plaintiff's horses escaped into the defendant's close and were there killed by the falling of a haystack, it was held that the damage was not too remote, and that the action was maintainable. The case of Rooth v. Wilson (6) is a further authority to the same effect. The plaintiff was entitled to the free and safe use of his own field, but that right the defendant interfered with by his neglect to repair the fences he was bound to repair, and he is liable to the damage which arose from such neglect. This was not a case in which it was a question whether the horse which did the injury was vicious or not; if the two horses were in play, and so the kick was given, still the action would lie. The case resembles that of Powell v.

Salisbury (5), and not that of Cox v. Burbridge (1).

Maule, in reply.—In the cases cited for the respondent there was no question as to the liability of the defendant, but merely whether the damage sought to be recovered was the consequential result of the trespass complained of. That is not this case; here it is whether the defendant had such knowledge of the vicious character of his horse as to make him liable at all.

ERLE, C.J. — In this case I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the respondent. The action is, in substance, either an action of trespass for entering the plaintiff's close, and doing damage there to his horse, or an action on the case for allowing the fences which the defendant was bound to repair to get out of repair, by reason of which the defendant's mare got out of his field into the plaintiff's field, and did the damage complained of. In the county court there are no pleadings, and the cause of action is stated in the plaint to be merely "one black horse, 22*l.*" Still the evidence shews what was the nature of the cause of action, and what the county court Judge had in his mind when he used the words complained of. The evidence shews that through the defect of fences, which the defendant had to repair, his mare got out of his farm into the occupation road, and passed into the plaintiff's field, where his horse was, and that afterwards there had been a conflict between the two horses, in which the plaintiff's horse was killed. The counsel for the defendant has contended that the defendant cannot be made liable for this, unless the defendant's mare was a vicious horse, and the defendant knew that it was so; and he has referred us to the case of Cox v. Burbridge (1), to shew that, where damage is done by a tame animal, the owner is not liable, unless the animal has a ferocity which is known to its keeper. I am of opinion, however, that it was not the duty of the county court Judge to lay that down to the jury in this case, because the point which has been made by Mr. Maule would not avail him here, as this is an action for a trespass, in respect of which the defendant is clearly liable to some damage, and the only question is as to the remoteness of the damage. Therefore, I think it was not necessary for the learned Judge to have left the question to the jury, whether the defendant's horse was ferocious, and whether the defendant knew of that vice, because the nature of the injury was not dependent on the vice of the horse, or the defendant's knowledge of such vice ; but whether such animal strayed, through the defective state of the defendant's fences, into the plaintiff's field, and there did the damage complained of. The present case falls, I think, within the category of those which have been cited for the plaintiff, and not of those depending on the ferocious disposition of the animal, and knowledge of such character by its owner. The main objection being thus disposed of, it is sufficient to say that the others are untenable, for I think there is abundant evidence that it was the defendant's mare which did the injury.

(5) 2 You. & J. 391.

(6) 1 B. & Ald. 59.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Maule complains that the jury were not told that the plaintiff was bound to have proved that the defendant's mare was vicious, and that the defendant knew of it. I do not think that this was necessary. The case on the part of the plaintiff was, that the defendant's mare, which was a strong animal, with particular shoes on, of a heavy character, had made the marks found on the plaintiff's horse. Now might not such an animal as this of the defendant's have produced the injury complained of, such injury being the proximate consequence of the defendant's negligence? I think it might, and it is sufficient to say that the proximate cause of it was the defendant's neglect to keep up his fences.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and on the ground that the damages sought to be recovered were not too remote.

SMITH, J.—It is said that the plaintiff ought not to recover, because he did not prove that the horse was vicious; but it seems to me that it was not necessary for him to prove this. It is enough that the accident which occurred arose from the defendant's neglect, and was the natural consequence of two horses meeting under the circumstances stated in this case. I do not think the damages are too remote.

Judgment for respondent.

May 5, 10. } v. WISEMAN AND ANOTHER.

Foreign Attachment—Mayor's Court of London—Proceedings after Death of Defendant—Impeaching Judgment of the Mayor's Court—Debt not attachable.

Proceedings by foreign attachment in the Mayor's Court of the city of London, commenced after the death of the creditor of the garnishee, whose debt is attached, are null and void.

In an action by an administratrix for a debt due to M, the intestate, the defendants pleaded to the further maintenance that the debt sued for had been attached in the Mayor's Court, in a suit instituted by K. against the intestate, that a regular judgment had been obtained by K. in such court, and that execution had issued thereon against the defendants as garnishees, and that after the commencement of this action the defendants as garnishees paid the said debt to K. for the purpose of satisfying such judgment. Replication, that at the time of affirming the plaint in the Mayor's Court, M, the intestate, was dead. Rejoinder, that at the time of affirming the said plaint, no one had administered to the estate of M, the intestate, but that before execution was had by K. the plaintiff took out letters of administration to the estate of K, and might, according to the practice of the Mayor's Court, and the custom of the city of London, have appeared to the said plaint and defended the same, or might have dissolved the said attachment and defended the said plaint :—Held, on demurrer, that the plaintiff was not estopped as against the defendants from shewing the nullity of the proceedings in the Mayor's Court, and that the defendants could not avail themselves of the payment to K. as any defence to the action.

Quære—whether the debt sued for by the administratrix was attached at all, inasmuch as there was no debt due to the intestate at the time of the attachment as the intestate was then dead.

This was an action by the administratrix of Frederick Matthey, deceased. The declaration contained counts for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the said F. Matthey, and for money due on accounts stated.

The defendants pleaded, thirdly, to the further maintenance of the action, a plea which, after setting out at length the custom of foreign attachment in the city of London, stated that Charles Kelson, Vincent Briscoe Tritton, Edward Pakenham Alderson, Peter Godfrey Chapman, and Earnest Thomas Hankey, trading under the style or firm of "Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co.," and thereafter called "Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co.," before the commencement of this action, to wit, on the 3rd of March 1863, in their own proper persons came into the Court of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, before the Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London, in the chamber of Guildhall, of and within the said city, according to custom, and then and there affirmed a certain plaint against F. Matthey, now deceased, in a plea of debt upon demand of 2,183*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* of lawful money of Great Britain, and the same Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. then, in the same court, according to such custom, found pledges to prosecute such suit, to wit, John Doe and Richard Roe, and then and there appointed in their stead John Michael Pearson, their attorney, against the said F. Matthey, in the plea of the said plaint, according to such custom, and it was granted to them, &c.; whereupon, at the petition of the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co., then and there made to such court by their said attorney, and by virtue of such plaint, it was then and there commanded by the said Court to Christopher Fitch, then being one of the serjeants-at-mace of such Court, that he, according to such custom, should summon by good summoners the said F. Matthey to appear at the same court so holden before the Mayor and Aldermen of the said city, in the chamber of the Guildhall of the said city, to answer the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. in the plea in such plaint specified, and that the said C. Fitch should return and certify what he should do by virtue of the said precept. And afterwards, at the same court, the said C. Fitch, according to such custom, returned and certified to the same court, that the said F. Matthey had nothing within the said city or the liberties thereof whereby he could be summoned, nor was he to be found within the same, and thereupon the said Frederick Matthey was then and there at the same court solemnly called and did not appear, but made default, and thereupon afterwards and before the commencement of this action, to wit, &c. at the same court, it was alleged by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co., by their said attorney, that the said James Wiseman and William Wilson, the now defendants, owed to the said F. Matthey 2,183*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* in monies numbered, as the proper monies of the said F. Matthey, and then detained the same in their hands and custody. That they, the now defendants, at the time when it was by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co., by their said attorney, so alleged as last aforesaid were and were found within the said city and within the jurisdiction of the same court, and thereupon the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co., by their attorney, then and there prayed process according to such custom to attach the said F. Matthey by the said 2,183*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* so being in the hands and custody of the now defendants, so that the said F. Matthey might appear at the next Court to be held before the Mayor and Aldermen of the said city in the chamber of the Guildhall of and in the said city, to answer the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. in the plea in such plaint specified. Whereupon, at their petition, it was then and there commanded by such Court, before the commencement of this action, to the said serjeant-at-mace and minister of the said court, that he, according to such custom, should attach the said F. Matthey by the said 2,183*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* so being in the hands and custody of the now defendants as aforesaid, and the same in their hands and custody defend and keep according to such custom, so that the said F. Matthey might appear at the then next Court to be holden before the said Mayor and Aldermen, &c., according to such custom, &c.

The plea in like manner set out fully the rest of the proceedings in the Mayor's Court, viz., the warning to the now defendants by the said serjeant-at-mace not to part with the said 2,183*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* without licence of the Court, but to keep the same so that the said F. Matthey might be attached thereby, that he might appear at the next court to answer the said Messrs.

Kelson, Tritton & Co. ; the return by the said serjeant-at-mace that he had attached the said F. Matthey by the said 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. in the hands of the now defendants, so that he might appear at the next court to answer, &c. the first, second, third and fourth defaults of the said F. Matthey, after having been solemnly called, all which defaults were duly recorded according to the said custom ; the warning to the now defendants by the said serjeant-at-mace to appear at such court, &c. to shew cause why the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. should not have execution of the said 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. ; the return by the said serjeant-at-mace that he had so warned them ; the default of the now defendants to appear at such Court after being solemnly called ; the judgment of the said Court that the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. should have execution of the said 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. in monies so attached by sufficient pledges to be given by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. to restore to the said F. Matthey the said monies so attached if the said F. Matthey within a year and a day then next ensuing should come into the said court and disprove and avoid the same debt ; the finding of such pledges by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. ; and the suing out by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. and delivery to the said serjeant-at-mace of a precept for taking the now defendants in execution to satisfy the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. attached as aforesaid.

The plea then averred that thereupon the now defendants, afterwards, and after the commencement of this action, and whilst the said precept was in the hands of the said serjeant-at-mace for the purpose of being executed—to wit, &c., being then within the city of London, and the jurisdiction of the said Court, were then and there forced and obliged, and then and there necessarily did, for the purpose of satisfying the said judgment, pay to the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. the said sum of 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*., according to the exigency of the said precept, and thereby the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. then and there, according to the custom of the said Court, had execution of the said debt of 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. against the now defendants, the said garnishees, according to the tenor of such judgment in that behalf given, and thereby the said execution then was executed, as by the record and proceedings thereof remaining in the chamber of the Guildhall of the city of London aforesaid more fully appears ; that the said 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. so attached, and of which the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. had execution by virtue of such judgment, accrued due from the now defendants to the said F. Matthey, and the said F. Matthey's cause of action in respect thereof, and the cause of action of the now plaintiff, as administratrix of the said F. Matthey, in respect thereof, arose within the city of London, and the jurisdiction of the said Court, and not elsewhere, and that the said 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. were so attached before, and paid after, the commencement of this suit ; that the said execution was duly executed in the said city, according to the custom of the said city, and that the said judgment and execution are still in force, and not in the least by the plaintiff otherwise disproved or avoided ; and that the said sum of 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. claimed by the plaintiff as such administratrix of the said F. Matthey, deceased, in this action, is the very same and identical sum of 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. so attached and taken in execution by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co., by virtue of the judgment aforesaid.

Replication to the third plea : That before the time of the affirming of the said plaint the said F. Matthey died and he was then dead.

Rejoinder to such replication : That the said F. Matthey, at the time of his death, was indebted to the said Kelson, Tritton & Co. in 2,183*l*. 17*s*. 9*d*. for money lent by the said Messrs. Kelson, Tritton & Co. to the said F. Matthey in his lifetime, and for money paid by the said Kelson, Tritton & Co. for the use of the said F. Matthey in his lifetime and at his request, and for money found to be due from the said F. Matthey in his lifetime, upon accounts stated between the said Kelson, Tritton & Co. and the said F. Matthey ; and that, at the time of the affirming the said plaint in the said Mayor's Court, as in the said third plea mentioned, neither the plaintiff nor any other person had administered to the estate and effects of the said F. Matthey, deceased, and that the said Kelson, Tritton & Co. were entitled to recover against the estate of the said F. Matthey, deceased, the said sum of 2,183*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; and that they, the said Kelson, Tritton & Co., affirmed the said plaint in the said Mayor's Court, as in the third plea mentioned, according to the custom of the said city of London; and the plaintiff afterwards, and before execution was had of the said sum as in the third plea mentioned, took out letters of administration to the estate and effects of the said F. Matthey, deceased, and had notice of the premises; and thereupon the plaintiff, as such administratrix as aforesaid, afterwards, and before execution was had of the sum as aforesaid, might, according to the practice of the said Mayor's Court, and the customs of the said city of London, have caused an appearance to be entered to the said plaint of the said Kelson, Tritton & Co., and might have defended the same, or she might, according to the practice of the said Mayor's Court and the custom of the said city of London, have dissolved the said attachment in the third plea mentioned, and defended the said plaint so affirmed by the said Kelson, Tritton & Co., against the said F. Matthey, deceased; and that all proceedings were had in the matter of the said plaint, and the said attachment, as in the third plea mentioned, according to the practice of the said Mayor's Court, and the custom of the said city of London, and in pursuance thereof. Demurrer thereto and joinder in demurrer.

Hannen (May 5), in support of the demurrer.—The pleadings raise the question, whether the custom to sue a dead man by the process of foreign attachment in the city of London is a valid custom. Pulling on the Laws and Customs of London, 2nd edit. p. 189, shews that the original object of the process was to compel the defendant's appearance, though in actual practice the defendant is not really served with any process or notice at all. And in Andrews v. Clerke (1), it was agreed by all, that a foreign attachment in London is to no other purpose but to compel an appearance of the defendant in the action; for if he appear within a year and a day and put in bail to the action the garnishee is discharged. At the time of its origin the proclamations which were made were well known in the city, and the mode of summoning must originally have been something equivalent to notice, and although now the summons may have become merely a matter of form it is still an essential part of the proceedings, and there must therefore be a living defendant against whom the plaint can be affirmed in the Lord Mayor's Court. The case of Fisher v. Lane (2) also establishes that in proceedings on foreign attachment, the creditor of the garnishee must be summoned or have notice (though it is alleged to be the custom of London to give no notice), otherwise the judgment against the garnishee will be erroneous, and the money paid or levied in execution of it will not discharge the garnishee of his debt to his creditor.

Henry James (Gates with him), contra.—According to the custom and practice in the Mayor's Court, if the defendant has goods in the city within the jurisdiction of the Court capable of being attached, it is not necessary that the defendant himself should be within the jurisdiction. The defendant is never served with any notice of the proceedings, but a summons is issued and entered on record and the goods are seized; but it is competent for the defendant at any time during a year and a day from the time of the judgment to appear and put an end to the attachment. The whole process is a kind of bail or security for the defendant's rendering to the jurisdiction of the Court, and the time which is required to elapse before the judgment is entered up and complete is for the purpose of giving the garnishee the opportunity of communicating with the defendant on the subject of the attachment. In the present case there is a judgment of a proper Court of record and execution issued under it against the now defendants as garnishees; they had no means of contesting that judgment, and were bound to pay under it to the parties to whom they have paid this money. It is also admitted, on the present pleadings, that the plaintiff, the administratrix, had notice of the proceedings in the Mayor's Court, and might, according to the practice of the Mayor's Court, have dissolved the attachment, but that she took no steps to do so.

(1) Carth. 26.

(2) 3 Wils. 297.

Under these circumstances it is submitted that the judgment of the Mayor's Court was a good protection to the now defendants who so paid under it, and they cannot be compelled to pay the debt over again to the plaintiff in this action. It has been held, that money paid by a garnishee under a judgment of the Mayor's Court is a good discharge of the debt due from the garnishee to the creditor, although the Mayor's Court had no jurisdiction over such debtor—Harrington v. Macmorris (3), Banks v. Self (4), De Haber v. the Queen of Portugal (5), and Westoby v. Day (6). In that last case Lord Campbell, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "This replication allows that the plea replied to is good within the custom of foreign attachment in the city of London, and raises the question, whether the garnishee after a regular judgment and execution against him, having paid the debt, may be compelled to pay it a second time on proof in this suit that the debt did not arise within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court. The affirmative would often work great hardship and injustice to the garnishee, who may be entirely ignorant of the origin of the debt sued for, who has no means of contesting the debt, except by appearing and putting in bail to the original action, and who may be wholly unable to prove that the debt arose out of the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court, although the fact be so. . . . In the recent case of De Haber v. the Queen of Portugal (5) we expressed an opinion that the process of foreign attachment can only be duly resorted to where the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the Court from which it issues. But we said, 'the garnishee is safe by paying under the judgment of the Court;' adding, 'the objection that the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction of the Court, if properly taken, must prevail.' But in the absence of fraud, the objection as against the garnishee comes too late after he has paid the debt to the plaintiff below under a regular judgment." In the present case there is no averment that the now defendants had notice of the death of the intestate Matthey.

[SMITH, J.—The bringing of the present action was notice to them of the death before they paid the money.]

But between the judgment and execution it does not appear that they had any means of appearing and setting aside the attachment.

Hannen, in reply.—The case of Westoby v. Day (6) is distinguishable from the present, as there was nothing to impeach the proceedings on the face of them. But here the original defendant being dead before the proceedings were commenced, there was no debt which could be attached, and the object of the proceedings, which is to enable the garnishee to communicate with the defendant so that he might come in and set up what defence he might have to the action, could never be effected. It is stated in Masters v. Lewis (7), that "garnishment cannot be but where the garnishee is liable to the action of the defendant; for the garnishee may plead all things that the defendant might have pleaded." Now here, where the defendant was dead, there was no debt to the defendant for which the garnishee was liable. 2 Bell's Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland, p. 72, shews why the arrestee cannot object to the claim of the arrester, is because he has no right or interest to take up such a defence, but it is competent for him to shew that he is not a debtor to the arrester's debtor.

Curr. adv. vult.

SMITH, J. now (May 10) delivered the judgment of the Court (8) as follows: In the case of an action brought by the administratrix of Frederick Matthey, the defendants pleaded to the further maintenance of the action, that the debts sued for had been attached in the Lord Mayor's Court, in a suit instituted by Kelson and others against the intestate; the plea sets out the proceedings in the Lord Mayor's Court, and alleges that, after the commencement of this action, Kelson & Co. had execution of the debt against the defendants, and that they, as garnishees, paid it. To this plea the plaintiff replied, that, at the time of affirming the plaint in the Mayor's Court, F. Matthey was dead. The defendants, by their rejoinder, in substance allege, that when the plaint was brought in the Mayor's Court no one had administered to the estate of Matthey, but that, before execution had, the plaintiff administered, and might by the custom have appeared in the Mayor's Court and dissolved the attachment. To this rejoinder the plaintiff demurred, and we think that she is entitled to judgment on this demurrer.

It is admitted on the pleadings that all the proceedings in the Lord Mayor's Court took place after the death of the nominal defendant in that suit. It could not be contended, with any show of reason, that the custom alleged in the plea justified the prosecution of a suit against a dead man as if he were living, or that a custom to that effect, if alleged, would be good. Although it has been held that actual notice of the suit in the Mayor's Court need not be given to the defendant, certain proceedings must be taken, which by intendment are considered equivalent to notice, and which are essential to the validity of the attachment. These proceedings, the purpose of which is to compel the appearance of the defendant, are all averred in the plea to have been duly had and taken. But it appears to us they were all null and vain when there was no defendant to be affected by them. The principal contention of the defendants was, that the judgment of the Mayor's Court was conclusive, and that the garnishees having paid the debt under the attachment, the judgment, quoad them, could not be impeached. We think this contention is not well founded. No doubt the Lord Mayor's Court is a court of record, but it is an inferior court, and its jurisdiction may be questioned. The case of Westoby v. Day (6) decided, that in an action against garnishees to recover a debt paid by them under a process of foreign attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court, it could not be averred by the plaintiff (the defendant in the Mayor's Court) that the debt did not arise within the jurisdiction of that Court. But in that case the plaintiff, Westoby (the defendant in the Mayor's Court), might have appeared and raised the objection in the Mayor's Court by a plea to the jurisdiction, and, not having done so, it was held that he, when suing in the superior courts the garnishees who had paid the debt under attachment, could not, as against them, impeach the judgment. The present case seems to us to be distinguishable from Westoby v. Day (6), on the broad ground that in this case there was no defendant in the Mayor's Court who could appear or plead. The suit was commenced and prosecuted against a non-existing defendant, and the judgment cannot, as it seems to us, be conclusive, when there was nobody as defendant to conclude. The garnishees (the now defendants) might, no doubt, when they had notice of the attachment, have appeared in the Mayor's Court, and if Matthey's death were then known to them they might probably have pleaded to the jurisdiction. But they took no step, and allowed the proceedings to go on to judgment and execution. It is not necessary for us now to decide whether the present defendants, as between Kelson & Co., the plaintiffs in the Mayor's Court, and themselves, are estopped from disputing the attachment. But we are of opinion that the present plaintiff, who was no party to the suit, is not estopped, as against them, from shewing the nullity of the proceedings. It was further contended, by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the debt now sued for was not attached at all, inasmuch as the debt assumed to be attached was a debt due from the defendants to Matthey, whereas, at the time of the attachment, Matthey being dead, there was no such debt. Our decision being in the plaintiff's favour on the larger question, it is not necessary for us to say whether this objection should also prevail. It was held, in Westoby v. Day (6), that the plaintiff (the defendant in the Mayor's Court) was not estopped by the judgment from shewing that the debt there attached was not attachable by reason of the beneficial interest being vested in another. The rejoinder is founded on an alleged custom that the plaintiff, after she became administratrix, might have appeared in the suit in the Lord Mayor's Court and dissolved the attachment. We think that such a custom is unreasonable and void, if it is to be understood to mean the non-appearance of the administratrix is to give life to a suit which was a nullity from its inception; and if the custom does not mean this, we do not see how the fact that the plaintiff did not intervene can affect the position of the parties. We think, therefore, that the defendants, who made no effort to avoid the attachment or to prevent the execution of it, and who did not pay the debt until after this action had been brought against them by the administratrix, cannot avail themselves of that payment, and our judgment is given for the plaintiff.

June 11, 17, 24. { THE MOST HONOURABLE
THE MARQUIS OF SALIS-BURY v. GLADSTONE.

Copyhold—Custom.

A custom in a manor that copyholders of inheritance may break the surface and dig and get clay, without stint, out of their copyhold tenements, for the purpose of making bricks, to be sold off the manor, is good in law (dubitante Lord Wensleydale).

Error was brought in this case by the plaintiff on a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Byles, J., before whom the case was tried, and under whose direction a verdict was found for the defendant.

The action was ejectment for a forfeiture of certain lands in the manor of West Derby, in the county of Lancaster. The defendant was a copyholder of inheritance of the manor of West Derby, of which the plaintiff was lord.

The defendant had broken the surface and dug clay on his own tenement, for the purpose of making bricks for sale, which he made, and afterwards sold, and contended that he was justified in so doing by an immemorial usage in the manor, for copyholders of inheritance without licence of the lord, to dig and get clay in their own tenements for the purpose of making bricks for sale. Evidence was given of this custom.

The learned Judge held that the custom, if proved, was good in law, and so directed the jury. Exceptions were tendered to this direction. The jury thought that the evidence did prove the custom in fact, and so, under this direction, the verdict was found for the defendant.

On error to the Exchequer Chamber the judgment was affirmed (1). This proceeding in error was then taken.

Sir H. Cairns and Mr. Manisty (Mr. T. Jones was with them), for the appellant.—The custom here set up is a custom to commit waste, and waste of the very soil of the manor. Such a custom cannot be supported.

the plaintiff, that no such custom as that now set up could exist; for that a custom to be valid must be reasonable, and that the custom here was not reasonable, since the exercise of it tended to the annihilation of the lands themselves. It was not easy to define the meaning of the word "reasonable," when applied to a custom relating to a lord and his copyholders. The relation between them must have had its origin in remote times, by agreement, when he was the absolute owner of the soil, and they were its occupants as his tenants at will. Whatever restrictions he imposed, or whatever rights they demanded, were within the competency of the lord to grant, or the tenants to stipulate for. And if evidence could be given of what was then agreed on between them, and it was shewn that what was so agreed on had always been acted upon since, it was difficult to see how it could be declared void on the ground of its being unreasonable. Looking to the present case, it was impossible to say that such a custom as that here alleged might not have resulted from an agreement between the lord and the tenants before the time of legal memory. The only persons affected by it were the lord and the particular tenant. In Broadbent v. Wilks it affected other copyholders; and so again, in Wilson v. Willes, where the custom claimed was to take an unlimited quantity of turf from the common for the improvement of the tenements of those who took it, without reference to the other copyholders whose rights in the common might be thereby wholly destroyed. This was not a custom like that claimed in the case of Hilton v. Lord Granville, by which the houses of the tenants might all be undermined and destroyed without notice of what was to be done, or compensation for doing it. The custom here affected only the lord and the particular tenant, and there was no reason for saying that it might not have been the result of arrangement between these two parties. Such a custom relating to the sale of copper ore had been held good in The Bishop of Winchester v. Knight, where the tenant was not strictly a copyholder, but was a customary tenant, Lord Cowper directing an issue to try whether there was such a custom in fact, which he could not have done if he had thought that a custom of that kind would be void as unreasonable. That case could not be distinguished from the present, for clay was not the only part of the soil adapted for profitable culture, even, if a custom would be bad which would lead to making the land useless for agricultural purposes. This was only a custom insisted on for this particular manor, and so limited. It might be good and reasonable; for it might have been thought that the clay here was present in such excessive quantity that its removal would tend to benefit and not to impoverish the soil. The alleged custom would not warrant the removal of soil consisting of mixed portions of clay, chalk, gravel, and vegetable mould; and it might be that the lord considered that the removal of pure clay would increase the value of the soil which would remain. The direction of the learned Judge at the trial was therefore right, and the exceptions were properly disallowed; and the judgment must be for the defendant in error.—His Lordship added, that Lord Brougham, who had heard the argument, concurred in the judgment.

LORD WENSLEYDALE confessed to not having a very decided opinion on the case, but he should not do more than express his doubts, and should not oppose the motion of his noble and learned friend. There was no doubt whatever but that the lord, being the original owner of the soil, could have given by grant such a power or even a larger one to his tenants; but when there was no express grant, the rule of law applied that a custom to be good must not be unreasonable, otherwise the use might be referred to the ignorance or carelessness of those whose property it affected, and not to their grant. For that reason the custom set up in Wilson v. Willes was held bad. And so in Arlett v. Ellis, it was held that it could not be a good custom for the lord to inclose without leaving a sufficiency of common. Yet in both these cases it might have been argued that the lord might originally have made a grant to that effect. So he might, no doubt, make a grant to take away the clay, however deep and extensive the stratum of that clay might be, and however much injury it might cause to the tenement, even though there was no countervailing benefit. But there the grant must be shewn. Here it was claimed as a custom. Such claim would be void if it was unreasonable. Then was it an unreasonable thing for a copyhold tenant to have a right to destroy the natural surface of the soil, and remove it altogether, leaving only a substratum, sand or stone, or whatever it might be, which might be incapable of cultivation, exposed below? This custom differed much from the right to cut trees, for that might be highly beneficial to agriculture, and in particular soils they might be replaced by others: it also differed from the right to get minerals which might be done without injury to the surface. Under these circumstances he still entertained much doubt upon the question, but as all his noble and learned friends differed from him, and had formed a very decided opinion upon the validity of the custom proved, he did not mean to offer any advice to their Lordships, that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber should be reversed.

LORD CHELMSFORD said that the existence of immemorial usage had been in this case fully established by the evidence. It was insisted, however, for the appellant, that the custom must be bad, because it could not be presumed that there was a convention between the lord and the tenant to permit the latter to destroy the copyhold, by taking away the soil itself. It was admitted that there might be a valid custom for a copyholder of inheritance to work mines, to dig and take clay, or to cut down and carry away trees; but it was said that it was the extent of this custom which made it unreasonable, and a distinction was drawn between trees which were perishable and renewable, and the clay which was the soil itself. The trees, however, were not properly described as "renewable," though they might be replaced by others. It was difficult to conceive in what way a custom to take the whole of a particular soil from a tenement could be called a destruction of the tenement itself. The tenement would remain though this particular portion of the soil was removed. There seemed nothing unreasonable in supposing that the lord might originally have licensed his tenants to use their copyhold tenements in the way in which alone, perhaps, any great benefit could be derived from them. There was little, if any, distinction between a custom to work mines and a custom to dig clay for the profit of the tenant. In The Bishop of Winchester v. Knight, the freehold was in the lord, and the only difference between that and a copyhold case was that the tenants did not hold ad voluntatem domini. Lord Cowper recognized the legal validity of such a custom, or he would not have sent a case to try whether in fact it existed. There was little resemblance between this case and those where the clause was of a profit à prendre in alieno solo. In a copyhold tenement, though the soil was in the lord, he could not, any more than the tenant, work mines or cut down trees without a custom authorizing him to do so. The rights of the lord were those which had been reserved, those of the tenant those which had been granted. But in one as in the other the rights of one party must not be inconsistent with those which existed in the other. That was the principle which governed Bateson v. Green and Broadbent v. Wilks, in the former in favour of the lord, in the latter adverse to him, because of its utter inconsistency with the grant to the tenant. In Wilson v. Willes a custom for all the tenants of a manor, having gardens, to take pasturable turf at all times and in unlimited quantity, from a waste within the manor, for making and repairing grass plots in their gardens, and for making and repairing the banks and mounds fencing their customary estates, was held bad as being indefinite, uncertain and destructive of the common. These cases indicated the principle on which the unreasonableness of any custom might be ascertained. There could be no doubt that the lord on the original grant of the copyhold tenements in question might have reserved to himself the right to dig and carry away the brick-earth found upon them, and if a custom of that kind existed upon the manor it would be valid. But if the lord might have reserved such a right to himself, why might he not confer it on the tenants? And if it was not unreasonable to suppose that such a right might have been originally conferred, then the custom, which had been proved by the immemorial exercise of the right, was good in law, and the judgment in favour of the defendant in error ought to be affirmed.

BINDER v. THE SAME.

Metropolitan Burials Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. s. 32. — Rights of Incumbents to Burial Fees — Division of Parish into Districts.

By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. s. 32. the burial-ground provided under the act is to be the burial-ground of the parish for which it is provided, "and every incumbent or minister of the parish," "for which such burial-ground is provided, shall, by himself and his curate, or such duly qualified persons as such incumbent or minister may authorize, perform the duties, and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of religious service in the burial in such burial-ground, of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the parish of which he is such incumbent or minister, and shall be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he has previously enjoyed and received;" and by the interpretation clause (s. 52.) to that act "parish" is to "mean every place having separate overseers of the poor and separately maintaining its own poor," and "incumbent" or "minister" is, "in respect of any fee made payable to an incumbent or minister under the act" to mean "the clergyman who would have been entitled to the fee had the body been buried in the churchyard or burial-ground of the parish from which it came, or in the burial-ground of the ecclesiastical district, in case such district had a burial-ground at the passing of this act."

Where, prior to this act, a township, which was a parish within the meaning of the interpretation clause, was divided into ecclesiastical districts, with separate burial-grounds, and afterwards a burial-ground was provided under the act for the whole township, it was held, that each incumbent of such district was entitled to the burial fees in respect of the burial service performed by him in the burial-ground provided under the act to which he would have been entitled before the act if the body had been buried in the burial-ground attached to his district.

These actions were brought, by the respective plaintiffs therein, against the Burial

Board for the township of Barnsley, in the county of York, for the recovery of fees claimed to be payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs respectively, for burials, and the erecting or placing of monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions in the burial-ground provided by the defendant for the township of Barnsley under the provisions of the statutes relating to the burial of the dead; and by the consent of the parties, and by an order of a Judge, according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the following case was stated for the opinion of the Court without any pleadings.

CASE.

The township of Barnsley, in the county of York, forms a part of the parish of Silkstone. It has separate overseers of the poor, and separately maintains its own poor.

Up to the time of the making of the Order in Council of the 8th of August 1831, hereinafter mentioned, the said township formed one parochial chapelry, which had existed from time immemorial. The church of St. Mary was the parochial chapel of the said chapelry, and there was belonging to the said chapelry, and within the said township, an ancient burial-ground, in which from time immemorial the remains of the inhabitants of the said chapelry had been and were of right entitled to be buried; and for burials in this burial-ground, and for the erection of monuments therein and in the said church of St. Mary, fees had always been paid to the incumbent for the time being of the said chapelry.

In or about the year 1823 an additional church, called St. George's Church, was built within the said chapelry by Her Majesty's Commissioners for building New Churches, under the provisions of 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. and 59 Geo. 3. c. 134; and on or about the 16th of June 1824 a burial-ground within the said township was, under the provisions of the same statutes, purchased and appropriated by the said Commissioners as and for a burial-ground for the said church of St. George. This church and burial-ground were afterwards duly consecrated.

By an Order in Council, bearing date the 8th of August 1831, a district was divided from the said chapelry and assigned to the said church of St. George, under the provisions of the statutes above referred to, and of the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 72.

The district so assigned to the said church of St. George has, since the said Order in Council, been called St. George's District. The residue of the said township has, since the same Order in Council, been called St. Mary's District. In this latter district are situate the said church of St. Mary, and the said ancient burial-ground belonging to the said chapelry. This ancient burial-ground was enlarged about forty years ago, and from the time of its being so enlarged until the formation of St. George's district as aforesaid was the burial-ground of the said chapelry, and since the formation of St. George's district as aforesaid has been the burial-ground of the said district of St. Mary; and for burials and the erection of monuments therein fees have always been paid to the incumbent for the time being of St. Mary's.

Since the formation of St. George's district as aforesaid, the burial-ground so appropriated as and for the burial-ground of St. George's Church as aforesaid has been the burial-ground of the said district of St. George's; and for burials and the erection of monuments therein fees have always been paid to the incumbent for the time being of St. George's district.

By an Order in Council, bearing date the 23rd of May 1844, a district called St. John's District was divided from St. George's district, under the provisions of the statutes above referred to. From the making of this order until the year 1858, divine service for St. John's district was performed in a schoolroom in that district; and in 1858 a church, called St. John's Church, was built in and for the same district in which church divine service has since been performed.

The district so assigned to St. John's church has, since the said last-mentioned Order in Council, been called St. John's District. The residue of St. George's district has, since the same Order in Council, been called St. George's District.

There has never been any burial-ground assigned to or belonging to St. John's district, but the remains of persons dying within the limits of this district have been accustomed to be buried in the burial-ground of St. George's district, of which St. John's district formerly formed part; and for such burials in the said burial-ground of St. George's district fees have always been paid, since the formation of St. George's district as aforesaid, to the incumbent for the time being of St. George's district.

By an Order in Council, bearing date the 2nd of February 1857, made under the provisions of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, it was ordered (amongst other things) that (with certain exceptions therein mentioned) burials should, after periods in that behalf appointed, be discontinued in the said burial-grounds of St. Mary's and St. George's districts.

Upon the last-mentioned Order in Council being made it became necessary to provide a new burial-ground for the said township of Barnsley, and the vestry of the said township having refused to provide such burial-ground, the local board of health for the said township became, on or about the 3rd of February 1858, under the provisions of the 4th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, the burial board for the said township.

The said burial board afterwards, under the provisions of the various statutes relating to the burial of the dead, duly provided a burial-ground for the said township.

The burial-ground so provided by the said burial board (except the portion thereof not intended to be consecrated, and upon which portion a chapel is erected and built,) was, with a chapel erected thereon, on or about the 6th of November 1861, duly consecrated, from which time it became the burial-ground for the said several ecclesiastical districts of the said township, within the meaning and according to the provisions of the said last-mentioned statutes.

The plaintiff the Rev. Henry Josiah Day is the incumbent of the said district of St. Mary, and claims to be entitled to perform the duties and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of religious service in the burial, in the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board, of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. Mary, and also to be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he has previously enjoyed and received for burials in the said burial-ground of St. Mary's district, as if such burial-ground so provided by the said burial board was the burial-ground of St. Mary's district. He also claims to be entitled to fees for such monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions erected or placed in the consecrated part of the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board as aforesaid, or in the chapel erected thereon as may be so erected or placed over the remains or in memory of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. Mary, in lieu of the fees or sums which he would have been entitled to for the erecting or placing of such monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions in the said burial-ground of St. Mary's district or in the said church of St. Mary.

The plaintiff the Rev. Clement Francis Cobb is the incumbent of the said district of St. George, and claims to be entitled to perform the duties and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of religious service in the burial; in the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board, of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. George, and also to be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he has previously received and enjoyed for burials in the said burial-ground of St. George's district, as if such burial-ground so provided by the said burial board were the burial-ground of St. George's district. He also claims to be entitled to fees for such monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions erected or placed in the consecrated part of the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board as aforesaid, and in the chapel erected thereon as may be so erected or placed over the remains or in memory of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. George, in lieu of the fees or sums which he would have been entitled to for the erecting or placing of such monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions in the said burial-ground of St. George's district, or in the said church of St. George.

The plaintiff the Rev. William John Binder is the incumbent of the said district of St. John, and claims to be entitled to perform the duties and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of religious service in the burial, in the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board, of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. John, and also to be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he would have been entitled to enjoy and receive for burials in a burial-ground provided for the said district of St. John, as if the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board were the burial-ground of St. John's district. He also claims to be entitled to fees for such monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions erected or placed in the consecrated part of the burial-ground so provided by the said burial board as aforesaid, and in the chapel erected thereon as may be so erected or placed over the remains or in memory of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. John, in lieu of the fees or sums which he would have been entitled to for the erecting or placing of such monuments, gravestones, tablets and monumental inscriptions in a burial-ground provided for St. John's district, or in the said church of St. John.

If the Court should be of opinion that neither the said Clement Francis Cobb, as the incumbent of St. George's district, nor the said William John Binder, as the incumbent of St. John's district, has any right or title to fees, as above mentioned, then the said Henry Josiah Day, as the incumbent of St. Mary's district, claims to have the same rights, and to be entitled to the same fees in respect of parishioners or inhabitants of the whole of the said township, which before the said Order in Council of the 8th of August 1831 formed one parochial chapelry as hereinbefore mentioned, as he claims in respect of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. Mary, as in this case is stated.

If the Court should be of opinion that the said Clement Francis Cobb, as incumbent of the said district of St. George, has the rights and is entitled to the fees claimed by him as in this case is stated, but that the said William John Binder, as the incumbent of the said district of St. John, has no right or title to fees as in this case mentioned, then the said Clement Francis Cobb, as incumbent of the said district of St. George, claims to have the same rights, and to be entitled to the same fees in respect of parishioners or inhabitants of the whole of the district of St. George, as it existed before the said district of St. John was formed out of it, as he claims in respect of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. George as now existing as in this case is stated.

The said burial board, who are the defendants in the said several actions, deny that the plaintiffs, or any of them, have or has the rights, or are or is entitled to fees as above claimed by them respectively.

The questions for the opinion of the Court are, whether the plaintiffs, or any and which of them, have or has any, and, if any, what rights, or are or is entitled to any, and, if any, what fees as above claimed by them respectively.

Lush (Kemplay with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiff Mr. Binder makes no claim to the fees; and the only question is, whether the plaintiffs Mr. Day and Mr. Cobb, or either of them, are entitled to the fees claimed by them, and that will depend upon section 32. of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. By the 19th section of that act the expenses incurred by the burial board in carrying the act into execution are to be paid out of the poor-rate of the parish. Then the 32nd section provides that after the consecration of any burial-ground provided under the act, or from such time as the bishop of the diocese shall appoint, "such burial-ground shall be deemed the burial-ground of the parish for which the same is provided, and where the same is provided for two or more parishes, such burial-ground shall be in law as if such parishes were one parish, and as if such burial-ground were the burial-ground of such one parish, and every incumbent or minister of the parish, or of each of the parishes (as the case may be) for which such burial-ground is provided, shall, by himself and his curate, or such duly qualified persons as such incumbent or minister may authorize, perform the duties, and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of religious services in the burial, in such burial-ground, or in the consecrated portion thereof, of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the parish of which he is such incumbent or minister, and shall be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he has previously enjoyed and received;" "and the parishioners and inhabitants of such parish, or of each of such parishes, shall have the same rights of sepulture in such burial-ground as they respectively would have had in the burial-ground or burial-grounds in and for their respective parish," subject to the provisions contained in the act. By section 52. (the interpretation clause) "parish" is to mean "every place having separate overseers of the poor and separately maintaining its own poor." Neither St. Mary's district nor St. George's district was a parish within the meaning of that word as given by this interpretation clause, and therefore, as neither of the gentlemen who are claiming as incumbents of those districts is incumbent of the whole parish, it will be contended by the other side that they are not entitled to these burial fees; but "incumbent" in the same interpretation clause is declared, "in respect of any fee made payable to an incumbent under the act," to mean "the clergyman who would have been entitled to the fee had the body been buried in the churchyard or burial-ground of the parish from which it came, or in the burial-ground of the ecclesiastical district in case such district has a burial-ground at the passing of this act." If the act be construed in the manner contended for by the defendants, it will amount to a confiscation of the incumbent's burial fees, where, as here, a parochial chapelry has been divided into districts, and there is therefore no incumbent who is the incumbent of the whole parish. That would be contrary to the object of the act, which was merely to provide new burial-grounds, preserving the rights of the incumbents. It is submitted that "parish" in the 32nd section means "ecclesiastical district," and is not limited in its meaning to a parish maintaining its own poor.

Manisty (Maule with him), for the defendants.—The claims which these incumbents have to the fees in question are purely statutable rights. They have no common law right to them, for the burial-grounds of their respective districts have ceased to be used as such; then, to entitle them to a right to these fees, they must shew a right by statute. Now the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. gives the right to the fees only to the incumbent of the whole parish. The burial-ground which has been provided under that act by the burial board is a burial-ground for the one parish of Barnsley, and not for each district, and such a division into districts as was made here was never contemplated by the legislature. To entitle the plaintiffs to these fees the language of the statute must be altered, and instead of "every incumbent or minister of the parish . . . for which such burial-ground is provided," it must be either "every incumbent or minister of the district," &c., or else "every incumbent," &c., "for whom such burial-ground is provided."

[BYLES, J.—"Incumbent or minister," means incumbent or minister who would have been entitled to his fees had the burials been in the burial-ground of his district. SMITH, J.—He is to have the same rights and fees in respect of burials as he previously enjoyed.]

That is, with respect to the burials of "the inhabitants of the parish of which he is such incumbent." Here neither of these plaintiffs is incumbent of any parish, but only of an ecclesiastical district; neither of them is bound to perform the duties, nor entitled to the fees of burial, in the burial-ground provided under the act.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the incumbent of the district of St. Mary is entitled to the burial fees in respect of the burial of the corpses of the inhabitants of the district of St. Mary; and that the incumbent of the district of St. George is entitled to the burial fees for the burial of the corpses of the inhabitants of either St. George's or St. John's district, if such incumbent perform the burial-services in respect of such burials. Barnsley is a parochial district maintaining its own poor, and so is a parish within the meaning of the statute. There was anciently one burial-ground for the whole parish; but after the districts had been formed there were two burial-grounds, one for St. Mary's and the other for St. George's district, and though there were three places of worship in the parish, yet the burial-ground of St. George's district continued to be used for the inhabitants dying in St. John's district. There were thus two burial-grounds for the parish. Then the board of health established a burial-ground for the parish, and the question is, who is entitled to the fees for burials in the new burial-ground? It seems to me that the 32nd section is capable of the construction which, on behalf of the two incumbents, it has been contended by Mr. Lush it ought to receive. The section says, that "every incumbent or minister of the parish . . . for which such burial-ground is provided," shall "perform the duties and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of religious service in the burial, in such burial-ground, . . . of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the parish of which he is such incumbent or minister, and shall be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he has previously enjoyed and received." Now, reading that section with the interpretation clause, it seems to me that the incumbent of each district having a burial-ground is entitled to the burial fees in the way I have already mentioned. The objection which has been made by Mr. Manisty is this, that "incumbent of the parish" means, in the 32nd section, incumbent of the whole parish, and that each of these two plaintiffs is only incumbent of a portion of the parish, and that therefore no one here answers to the description of incumbent of the whole parish. I think, however, that these two plaintiffs are incumbents within the meaning of the words of the 32nd section in some sense, and that they are entirely within the meaning of the legislature, if one puts, as I do, this construction on the act, viz., that every incumbent of a district having a burial-ground is to have the same rights for the performance of the burial-service and to have the same fees in respect of burials which he previously enjoyed. I couple the fees with the performance of the service, for I think the words of the act of parliament have cast on such incumbent the duty of performing the burial-service as well as have entitled him to the burial fees, and I therefore read the section as if it were "and shall thereupon be entitled to receive the same fees" as before, that is, when he has performed the funeral service in the burial of the remains of such parishioners. It appears to me that the words of the 32nd section extend to cases where a parish has been divided into districts, and that it means that the incumbent or minister of each ecclesiastical district who would have been entitled to a fee in respect of the burial service performed by him in the burial of a body buried in his ecclesiastical district, is to have the same fees he so previously enjoyed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Nobody can doubt the desire of the legislature on passing this statute was, that clergymen should not be deprived of the rights and emoluments they previously had; and, secondly, that the public should have the burial-service performed as before. Therefore it seems to me that, that being clearly the intention of the legislature, we are bound to use some violent construction of the words, if necessary, in order to carry that intention into effect. But I do not think that it is necessary for us here to have recourse to such means. The only violence which it can be suggested is used with respect to the words of the 32nd section is, as to the word "of" in the sentence "every incumbent or minister of the parish." But it is not necessary to use any violence as to that word. One commonly hears the expression of Bishop of the province of &c., but that means not only a bishop resident in such province, but who is otherwise connected with it.

May 8. } MAYOR AND ANOTHER.

Deed—Merger of Simple Contract Debt—Principal and Surety—Time given to Principal Debtor.

The plaintiffs lent M. 650l. on the security of a mortgage of certain property, with a covenant by M. to repay the 650l., with interest at 5l. per cent., on the 22nd of June 1864; and as the mortgage was not a sufficient security for more than 500l., the loan was made on the further security of the promissory note of M. and two sureties for 150l., payable on demand, with interest at 4l. 10s. per cent. The promissory note, which it was agreed between the plaintiffs and M. should be a collateral security to the mortgage-deed, was made and given to the plaintiffs on the 7th of December 1863, when 150l., part of the loan, was advanced to M.; but the mortgage-deed was not executed until the 22nd of December 1863. The deed contained no reference to the note, and the sureties who signed the note were not parties to the deed:—Held, that the debt secured by the note did not merge in the deed, and that, though the remedy on the covenant could not be enforced before the 22nd of June 1864, time was not given to M. so as to discharge the liability of the sureties on the note.

Action by the payees against the makers of a promissory note for 150l., payable on demand, with interest thereon at the rate of 4l. 10s. per cent. per annum during the forbearance.

Pleas—Thirdly, that the defendants made the said note jointly with one Charles Mayor, and that after making the said note and before action the said Charles Mayor satisfied and discharged the said note, and the plaintiffs' claim thereon, by executing to them a deed whereby the said Charles Mayor secured to the plaintiffs and covenanted with the plaintiffs to pay them 650l. and interest, including the amount of the said note, for and on account and in satisfaction and discharge of the said note and the monies therein mentioned, which deed was executed by the said Charles Mayor at the request of the plaintiffs and accepted by the plaintiffs in full satisfaction and discharge of the said plaintiffs' claim on the said note, and that the plaintiffs' claim was and is thereby extinguished, satisfied and discharged.

Fourthly, for defence on equitable grounds, that the defendants made the said note jointly with Charles Mayor as surety to the plaintiffs for the said Charles Mayor, and in consideration of 150*l.* advanced by the plaintiffs for the said Charles Mayor, whereof the plaintiffs had notice before and when they first received the said note, and they, the plaintiffs, received and always held the same on the terms that the defendants should be liable to them on the said note as sureties only for the said Charles Mayor; and that after making the said note and before action the plaintiffs, without the consent of the defendants or of either of them, for a good, valuable and sufficient consideration in that behalf, agreed with the said Charles Mayor to give and then gave him time for the payment of the monies in the said note specified, and thereby discharged the defendants from the said note. Issues thereon.

The following are the facts as they appeared in evidence before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after last Hilary Term. Mr. Charles Mayor, mentioned in the pleas, and who was the son of the elder and the brother of the younger of the two defendants, having occasion to borrow 650*l.*, applied for that purpose to the plaintiffs towards the end of 1863, and offered as security some property to which his wife would become entitled on attaining the age of twenty-five. This was found to be only a sufficient security for 500*l.*, and, according to the account given by the plaintiff Watson, and which the jury found to be the true account of the loan, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and Charles Mayor that, as security for the proposed advance of 650*l.*, there should be a mortgage-deed assigning the wife's interest, and containing a covenant by Charles Mayor and a surety for the repayment of the whole 650*l.*, and that, as a collateral and additional security to the deed, there should be a promissory note by Charles Mayor and two sureties for the payment of 150*l.* on demand. Mr. Charles Mayor accordingly applied to his father and brother, the present defendants, to join him in signing the promissory note, the subject of this action. This they did, and the note was thus made and given to the plaintiffs on the 7th of December 1863, on which day the plaintiffs advanced 150*l.* to Charles Mayor as part of the agreed loan. No interview on the subject ever took place between the plaintiffs and the defendants. On the 22nd of December 1863 the mortgage-deed was executed, and 500*l.*, the balance of the loan, was then paid to Charles Mayor. The deed was made between Charles Mayor and Elizabeth his wife of the first part, William Warren (a surety) of the second part, and the plaintiffs of the third part. It contained no reference whatever to the promissory note, but recited the agreement by the plaintiffs to lend Charles Mayor and his wife 650*l.*, upon having the repayment thereof, with interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, secured by the assignment of the interests of the said Elizabeth Mayor, under a certain will and codicils therein mentioned and of a policy of assurance, and it also recited an agreement by the said Charles Mayor and W. Warren as his surety to enter into certain covenants, and it contained a covenant by the said Charles Mayor and W. Warren for the payment of 650*l.* and interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum on the 22nd of June 1864.

It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the deed discharged the defendants either on the ground that it operated as a merger of the promissory note or because it gave time to the principal debtor for the payment of the debt. Under these circumstances a verdict was entered by consent for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter the verdict for them for the amount claimed, if the Court should be of opinion that in point of law the deed did not so discharge the sureties.

Huddleston afterwards obtained a rule nisi to that effect, citing Ansell v. Baker (1). Against this rule—

Macaulay and Cave now shewed cause.—The effect of this deed was to give time to Charles Mayor, the principal creditor, for the payment of the debt, viz. until the 22nd of June 1864.

[KEATING, J.—The question is whether he might not have been sued on the note before June 1864.]

It is submitted he could not; it is clear that he could not have been sued on the deed before that time, and it is contended that the creditors having taken this security would not have been allowed by a Court of Equity to have enforced their debt against the principal debtor before the 22nd of June.

[SMITH, J.—If the debt be not merged in the deed, an action might be brought on the note against the principal debtor, and does not the case of Sharpe v. Gibbs (2) shew that the deed here does not operate as a merger, as the note is for a different debt?]

It is submitted that the deed operated as a merger of the liability of the principal debtor on the promissory note, and the case of Price v. Moulton (3) is an authority that it would have that operation irrespectively of the intention of the parties. So also was the joint liability of all the makers of the note likewise merged in the deed—King v. Hoare (4), where it was held that a judgment recovered against one of two joint debtors is a bar to an action against the other; and in Bell v. Bankes (5) Maule, J. expressed the opinion that taking security of a higher value from one of two joint debtors would cause a merger. That opinion is cited in King v. Hoare (4), and relied on as one of the grounds for giving judgment in that case. These authorities shew, it is submitted, that there was a merger of the liability of the principal debtor on the note, and that no action could have been brought against him on the note; if so, he was only liable on his covenant, and that could not be enforced until the 22nd of June; consequently, there was a giving time which would discharge the sureties. In Boulbee v. Stubbs (6), where a creditor who had, among other securities, a bond with a surety, took a mortgage from the principal debtor, and agreed to receive the residue by instalments, it was held by Lord Eldon, C. that the creditor's right against the surety was gone, and an injunction was granted against the surety being sued on the bond. So even if Charles Mayor could have been sued at law upon this note, still the effect of the transaction was to give time, at least until the 22nd of June 1864, because until then no Court of Equity would have allowed the creditors to have sued Charles Mayor for any part of the 650*l*. But moreover, it is submitted, the deed is conclusive and can alone be looked to, and that parol evidence to shew that the note was taken by the plaintiffs by way of collateral security is not admissible. Ex parte Glendinning (7), and the opinion of Bailey, J., in Lewis v. Jones (8), are authorities to that effect.

[KEATING, J.—Without parol evidence, how is the deed connected with the note so as to be any defence to an action on the note?]

The money secured by the note is part of the sum secured by the deed.

Huddleston and T. Salter appeared, but were not heard, in support of the rule.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that the rule should be made absolute to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs. The action was upon a joint and several promissory note made by the defendants as sureties for Charles Mayor for the sum of 150*l*. advanced to him as part of a loan of 650*l*., the other 500*l*. being secured by a mortgage of some property, and by a policy of insurance. The mortgage-deed was to comprise the whole 650*l*.; but the mortgage not being a sufficient security for more than 500*l*., Charles Mayor and the lenders agreed that, in addition to the mortgage-deed, there should be a promissory note given for 150*l*. payable on demand with two additional names, these being those of the two Mayors who are the present defendants. The promissory note was made on the 6th of December, and the deed was executed on the 22nd of December, the note being payable on demand, and the deed in June the following year. Then, it is said, that this debt, due from the two sureties who signed the note, is merged in the deed which was executed by Charles

Mayor, one of the makers of the note. I think it is very clear that it was not so merged, because the deed is between different parties for a different sum payable at a different time and with different interest; and I take the case of Sharpe v. Gibbs (2) as sufficient to shew that as between Charles Mayor and the lenders the deed did not merge the promissory note in the specialty. To do so would be utterly contrary to the intention of the parties. Still, if the law was so the law must have its way; but I think, according to the law, that, in this case, as the specialty was not co-extensive with the promissory note, the latter did exist as a collateral security and was not merged. Then, was there time given to Charles Mayor, the principal debtor, so as to operate as a discharge to his sureties? The deed contains a covenant that Charles Mayor will pay in June, that is, six months after the deed was executed, and the promissory note was payable instantly. I think also that the covenant to pay in June operated so as to prevent an action for breach of such covenant before June; but there is no stipulation in such deed that the creditors lending the money would not put in force any other remedy they might have before that time. It seems to me, therefore, that the deed did not operate to give time to the principal so as to discharge the sureties. The cases which have been cited by Mr. Cave about the effect of a mortgage-deed were soundly decided in respect of the facts then before the Court. A Court of equity must give effect to what it considers is the intention of the parties in respect of the mortgage-deed; and so in the present case I think our judgment does give effect to the intention of the parties; and with regard to the admissibility of parol evidence to shew what was the intention of the parties, it was well observed by my Brother Keating, that the promissory note and deed are unconnected with each other without parol evidence to explain the fact of the 150*l.*, the amount of the note, being part of the 650*l.* in the deed; but then when you give, as you must, parol evidence for that purpose, parol evidence becomes admissible to let in the whole matter before the Court. For the reasons I have mentioned, I think this rule should be made absolute.

NEW SERIES, 34.—C.P.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I was at first struck with the argument of Mr. Macaulay; but on full consideration I think our judgment ought to be for the plaintiffs. With respect to the merger, it is now well established that unless the two instruments are co-extensive there is no merger. And as to satisfaction of the note by the deed (which I collect is the purport of the third plea), if the evidence of Mr. Watson be correct, so far from there being any agreement that the deed was to be such satisfaction, it was, on the contrary, agreed that it should not be a satisfaction. Then, with respect to the point about giving time, Mr. Watson's evidence shews that, according to the arrangement between the creditors and the debtor, there was to be no discharge of the sureties in consequence of the deed; and it is sufficient to prevent the discharge of the sureties that there is an agreement to that effect between the principal debtor and the creditors, although the sureties are not parties to it. That is now established, and was recognized to be the law in the recent case of Webb v. Hewitt (9), where Wood, V.C. says, "As to giving time, the authorities, which are almost innumerable, have settled that upon any giving of time to a principal debtor, if there be a reservation of rights against the surety, the surety is not discharged; for when the right is reserved the principal debtor cannot say it is inconsistent with giving him time that the creditor should be at liberty to proceed against the sureties, and that they should turn round upon the principal debtor, notwithstanding the time so given him, for he was a party to the agreement by which that right was reserved to the creditor; and the question whether or not the surety is informed of the arrangement is wholly immaterial."

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons that have been stated. Mr. Cave relied upon the case of Price v. Moulton (3) as an authority that there must be here a merger irrespective of the intention of the parties; but that case does not lay down any such general proposition. In that case the question arose upon a demurrer, and it was admitted on the pleadings that the debt on the simple contract was in every respect co-extensive with the specialty debt, and therefore the Court held that there was there a merger; but I observe in that very case my Brother Williams put the question to my Brother Willes, then at the bar, whether the deed would have operated as a merger if it had expressly stipulated that it should be a collateral security only, and my Brother Willes declined to answer that question. At first I was disposed to adopt Mr. Macaulay's argument, that non-communication to the sureties of the arrangement between Charles Mayor and the plaintiffs would protect the sureties; but then the question was, whether, during the time given by the deed, Charles Mayor could not have been sued. It is clear that he could have been sued, though not on the deed, and therefore no time was given to the principal; and I agree with the rest of the Court that this rule should be made absolute.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears from the evidence that the promissory note was given as a collateral and additional security, and that it was part of the arrangement that such additional security should be so given. Then it is said that the effect of the deed which was subsequently executed was to merge the promissory note; but it is clear that that was not so, according to the case of Sharpe v. Gibbs (2). Then, was time given to the principal debtor on the note? None was given. The principal debtor could have been sued on the note, and, moreover, the understanding between the parties was that the sureties should not be discharged by the deed. I decide this case on legal grounds, but I should be surprised to find a Court of equity coming to a different conclusion. In the case of Wyke v. Rogers (10), where there were written securities, a bond given by a surety, and afterwards a promissory note taken from the principal debtor, and no suggestion of any agreement that the note should be collateral to the bond, the Court of equity referred it to the Master to inquire into the circumstances under which the note was given, and the Master afterwards reported that it was intended by the principal debtor and the creditor at the time the note was given that the surety should not be discharged, and upon that finding the Court held that the surety had no equity.

Rule absolute.

1865. } ROBINSON v. THE SOUTH-WEST-
May 1. } ERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers by Railway—17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7.—Horse—Declaration of Value—Increased Rate of Charge.

Section 7. of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. (Railway and Canal Traffic Act) provides that no greater damages shall be recovered from a railway company for the loss of or injury to a horse than 50l., unless the person sending or delivering the same shall at the time of such delivery have declared it to be of a higher value, in which case it shall be lawful for the company to demand and receive reasonable per-centage upon the excess of the value so declared, and which shall be paid in addition to the ordinary rate of charge:—Held, that the knowledge of the company as to the value of a horse not derived from a declaration to that effect by the sender does not give the company any right to demand an increased rate of charge under the above section.

Held, also, that to entitle the company to demand such increased rate, the declaration must be made with an intention by the sender of the horse that it should so operate.

The first count of the declaration stated that during all the times thereafter referred to, the defendants were common carriers of horses by railway, from their Liss station to their Waterloo station, London. And that before any of the said times the defendants made and published certain conditions upon which alone they declared that they would receive, forward and deliver horses, which conditions had not at any of the said times been rescinded or altered, and which conditions were so published as aforesaid, and contained in a certain printed notice by the defendants published, which notice was as follows:

"Notice as to horses, cattle, &c.—The London and South-Western Railway Company hereby give notice, that they will receive, forward and deliver horses, cattle or other animals, solely on and subject to the following conditions: The company will not be responsible for any loss or injury to any horse, cattle or other animals in the receiving, forwarding or delivering, if such damage be occasioned by the kicking, plunging or unruliness of the same."

(10) 1 De Gex, M. & G. 408; s.c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 611.

"Declaration as to the conveyance of horses, cattle, &c.—In pursuance of an act, 17 & 18 Vict., passed 10th of July 1854, entitled 'An act for the better regulation of the traffic on railways and canals,' it is provided in clause 7, in reference to the liability of railway or canal companies for loss or injury done to any horse, cattle or other animals, that no greater damage shall be recovered for loss of or for any injury done to such animals beyond the sum herein-after mentioned, that is to say,
For any horse . . . £50

For any neat cattle . . . 15 per head.

For any sheep and pigs . . . 2 "

Unless the person sending or delivering the same to such company shall at the time of such delivery, have declared them to be of respectively higher value than as above mentioned, in which case it shall be lawful for such company to demand and receive by way of compensation for the increased risk and care thereby occasioned a reasonable per-centage upon the excess of the value so declared above the respective sums, so limited as aforesaid, and which shall be paid in addition to the ordinary rate of charge. Notice is therefore hereby given, that from and after the date hereof a per-centage of 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will be charged in addition to the usual charge for conveyance, by the London and South-Western Railway, upon any excess in the declared value of horses, cattle or other animals over and above the amounts fixed by the act aforesaid, viz.,

For any horse . . . £50

For any neat cattle . . . 15 per head.

For any sheep or pigs . . . 2 "

And notice is hereby further given, that all declarations of the value of horses or other animals where such value exceeds the above sums respectively, must be signed by the owner thereof, or by his agent, before they can be received by the Company for transmission by the railway. By order of the directors.

"October 5th, 1864."

And that the plaintiff, at a reasonable and proper time in that behalf, tendered to the defendants at their Liss station aforesaid, a mare to be by them carried from their Liss station to their Waterloo station aforesaid, and there delivered for the plaintiff according to the defendants' duty in that behalf, under the circumstances aforesaid, for hire to the defendants in that behalf, requested the defendants to receive, carry and deliver the said mare as aforesaid, and did not declare, or intend to declare, the said mare to be of any higher value than 50 £ ; and the plaintiff was then ready and willing, and offered to pay to the defendants their reasonable hire in that behalf, whereof the defendants then had notice; and the defendants then had sufficient time, means and conveniences to receive, and carry and deliver the said mare as aforesaid, and could and ought to have done so; yet the defendants did not nor would receive and carry the said mare for the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff was put to great costs and charges in and about causing the said mare to be taken from Liss to London, &c.

The defendants pleaded, fourthly, to the said first count, that before and at the time of the tender and delivery of the said mare as alleged, the person sending the same had declared the said mare to be of higher value than 50 £ ., that is to say, of the value of 135 £ ., whereupon the defendants, under and by virtue of the said act mentioned in the said notice, demanded of the person so tendering the said mare as aforesaid, by way of compensation for the increased risk and care occasioned by the said higher value, a per-centage of 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in addition to the usual charges of conveyance, upon the excess in the declared value of the said mare over and above the said sum of 50 £ ., being the amount limited by the act aforesaid, the said per-centage being a reasonable per-centage upon the excess of the value so declared above the said sum so limited as aforesaid. That the person tendering the said mare as aforesaid refused to pay to the defendants the said per-centage, wherefore the defendants refused to receive and carry the said mare, as they lawfully might, for the cause aforesaid. Further, that such per-centage or increased rate of charge was notified in the manner prescribed in the statute 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68.

Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1864, the following facts were proved : In December 1863, a Capt. Mainwaring, on behalf of the plaintiff, negotiated with a Mr. Ayling, of Liss, Hants, for the purchase of a mare. After some negotiation, Ayling ultimately accepted an offer of 135*l.* for the mare, and he received directions to send her by rail to London. This offer and acceptance of 135*l.* passed by telegraph on the defendants' railway, and by that means the station-master at Liss became aware of the value of the mare, and so refused to forward her by rail from Liss to London, unless in addition to 17*s.* 6*d.*, which was the charge for carriage, 4*l.* 5*s.* was also paid for insurance. Ayling communicated this by letter to Capt. Mainwaring, but before the latter received such communication he wrote to a Mr. Norwood, the company's inspector at the Waterloo station, as follows :

"Edmonscott Manor, Warwick, Jan. 3, 1864.

"Sir,—I should feel very much obliged to you to have the goodness to send a careful man who understands horses down to Liss by the last train to-morrow, Monday, to Mr. William Ayling's, there to bring a chestnut mare back to London with him, on Tuesday morning, by first train from Liss, and when he arrives in London take her and put her in the 12 o'clock train with inclosed address on her at King's Cross for York. He must take clothing (two rugs and hood), knee-caps and bridle with him to put on the mare, and be careful of her, as she is a valuable animal. This letter will be a sufficient order for the man to give the mare ; let him take it with him. Will you also pay the man's expenses, and let me know what they are and I will remit you post-office order; the clothing will be returned to you. It may be as well, perhaps, for a horse-box to go from Waterloo, as there may possibly not be one at Liss.

(Signed) "A. Mainwaring."

Upon the receipt of Ayling's note communicating the station-master's account for carriage and insurance, Capt. Mainwaring sent them inclosed in the following letter to inspector Norwood :

"Edmonscott Manor, Warwick, Jan. 4, 1864.

"Sir,—I am sorry to trouble you so much, but the receipt this morning of the note inclosed has placed me in a fix, and I should be very much obliged to you to give instructions to your station-master and to the man who goes to fetch the mare from Liss, that the mare may be sent by the man to-morrow, as directed in my letter to you of yesterday, without insuring her, the expense being so great ; and I must observe that I never heard of a case where a station-master has refused to load a horse unless insured. Are these the instructions on your line? If, however, the man who goes for the mare finds that she is dangerous in the train, or if he finds she has been in before and anything has happened to her through her own vice, then I think she ought to be insured, but not otherwise. Mr. Ayling, the man I bought her of, told me she never had been on the train in her life. I have had horses of 300*l.* and 400*l.* value often by train with nobody with them. I never insured a horse in my life, and never had an accident with one. It appears to me that your station-master at Liss is exceeding his powers. The value of this animal is 135*l.*

"Yours, &c.

(Signed) "A. Mainwaring."

The mare was on the 13th of January 1864 taken to the Liss station and tendered there for conveyance to London, when she was refused to be carried by the company unless the insurance in addition to the regular fare was paid. The mare was afterwards sent by road to London, and the present action was brought, and at the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff on the first count, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them if the Court should be of opinion that there had been a declaration, within the meaning of the statute, that the value of the mare was above 50*l.*

Ballantine, Serj. obtained, in Hilary Term last, a rule nisi to that effect, against which,

Denman and Kingdon now shewed cause.—The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7, after making a railway company liable for neglect in the carriage of horses, &c., notwithstanding notice to the contrary, provides that "no greater damages shall be recovered for the loss of or for any injury done to any such animals" beyond, for any horse, 50*l.*, "unless the person sending or delivering the same to such company shall at the time of such delivery have declared them to be respectively of higher value than as above mentioned, in which case it shall be lawful for such company to demand and receive by way of compensation for the increased risk and care thereby occasioned a reasonable per-centage upon the excess of the value so declared above the respective sums so limited as aforesaid, and which shall be paid in addition to the ordinary rate of charge." The only question in the present case is, whether there was such a declaration made within the meaning of that section as entitled the defendants to claim the charge for insurance. The case of Harrison v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (1) differs from the present, as there the notice was such as to free the company from all liability, unless the value of the animal was declared, whereas the notice here is in the terms of the statute, and is only to free the company from liability beyond the sum of 50*l.*, unless the higher value be declared and paid for. In Peck v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (2) no declaration was made, and the goods were not insured. The case of Hodgman v. the West Midland Railway Company (3) was also a decision on this 7th section of the statute; but it is only of use here as shewing that the plaintiff is entitled to recover no more than 50*l.*, unless the higher value of the horse be declared before either the receipt of the horse by the company or before the injury has occurred. Indeed, there is no case in point, or which is of much use in determining the present question, which is one of fact only. It is submitted that neither the transmission by the telegraph nor the letter of Capt. Mainwaring of the 4th of January 1864 could amount to such a declaration as would satisfy the statute. It is clear that mere knowledge of the carrier as to the value of the article is not enough, but that there must be an express declaration of value made by the sender with the intention that it should be such declaration, in order to satisfy the statute. That was the opinion of Lord Denman in Boys v. Pink (4). Then, as to the letter, it expressly states that the horse is to be sent uninsured, and the value is only given should it in the event there mentioned become necessary to insure. Besides, the declaration, to be within the act, must be made at the time of the delivery of the horse, or if made before it must at least be made with an intention that it should operate at the time of the delivery—Hart v. Bazendale (5).

Ballantine, Serj. and C. W. Wood, in support of the rule.—It is submitted that it is immaterial with what intention the declaration be made, provided it be made in fact. Supposing the company had taken this horse, and had become liable to an action for negligence in respect of an injury to the horse in the course of its carriage, the jury would have found that a knowledge of its value had been brought home to the company or its agents, and it would have been said that there had been a sufficient declaration of its value to entitle the plaintiffs to have recovered beyond the sum of 50*l.* It must perhaps be admitted that the knowledge derived from the telegraph would not have been sufficient had the matter rested there, but Capt. Mainwaring wrote the letter on the 4th of January, and that contained at the end of it a specific declaration of the value of the animal. The intention with which that was written is immaterial; it would have been a sufficient declaration if the sender had said, I don't intend to insure, but I declare the value to be so much. Here, however, there is evidence that Capt. Mainwaring did intend that that should be a declaration of the value. The case of Behrens v. the Great Northern Railway Company (6) decides that if the sender declares the value of the article, the carrier may refuse to carry it unless he be paid the increased rate for carriage to which he may be entitled under the Carriers' Act, 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68, but that if he does not insist on being so paid, and carries it without requiring such increased rate, he is liable then for the full value in case of an injury to it during the journey.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The question is, whether the railway company have made themselves liable to an action for refusing to carry a horse of the plaintiff without payment of an insurance according to its value. They did so refuse, because, as they say, the sender of the horse declared the value of the horse to be greater than 50*l*. The question has turned on one of fact, namely, whether the sender of the horse did or not declare its value to be greater than 50*l*. Now, I am of opinion that the knowledge of the railway company as to the value of the horse, not derived from a declaration to that effect made by the sender, gives no title to the company to demand a higher insurance. The 7th section of the statute protects the company, and it says that they shall not be liable for any injury to a horse conveyed by them on their railway to a greater amount than 50*l*. unless the sender, at the time of sending or delivering the horse, shall declare it to be of a higher value. Knowledge derived not from the declaration of the sender cannot be sufficient to give a right to the insurance money. But here the evidence shews that the company made their claim because the station-master who worked the telegraph had learnt through the telegraph that the actual value of the horse was 135*l*.; and it is clear that that gave the company no right to demand the insurance on a value above 50*l*. The strength of the defendant's case (if any) lies in the letter of the 4th of January, in which Capt. Mainwaring says he intends to send the horse without insurance; but that if the horse is vicious, he is willing to insure it, and states the value of the horse to be 135*l*. I think that the effect of that letter is, "I do not intend to insure, and I mention the value, not with the view of fixing you with a liability, but that if, on account of the horse being vicious, it be insured, the value for that purpose is 135*l*. A declaration would be within the statute if so made as to create a liability on the part of the company to pay the higher value, as well as a liability on the part of the sender to pay the insurance thereon; but here the sender says that he does not intend to insure; but he mentions the value of the horse, and he calls upon the company to take the animal. I cannot find in that a declaration within the statute. If the company had said, "We do not understand what has passed; if you intend to send the horse uninsured as not exceeding the value of 50*l*., say so, and we will take the horse; but unless you say so, we shall consider that you intend to claim the higher value, and must require you, therefore, to pay the insurance on such value." Then, if the sender did not afterwards make it clear that he did not intend to claim the higher value, the company would have been justified in refusing to take the horse without such insurance being paid. On the whole, I am of opinion that there was no such declaration as would come within the meaning of the statute, and that this rule should be discharged.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the Carriers' Act and the Railway Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, the language is the same in substance: in one it is active, and in the other passive; but in both a declaration is required. It is impossible to contend that mere knowledge will do. The declaration must come from the sender, and must be so expressed as to be understood by the carrier as such, and, as I think, understood also as the foundation of a contract. Now, here it does not appear that it was so understood; and it is clear from the events which have happened that it was not intended that it should be so understood. The case of Behrens v. the Great Northern Railway Company (6) is no authority for the defendants, because in that case the company signed a receipt for the package as one containing a picture declared to be over the value of 110*l*. I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There was no such declaration here as would entitle the company to claim insurance before receiving the horse. I agree with the rest of the Court that the declaration to be within the statute must be made with an intention that it should so operate as to entitle the company to charge the higher rate. Here the facts do not amount to anything of the kind. The knowledge of the station-master through the telegraph is no more than if he had overheard a conversation as to the bargain for the horse. What, however, is chiefly relied on is the letter from Capt. Mainwaring. It is plain that in writing that letter to the inspector, Capt. Mainwaring was writing to him very much as if he were writing to his own agent. He tells him to insure in a certain event, that is, if he finds the horse vicious; and the person who is to determine that is the man who is to be sent down by the inspector, and as it would be necessary for the inspector when he sends the man down to tell him the value of the horse, so that he might be able to declare the value if he should find it necessary to insure, he is told that in that case the value is 135*l*. It is a question of fact; and, upon the whole, I think that there was no such declaration in this case as is required by the statute, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

KRATING, J.—As I did not hear the whole of the argument, I ought not to take any part in the judgment; but I may say that, so far as I have heard, I concur entirely in what has been said by the rest of the Court.

1865. } HEARD AND ANOTHER v. HOL-
May 2. } MAN AND ANOTHER.

Contract, Construction of.

The plaintiffs were owners of ship W. and one M. of ship G, which was insured in two companies, one of which was represented by the defendants, the other by M. himself. The G. ran into the W, and was arrested in the Admiralty Court; and an agreement was entered into by the plaintiffs, M, and the insurers, that the plaintiffs should release the ship, and the other parties should pay "the amount of damage which the ship W. had received from the collision," and that in case of dispute about "the amount of damages claimed by Heard Brothers (the plaintiffs) by reason of the collision," the matter should be referred:—Held, that "ship" in the first clause must be read "owner of ship," and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for loss of profits as they would have done in the Admiralty Court.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a ship called the Westward Ho, and one Mitcheson the owner of a ship called the Grenfells, in respect of which he was insured (amongst other things) against damage or loss, by contract, which she might do to others), in two mutual insurance associations, viz. the Sunderland Insurance Clubs (managed by himself), and the Western Insurance Clubs of Topsham (managed by the defendants). The Grenfells ran down the Westward Ho, and the plaintiffs thereupon had the Grenfells arrested in the Court of Admiralty. An agreement was thereupon entered into between the plaintiffs of the first, Mitcheson of the second, the defendants on behalf of the Western Insurance Clubs of the third, and Mitcheson on behalf of the Sunderland Insurance Clubs of the fourth parts. It recited that the plaintiffs owned the Westward Ho and Mitcheson the Grenfells; that the latter had run into and injured the former and been arrested, and that on application of the parties of the second, third, and fourth parts the plaintiffs had agreed to release the Grenfells on the therein contained conditions. And it then witnessed, that the parties mutually agreed that the plaintiffs should forthwith release the Grenfells from arrest, and that in consideration thereof the parties of the second, third, and fourth parts, or some or one of them, would pay to the plaintiffs the amount of damage which the said ship Westward Ho has received from the said collision, and that the whole of the parties of the second, third, and fourth parts should be, in proportion to their respective interests, liable to pay the said amount of damages, and also the costs of the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty against the ship. And it was further agreed, that if any dispute or difference should arise between the plaintiffs and the other parties, or any of them, with respect to the amount of damages claimed by the said Heard Brothers (the plaintiffs) by reason of the said collision, the amount should be referred to the award and determination of W. R., whose decision should be final. And it was provided that the agreement might be made a rule of Court. The amount was eventually referred to W. R., and a question arose as to whether, under the terms of the agreement, the plaintiffs were entitled to claim recompense for the loss of freight. The arbitrator separately assessed the amount of such loss, and its payment was resisted, whereupon this action was brought to recover it and raise the said question.

A verdict was entered at the trial for the plaintiffs for 519*l.*, with leave for the defendants to move to set aside the verdict and enter a verdict for the defendants, or a nonsuit, on the ground that the defendants were only liable for the damage which the Westward Ho sustained by the collision, and not for further damages sustained by the plaintiffs in respect of the detention of the Westward Ho.

A rule nisi having been obtained by Mellish, pursuant to the said leave reserved, Lush and Watkin Williams now shewed cause on behalf of the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs could have recovered these damages in the Court of Admiralty, and they clearly did not intend to give up this right; there was no reason for doing so; and the words "amount of damage claimed by Heard Brothers by reason of the collision" shew this.

Mellish and T. Jones, in support of the rule.—The words "the amount of damage which the said ship Westward Ho has received from the said collision," are conclusive.

ERLE, C.J.—The question here is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the same compensation as they would have got in the Admiralty Court, where the ship Grenfells was detained. I am of opinion that they are entitled to the same sum, i. e., to the amount of the repairs rendered necessary by the damage from the collision and compensation for the loss of profits which but for the collision the plaintiffs would have obtained. The agreement recites that it was agreed to release the Grenfells from the Court of Admiralty. Have the plaintiffs given up their rights against the ship? It is said they have, because the agreement says "the amount of damage which the said ship Westward Ho has received from the said collision," but it is not straining the language to hold that this means "which the owners of the ship have received." That is, the amount of damage which the ship has sustained. Further, we find the words "amount of damages claimed by the said Heard Brothers by reason of the said collision;" and, again, the policies provide for damage or loss by contact which any insured ship may do to others, and "loss by contact" is loss of profits.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what is the meaning of the word "ship"? If the strict meaning is to be taken, then, although the costs of suit and matters both precedent and subsequent to the loss of profits may be recovered, the loss of profits which intervenes cannot. We must construe the word "ship" to mean "owner of ship" to carry out the intention of the parties.

KEATING, J.—It is plain what was meant when the state of circumstances is regarded. The Grenfells was detained in the Admiralty Court, and the plaintiffs might have recovered this sum. They give up everything in consideration of this agreement, and it is hardly conceivable that they intended to part with this right. If the agreement is susceptible of the construction contended for by the plaintiffs, we must so construe it.

SMITH, J.—We must see what the circumstances were under which the agreement was entered into, and look at the context. Great injustice would be done by giving any other construction. There can be no doubt as to the meaning. It was meant that all damages which could be recovered in the Admiralty Court should be recovered.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

 Feb. 13, 14 ; } ROBERTS v. BRETT.
 March 16. }

Contract—Condition Precedent—Mutual Covenants—“Forthwith,” Meaning of.

By indenture of the 15th of May, the plaintiff covenanted with the defendant to procure a ship to stow on board a certain telegraphic cable then lying at M. Wharf, to provision and rig the vessel, to provide and pay the crew and workmen, &c., to lay down the cable, and that he, the plaintiff, would perform the several acts aforesaid and have the ship ready equipped for sea at the Nore on or before the 15th of July, and would proceed forthwith to T. and lay down the cable; and if the plaintiff made default in having the ship ready with the cable on board at the Nore by the 15th of July, the defendant might deduct and retain as liquidated damages 20l. a week. The defendant covenanted, subject to his right to deduct and retain as liquidated damages, to pay the plaintiff 5,000l., by instalments, that is to say, 1,000l., part thereof, on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the ship at M. Wharf; 2,000l., further part, on or before twenty-one days after the arrival of the ship at the wharf; the remainder when the ship should put to sea from the Nore. And it was by the same indenture agreed and declared, that for the true performance of the covenants by the plaintiff thereinbefore contained, and for securing the penalties which he might incur under these presents, the plaintiff and two responsible sureties should, within ten days of the execution of these presents, give and execute to the defendant, his executors and administrators, a bond in the penal sum of 5,000l.; and for the due performance of the covenants on the part of the defendant thereinbefore contained, the defendant and two responsible sureties should, within ten days from the execution of these presents, give and execute to the plaintiff, his executors and administrators, a bond in the penal sum of 5,000l.

It was held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that the giving of the bond with sureties by the plaintiff to the defendant was a condition precedent to his right to recover against the defendant for not performing his part of the contract with relation to stowing the cable and paying the money; and this decision was affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal, and it was also held that the plaintiff was not released from his obligation to give a bond by reason of the defendant not having given a bond.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, the appellant, a captain in Her Majesty's Royal Marine Artillery, against the defendant, the respondent, the gérant in this country of a joint-stock company established in France, called the Mediterranean Submarine Electric Telegraph Company, to recover damages for a breach of an agreement under seal entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 15th of May 1855, for the laying down by the plaintiff of 150 miles of submarine telegraph cable, called in the agreement “The African and Sardinian Cable,” and which cable the plaintiff undertook to lay down between Cape Tabague, on the northern coast of Africa, and Cape Spartivento, in the island of Sardinia. The agreement, or so much thereof as is material to the present proceedings, is set out in the declaration in the action, which will be found in the report of the case in the Court of Common Pleas, 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 280, but was shortly as follows:

By the agreement the plaintiff was bound forthwith, at his own expense, to procure a frigate called the Cornwall, or some other suitable ship or vessel, and to stow the cable on board, and which cable was in the agreement expressly stated to be then lying at Morden's Wharf, East Greenwich; the plaintiff was also bound, at his own expense, to rig, complete, fit out, provide and provision the said ship, with all things necessary, as set forth in the agreement, and to pay 600l. towards insuring the cable for 60,000l. The agreement then stated that the plaintiff was to have the ship ready for sea at the Nore on the 15th of July then next; and in the event of the plaintiff failing to have the ship fully equipped at the Nore on or before that day, the defendant was to be at liberty to retain out of any monies payable to the plaintiff under the agreement 200*l.* a week as liquidated damages for every week, and so in proportion for less than a week of such default. The defendant covenanted to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 5,000*l.*, as follows : 1,000*l.* on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the ship at Morden's Wharf; the sum of 2,000*l.*, further part thereof, on or before the expiration of twenty-one days after the ship should have arrived alongside Morden's Wharf, and the sum of 2,000*l.*, the remainder of the said sum of 5,000*l.*, as soon as the said ship should have proceeded to sea from the Nore; and besides these money payments the plaintiff was to have 500 10*l.* paid-up shares in the said company delivered to him.

By the agreement it was also agreed and declared, that for the true performance of the covenants by the plaintiff, and for securing any penalties which he might incur, the plaintiff and two responsible sureties should, within ten days after the execution of the agreement, give and execute to the defendant a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*; and that for the due performance of the covenants on the part of the defendant, the defendant and two sureties should, within ten days from the execution of the agreement, give and execute to the plaintiff a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*; and that the said bonds so to be given should not in any manner prejudice or affect the respective rights or liabilities of the plaintiff or of the defendant under or by virtue of the agreement.

The plaintiff, in his declaration, after setting out the agreement and averring performance of all conditions precedent, alleged as breaches of the agreement, that before the time arrived for the plaintiff to bring his ship alongside Morden's Wharf for the purpose of taking the cable on board, the defendant refused to perform his contract, and dispensed with the said ship being brought alongside the said wharf, and would not stow the cable on board the ship, but caused the same to be stowed on board another ship, and thereby prevented the plaintiff from completing the said contract on his part. There was also a further breach assigned, that the defendant did not, in pursuance of the covenant on his behalf in the said agreement contained, give a bond with sureties to the plaintiff in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*

The defendant pleaded—

1. That the plaintiff did not procure a suitable ship.

2. That the plaintiff did not rig, complete, fit out and provision her.

3. That the plaintiff was not ready and willing to provide and pay officers, and crew, and workmen.

4. That the plaintiff did not give a bond with two sureties to the defendant in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*

5. And, in answer to the breach respecting the defendant not giving his bond to the plaintiff, the defendant paid into court the sum of 1*s.*

Upon the first three and fifth pleas issues in fact were raised, and to the fourth there was a demurrer: the question raised by the demurrer being, whether or not the performance by the plaintiff of the covenants on his part set out in the declaration, "That for the true performance of the covenants by the plaintiff hereinbefore mentioned, and for securing any penalties which he might incur under these presents, the plaintiff and two responsible sureties should, within ten days from the execution of these presents, give and execute to the defendant a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*," was a condition precedent to the obligation of the defendant to perform those covenants on his part, to the breach of which the fourth plea was pleaded.

The demurrer came on to be argued in the Court of Common Pleas, on the 10th of June 1856, when the Court gave judgment for the defendant.

The report of the case upon this demurrer is to be found in 18 Com. B. Rep. 561, and in 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 280.

On the 28th of June 1858, the issues in fact came on for trial before the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas and a special jury. The jury found that the plaintiff did procure a suitable ship, properly equipped, according to the contract, and was ready to provide the officers and crew, and found all the issues in fact in favour of the plaintiff, and they assessed the damages which the plaintiff had sustained at 2,300*l.*

The plaintiff having obtained this verdict for the 2,300*l.*, and which verdict was not disturbed, then appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber against the decision of the Court of Common Pleas on the demurrer, when the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was unanimously affirmed.

The report of the proceedings in the Exchequer Chamber is to be found in 6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 611, and in 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 323.

It will be seen by reference to these reports of the case, that after the argument on the demurrer in the Court of Common Pleas there was a slight amendment in the original declaration; but which was not of importance to the present question. The plea demurred to was not amended in any way, and the pleadings went before the Exchequer Chamber as set out in the report of the proceedings in the Exchequer Chamber.

This was an appeal to the House of Lords against the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber upon the fourth plea.

Bovill and Massey Dawson (Beasley with them), for the appellant.—It was never intended that the giving of the bonds should be a condition precedent to the contract being binding on either party. Where parties stipulate to have bonds as a condition precedent, they would wait till the bonds were given, and they were satisfied with the sureties before signing the contract, which was not done in this case. The contract also is, that the appellant is forthwith to do certain things, that is, before the expiration of the ten days within which the bonds are to be given. There is nothing in the contract to shew that anything was not to be done till after the bonds were given. The appellant might have brought the ship alongside the wharf, or offered to take the cable on board at any hour after the signing of the contract, and the respondent would have been bound within seven days to pay the 1,000*l.*, the first instalment of the 5,000*l.* If there is a thing that is to be done, or may have to be done before the act which is relied upon as a condition precedent is to be performed, then it cannot be a condition precedent—Pordage v. Cole (1). The intention of the parties must be looked at to see whether they intended that the thing should be a condition precedent or not. It would lead to the most absurd consequences to hold this to be a condition precedent. The question is whether the fourth plea is a good plea. It is not, for the respondent should have requested the bond from the appellant, and must shew that he was ready to do the concurrent act on his part, which this plea does not allege. Where there are several stipulations in a contract, some of which have been performed and some of which have not been performed, the non-performance of those that remain will not afford an answer to a breach of contract by the other party—Stavers v. Curling (2), Boone v. Eyre (3). The not giving of the bond in the present case may be compensated in damages. The consequence of holding the giving of the bond to be a condition precedent in this case would lead to the greatest injustice. The appellant having established a claim for 2,300*l.* before a jury, would be unable to obtain it on account of this plea. The matter omitted to be done was not the consideration for what was to be performed on the other side. The giving of the bonds was an independent stipulation. The matter which has not been performed must go to the whole consideration—Tarrabochia v. Hickie (4), Kingdon v. Cox (5), Clipham v. Vertue (6). Where a time is fixed for performance, as in the present case, the procuring of the ship by the appellant, the money must be paid, whether the other stipulations, as the giving of the bond in the present case, have or have not been complied with, and on the ground that there may be a remedy by cross-action—Campbell v. Jones (7), Mattock v. Kinglake (8), Dicker v. Jackson (9). The appellant alleges that there was a positive breach by the respondent before the time arrived when the bond was to be given, from which the respondent must absolve himself—Hochster v. Delatour (10), Lovelock v. Franklin (11), Cort v. the Ambergate Railway Company (12), Ellen v. Topp (13) and Graves v. Legg (14), relied on by the respondent in the Court below, are distinguishable from the present case. There is a contract entered into at once without the bonds being given; there has been a part performance, and the giving of the bonds is not a condition precedent. We also rely upon the stipulation that the giving of the bonds was not to prejudice the rights and liabilities of the parties. The declaration is a good declaration, and the plea is a bad plea. They also referred to Helm v. Burness (15), Short v. Stone (16) and 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 11, notes.

Mellish and H. Lloyd, for the respondent.—It was a condition precedent to the respondent's liability to stow the cable on board the ship provided by the appellant that the appellant should have given his bond. This is a question of construction, and the instrument is to be construed for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the parties. The cases cited on the other side shew this. The giving of the bond in the present case was intended to be a condition precedent; if it is not a condition precedent, and the only remedy is in damages, the intention is frustrated. The word "forthwith" is a general and vague word, and only means that it is to be done with reasonable despatch and in a reasonable time. It does not follow, because the giving of the bond is a condition precedent at one time, that it would remain so if the cable had once been loaded on board—Boone v. Eyre (3); but that is not the case here. Here, both parties having failed to give the bond, either party is at liberty to rescind the contract, because that is carrying out the object of the contract. They might mutually have agreed to go on with the contract, notwithstanding the failure to give the bond; but they did not do so. The declaration contains no averment that the appellant was ready and willing to give the bond, and that the respondent before the expiration of ten days refused to perform the contract and dispensed with the bond. If the declaration had contained such an averment, a plea alleging that the appellant had not given the bond would have been bad; but the declaration contains no such averment. The declaration simply alleges that the appellant has performed all the conditions precedent, and amongst others he has given the bond, and this is traversed. The cases cited by the other side are totally different from the present. The true construction of the clauses here is, that the respondent cannot be called on to carry out his part of the agreement, unless the appellant has within ten days given his bond. There was no necessity for a demand of it. Upon the question of pleading, upon the true construction of the declaration, the appellant alleges that he performed all the conditions precedent, therefore that he gave the bond. The plea is a good plea; it says that he did not give the bond. By demurring to that plea and not traversing it, the appellant admits that if the giving of the bond is a condition precedent, he did not comply with that condition; in Hochster v. Delatour (10) it is true there is not the allegation which in order to make the declaration complete there ought to be, but the question there arose on a motion in arrest of judgment, and it is a well-known distinction between a question so arising and one arising on a demurrer that every fair inference is to be taken for the plaintiff when the question so arises, and that small imperfections in his declaration will be looked over. But for that, there ought to have been an averment there that the plaintiff accepted the refusal as an absolute breach, and acted upon it—Avery v. Bowden (17).

Massey Dawson, in reply, cited Bentley v. Davies (18) with regard to the effect of the general averment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD WESTBURY).—My Lords, the question on this appeal is, whether, having regard to the true construction and intent of the agreement of the 15th of May 1855, the stipulation that the appellant should, within ten days after the date and execution of the agreement, give a bond, with sureties, for the due performance of the covenants on his part, is a condition the previous fulfilment of which, unless waived or released, was necessary to enable the appellant to maintain any action upon the agreement. The case has been learnedly argued at the bar, and many decisions were cited; but the question depends on simple principles. First, having regard to the subject-matter of the agreement between the appellant and the respondent, who was the representative of a company, it is reasonable to suppose that the company, who were about to intrust the appellant with the laying down of a very valuable telegraphic cable, should require from the appellant security for the due fulfilment of his contract; and the requisition that the bond should be given within ten days is sufficient to shew that it was intended to precede any material action under the agreement. The appellant indeed contends, that if he had brought the Cornwall frigate, or some other suitable vessel, alongside Morden's Wharf on the day of the date of the agreement, or the next day, the sum of 1,000*l.* would have been payable to him by the respondent within a week afterwards; and thus he insists that a material part of the contract might have been performed before the expiration of the ten days allowed for the bond, and that therefore the giving of the bond is not a condition precedent. I cannot think that any such great expedition, if it was possible, was contemplated by the parties, or that the appellant was bound to act with any such rapidity. His engagement is, that he will forthwith at his own expense procure the Cornwall frigate, or some other suitable ship or vessel, for the purpose required; the word "forthwith" does not necessarily imply that this was to be done by the appellant before he had received the bond of the respondent and his sureties, that is, before the expiration of ten days. But if the appellant had brought a suitable vessel alongside the wharf so expeditiously as to have entitled himself to the sum of 1,000*l.*, and had received that sum (which must be the hypothesis) within the ten days, and before the time for giving his bond expired, I should not have thought that it affected his liability to give the bond within the appointed time. It is urged that in the state of things supposed the 1,000*l.* might not have been paid as stipulated, and so a breach of covenant by the respondent might have occurred within the ten days. If it did, I should still be of opinion that the appellant was bound to give or tender his bond to the respondent within the prescribed time. The right to have the security of two responsible sureties for the performance of the appellant's covenant was a very material thing to the respondent's company and of the essence of the contract, and I do not think it could be affected by anything voluntarily done by the appellant within the ten days.

It was also contended, by the appellant, that the covenants to give the bonds by the appellant and respondent respectively were mutual covenants dependent one on the other; and that there was no default by the appellant until that instant of time at which there was a like default by the respondent, and that the respondent, being in like default, could not defend himself by pleading the default of the appellant. But I fear that this is not the true meaning and effect of the contract. The engagements to give the bond are not entered into in consideration one of the other; but the fulfilment of his own engagement by each of the parties is a necessary preliminary to his right to recover on the agreement. It is the true intent and object of the agreement that each party should find security within the time prescribed. If this be not done by either party, both may be in effect released from the contract, which may fall to the ground; but neither party can recover for breach of the covenants in the agreement unless he has performed this precedent obligation. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, I think that the judgment of the House ought to be for the defendant in error. I agree with the opinions of the learned Judges that the giving of the bond must have been intended to be a condition precedent to any right of action for breach of any of the covenants contained in the indenture. On any other hypothesis the bond would be useless. No doubt, as there was a covenant by each party with the other, to give a bond with sureties within ten days, if default was made in giving a bond, a right of action would accrue for breach of that covenant; but such an action could produce no fruit to the party recovering in it. If brought before breach of any of the other covenants, it could only result in nominal damages. If brought after a breach, no damages could be recovered, except such as would have been recoverable in an action founded on the breach itself. It would give no right against any sureties, the obtaining of which right was the sole object of the bond. It was argued that the circumstance that the bonds were to be given not immediately, but within ten days, was inconsistent with the hypothesis of a condition precedent. A breach, it was suggested, might occur within the ten days, and so a right of action might accrue, before any bond need have been given. This does not appear to me inconsistent with the hypothesis of a condition precedent. Probably the parties knew that, practically, no breach could occur within the ten days; but even if that is not so, the party injured by a breach of covenant within ten days might, by giving his bond, put himself in a condition to sue for the breach, for it would certainly be no answer on the part of the defendant sued for the breach to say, that he had not given his bond. Suppose, for instance, that the plaintiff had on the day of the date of the indenture moored a proper ship alongside Morden's Wharf, but that after the expiration of seven days, the defendant refused to pay him the 1,000*l*. The plaintiff, if he had given a proper bond with sureties to the defendant, would then have been in a condition to maintain an action for breach of covenant against the defendant, whether he had or had not given a proper bond to the plaintiff.

But it was argued, that even assuming the giving of the bonds to be conditions precedent, still they must be treated as mutual and dependent conditions, and that the defendant, who had given no bond to the plaintiff, could not insist on the want of such a bond from him.

I do not feel the force of this argument. There is nothing in the indenture making it obligatory on either party to apply to the other for his bond. By giving the required bond, the party giving it puts himself in a condition of enforcing, if he thought fit, the performance of the covenants. If neither party, as was the case here, gave any bond, neither party could sue for any breach of covenant. This was the opinion of the Courts below, and in that view of the case I concur.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with the decision in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas.

The question is, whether the fourth plea is an answer to the action; or, in other words, whether the giving the bond by the plaintiff was a condition precedent to his right to recover damages from the defendant for his non-fulfilment of his part of the agreement.

The only parts of the deed necessary to be noticed are, first, the covenants of the plaintiff, that he would forthwith, at his own expense, procure the Cornwall frigate, or some other suitable ship or vessel, and should and would stow or cause to be stowed on board the said ship or vessel the Submarine Telegraphic cable, which was 150 miles in length or thereabouts, and was then at Morden's Wharf, East Greenwich, and should do various acts in fitting out and provisioning the ship or vessel, and providing sufficient officers and crew, and should and would do and perform all the several acts thereafter covenanted to be performed by him the plaintiff, and have the said ship fully equipped in all respects, and ready for sea, at the Nora, on or before the 15th of July then next; secondly, the covenants of the defendant to pay the plaintiff 5,000*l*. by the instalments and at the times thereafter mentioned, that is to say, the sum of 1,000*l*. on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the said ship or vessel alongside Morden's Wharf aforesaid, and the sum of 2,000*l*. on or before the expiration of twenty-one days after the said ship should have arrived alongside Morden's Wharf aforesaid, and the sum of 2,000*l*., the remainder thereof, when and so soon as the said ship should put to sea from the Nore; and, lastly, the stipulation for mutual bonds, in these terms: "And it is hereby agreed and declared, that for the true performance of the covenants by the plaintiff hereinbefore contained, and for securing any penalties which he may incur under these presents, the plaintiff and two responsible sureties shall, within ten days from the execution of these presents, give and execute to the defendant a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*; and for the due performance of the covenants on the part of the defendant hereinbefore contained, the defendant and two responsible sureties shall, within ten days from the execution of these presents, give and execute to the plaintiff a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*"

The learned counsel for the plaintiff argued that the covenant on the part of the plaintiff to give the bond could not be intended to be a condition precedent, because he was forthwith bound to procure the ship or vessel; so that he was to do an act before the ten days had expired within which the bond was to be given; and also that the defendant having covenanted to pay the plaintiff 1,000*l.* on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the ship or vessel at Morden's Wharf, and the money being appointed to be paid on a day which might happen before the expiration of the ten days within which the bond was to be given, the giving of the bond could not be a condition precedent, according to the first rule upon the subject of dependent and independent covenants laid down in the notes to Portage v. Cole (1). They also contended that the case fell within the third rule stated in these notes, as it was a covenant going only to part of the consideration, the breach of which might be paid for in damages. These rules are not proposed for the purpose of absolutely determining the dependence or independence of covenants in all cases, but merely as furnishing a guide to the discovery of the intention of the parties. For, as Lord Kenyon said, in Porter v. Shepherd (19), "Conditions are to be construed to be either precedent or subsequent, according to the fair intention of the parties, to be collected from the instrument; and technical words (if there be any to encounter such intention) should give way to that intention."

Now, what may fairly be considered to have been the intention of the parties upon the whole scope and object of the deed in question? Putting the agreement into a short form, it amounts to this: the defendant says to the plaintiff, "In consideration of your doing certain acts, and giving me a bond, with sureties, to secure the performance of your covenants to do these acts, I will pay you a sum of 5,000*l.* and give you a bond with sureties to secure the payment." And the plaintiff, on the other hand, covenants to do the acts and to give the bond in consideration of the performance by the defendant of the covenants on his part to be performed.

Upon this short summary of the deed there could scarcely be a doubt that either party might refuse to perform his part of the agreement, until he was secured by the bond of the other.

But the counsel for the plaintiff say, that the particular terms of the deed shew that this could not be the intention. In particular they laid great stress on the word "forthwith," in the plaintiff's covenant, to procure the vessel, which they interpreted to mean "immediately," and they urged this as a proof that the giving the bonds could not be meant to be conditions precedent, because this act of the plaintiff must necessarily have been done before the expiration of the ten days, to the last moment of which the defendant was at liberty to delay the execution of the bond. And they also insisted upon the clause for payment by the defendant of 1,000*l.* before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the vessel at Morden's Wharf, which might have happened within the ten days; and therefore they argued that the case in both these respects was within the first rule in the notes to Portage v. Cole (1).

It appears to me that too great force was attributed to the word "forthwith" in the agreement, and that all that was meant by it was that the plaintiff was, without delay or loss of time, to procure a suitable vessel for receiving the telegraphic cable. And to quicken his diligence the defendant covenanted to pay him 1,000*l.* within seven days after the arrival of the vessel at Morden's Wharf. Out of regard to his own interest, too, the plaintiff would use all expedition in commencing the performance of the agreement, because, unless he had the vessel with the cable on board equipped and ready for sea by the 15th of July, he would have been liable to pay 200*l.* per week for his default. I think that the plaintiff could not have been compelled to take a single step, nor to incur the smallest expense towards procuring the vessel, till he was secured by having the defendant's bond; and that if he chose to proceed without having this security, everything he did was at his own peril. If the defendant wished to obtain the plaintiff's progress within the ten days, he might have executed and delivered his bond, and then he would have performed all that was required of him till the first instalment of the 5,000*l.* became due.

It is a strong circumstance indicative of the intention of the parties, that the stipulations with respect to the mutual bonds should be conditions precedent, that these stipulations follow all the covenants entered into on both sides, and that they are agreed and declared to be given "for the true performance of the covenants hereinbefore contained." They are obviously intended, therefore, to be mutual securities for the performance of all the covenants by each of the parties respectively. This, I think, takes away all ground for saying that the covenants for giving the bonds go only to part of the consideration, and that a breach of them may be paid for in damages. Though, strictly speaking, they enter into and form part of the consideration on both sides, yet they extend to the whole of the covenants contained in the deed, and are an essential and vital part of the agreement between the parties. Nor is it easy to see how a breach of them could be compensated in damages, or what estimate could be formed of the measure of damages for their non-fulfilment.

I do not think that anything in favour of the plaintiff can be made of the circumstance of the defendant not having given his bond. It appears to me that the mutual default of the parties had the effect of virtually putting an end to the agreement, because neither of them was in a situation to insist upon performance by the other.

A supposed case was put at the bar, of the plaintiff, after the ten days had expired without his bond having been given, going on to perform his covenants, and afterwards in an action to recover the amount stipulated to be paid by the defendant, being met by a plea of the non-performance of the condition precedent. I have no difficulty in saying that in such a case the party who may avail himself of the non-performance of a condition precedent, but who allows the other side to go on and perform the subsequent stipulations, has waived his right to insist upon the unperformed condition precedent, as an answer to the action.

Looking to the whole of the deed, I am satisfied that it was the intention of the parties that each should receive from the other a bond as a security for the performance of the covenants before either was bound to proceed to perform any of the stipulations contained in the deed. For these reasons I think the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Game—Trespass in Pursuit of Game—Aiding and abetting—Evidence.

In support of an information, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. s. 5, against A. for aiding and abetting B. to commit the offence of trespass in pursuit of game, there was evidence that A. drove B. in a conveyance along a turnpike-road for a lawful purpose; that the conveyance was afterwards stopped, when B. got out and entered a field and shot a hare, which he gave to A. on returning to the conveyance, and A. then drove along the road:—Held, that there was evidence on which the Justices might find A. guilty of the offence so charged.

1865. } HUNT AND ANOTHER v.
April 24, 25. } HARRIS.

Metropolitan Buildings Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122.)—Party-Wall, Expense of Repairing—"Owner."

The lessee of a house for a long term of years, who has underlet it in different portions to different tenants, and who is in receipt of the rents from such underlettings, is the "owner" of the party-wall of such house within the meaning of the Metropolitan Buildings Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), notwithstanding the underlettings create a greater interest in the under-tenants than that of a yearly tenancy, and he is liable as such owner to pay to the adjoining owner a proportion of the expenses incurred by the latter in repairing the wall in obedience to the requisition of the Commissioners of Sewers made under that act.

This was an action to recover the sum of 86*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, as the defendant's proportion of expenses in respect of repairing a party-wall, situate on the west side of premises No. 37, Eastcheap, and on the east side of premises No. 38, Eastcheap, in the city of London. The party-wall being in a dangerous state, on the 16th of June 1863 the Commissioners of Sewers, acting under the powers given them by the clauses relating to dangerous structures in the Metropolitan Buildings Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, gave notice to both the plaintiffs and defendant, as the owners or occupiers of such party-wall to pull it down and have it repaired. In compliance with this notice, the plaintiffs, who occupied the premises No. 38, Eastcheap, did what was so required; and at the trial, before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1864, the only question in dispute which it is now necessary to notice was, whether the defendant was owner of the premises No. 37, Eastcheap, within the meaning of the said Metropolitan Buildings Act, and therefore liable as adjoining owner to pay the plaintiffs the amount sought to be recovered in this action. With respect to this question it appeared the defendant held the premises No. 37, Eastcheap, for a long term of years under a lease from the freeholder, and that he had underleased the ground-floor of the premises to a Mr. Collins, for twenty-one years, and had let the two upper-floors to a Mr. Berridge, under a written agreement, not under seal, for a term of seven years and a half, from November 1861, and that he was in receipt of rent in respect of both these underlettings. It did not appear whether the rest of the house was let by the defendant or not, but he did not himself occupy it.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it was contended that the defendant was "owner" within the meaning of the act, and that the underletting to Berridge did not give a greater legal interest to Berridge than that of a yearly tenancy, and therefore was not sufficient to prevent the defendant from being such "owner."

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, and the defendant afterwards, pursuant to leave reserved, obtained a rule nisi to set such verdict aside, and to enter instead a verdict for the defendant or a nonsuit, on the ground, inter alia, that the defendant was not liable, inasmuch as he had underlet all the premises for a greater term than a tenancy from year to year.

Coleridge and Day shewed cause.—The defendant would be liable as an adjoining owner within the meaning of the act, even if he had let all the premises for a greater term than a yearly tenancy. The interpretation clause, section 3, of the act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122.) states that "owner" "shall apply to every person in possession or receipt either of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement, or in the occupation of such land or tenement other than as a tenant from year to year, or for any less term, or as a tenant at will." Section 82, with reference to the provisions relating to party structures (and a wall is such,—see section 69), defines a "building owner" as "one of the owners of the premises separated by or adjoining any party structure as is desirous of executing any work in respect of such party structure," and calls "the owner of the other premises the adjoining owner"; and section 88. makes provision for expenses to be borne jointly by the building owner and adjoining owner, and states that, "if any party structure is defective or out of repair, the same shall be borne by the building owner and adjoining ing owner in due proportion, regard being had to the use that each owner makes of such structure." Here the defendant is shewn to be in the receipt of the whole of the rents and profits issuing out of the adjoining premises, and he therefore comes within the words of the first part of section 3. The case of Mourilyan v. Labalmondiere (1) is distinguishable from the present. There the appellants, who were seised in fee of the building, had let it on lease for a term of years to one person, who was in occupation of the whole building, and therefore such lessee and not the appellants was held to be the "owner" within the meaning of this Metropolitan Buildings Act. That is very different from the present case, where the defendant has let out various portions of the premises to several persons, he alone being in possession of the profits of the entire building. So in Evelyn v. Whichcord (2), as the rent reserved to the lessor by the lease was only a peppercorn, he was not considered to be in possession of the profits, and was held not to be the owner, as defined by this statute. With regard to the interest which Berridge has in the premises, it is only that of a yearly tenant, the agreement not being under seal, and therefore void as a lease. The case of Cowen v. Phillips (3) will be relied on by the defendant as shewing that such a tenant would be treated in equity as an owner, but that was for the purpose of entitling him to notice before alterations could be made by an adjoining owner, and does not apply to the present question.

Hoggins, in support of the rule.—The defendant has underlet the premises, and is no longer the owner in possession, and therefore, according to the principle of the authorities, especially that of Mourilyan v. Labalmondiere (1), he is not the owner who is made liable for the repairs in question by the Metropolitan Buildings Act. In that case Crompton, J. says, "It seems to me that the statute contemplated that where, as in this case, there is both a first owner in receipt of the rents and profits, and a second statutable owner by virtue of occupation for a longer term than from year to year, such last owner is to be the party liable for these expenses. One strong ground for this view is that no other party would have the right to enter the premises and pull down such part as was ruinous." To be "owner" within the act he must be more than landlord of the premises; he must be in possession, and so have the power to do the works required by the Commissioners to be done in order to make the dangerous structure safe. The present defendant having let the premises had no right to enter and repair the wall, and if he were made liable in this action he would have no remedy over. He has parted with the premises for a greater estate than that of a yearly tenancy, and is therefore according to the statute not liable as owner. The case of Cowen v. Phillips (3) is directly in point to shew that Berridge has a greater interest than that of a yearly tenant. In that case the Master of the Rolls held that a tenant in possession who had an equitable interest only under an agreement for a lease for a term of years was in equity an adjoining owner under the Metropolitan Buildings Act.

ERLE, C.J.—This was an action by one adjoining owner against another adjoining owner to recover a contribution in respect of a party-wall, which was found to be a dangerous structure, and was required by the Commissioners of Sewers to be pulled down by virtue of the powers in the Metropolitan Buildings Act. For the purposes of the present rule, it must be taken that the plaintiffs, the owners on the east side, had done all that was necessary under the act to make Harris, the defendant, liable for the contribution sought to be recovered. It appeared at the trial that Harris held the premises on the west side of the plaintiffs upon the terms upon which the greater part of the house property within the Metropolitan Buildings Act is held, namely, that he had a long lease, say for eighty or ninety years, probably at a ground-rent, and that he was making a profit by letting out the premises in floors; that is, the ground floor by lease to Collins for twenty-one years, and the two upper floors to Berridge under an agreement for seven years, which, according to the case of Cowen v. Phillips (3), before the Master of the Rolls, gave him in equity all the rights of a legal estate for the seven years, though it was only good in equity. There is no evidence how the first floor was disposed of; but it was not occupied by Harris, and I assume for the purpose of the present judgment that it was occupied by a person unknown, for a term unknown. Harris being in receipt of the rents and profits in the manner that I have mentioned, the claim is made against him; and it seems to me that under section 3. he clearly is the "adjoining owner." By that section the word "owner" is applied to every person in possession or receipt either of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement, or in the occupation thereof other than as tenant from year to year. He was the owner in possession or receipt of all the rents and profits of this tenement, and he is the adjoining owner. Then the party-wall having been pulled down and a claim made against him as adjoining owner, he says, "I am not the owner, because I am not in the immediate possession of the premises, because it is let out in the way above mentioned." Is that any bar to this action? As I read the statute, it is not. Then the wall was a dangerous structure, and was required to be pulled down. It was pulled down by the plaintiffs, who were building owners within the statute; and section 73, as I read it, gives the building owner who pulls down the structure and builds up another in its place a right to demand repayment of the expenses. It says, "all expenses incurred"—(I leave out the words, "by the said Commissioners," because the building owner is in the place of the Commissioners—all expenses incurred by the building owner—as I read it) "in respect of any dangerous structure shall be paid by the owner of such structure, but without prejudice to his right to recover the same from any lessee or other person liable to the expenses of the repairs." It seems to me to be perfectly clear that the party upon whom the duty of payment is cast is the owner of the structure within the meaning of section 3, namely, a person in possession or receipt of the rents or profits of the premises, that is to say, the person having a beneficial lease, and entitled to the rack-rent. The words "without prejudice to his right to recover the same from any lessee or other person liable to the payment of such expenses of repairs" clearly refer to the owner of a long term who has underlet the premises. There is a very great convenience in giving to the building owner, who has been called on to do the work required in the case of a party structure, a right of proceeding for the expenses against the owner of the entire premises, instead of against every one of the subtenants, where the premises are let out, as here, in different portions, namely, one floor to one tenant and another floor to another. And the contrary would not only be very inconvenient, but lead to great injustice. For, take the case of the man who has taken one floor of the house for a term, of which only four and a half years remain, it would be an enormous injustice to make him pay the entire expense of building up that portion of the party-wall which adjoins his floor. That the statute contemplated something in the nature of a permanent interest in the adjoining owner of the whole of the premises appears from section 84, which enables the adjoining owner to require the building owner to build chimneys, jambs, recesses, and other like works belonging to the permanent structure of the adjoining house. It seems much more reasonable to give the right to insist on modifications of the structure of the party-wall to the person entitled to the long lease of the entirety of the premises than to allow such a right to be exercised according to the caprice or convenience of the persons having leases of the separate floors. It seems to me that the lessee of the entire premises for a long term, who is in the receipt of the rents and profits is precisely the owner contemplated by the statute against whom the building owner is to have recourse; and I think that section 97, construed in this way, tallies exactly with it. That section enacts that in respect of expenses to be borne, the owner immediately entitled in possession to premises, or the occupier thereof, shall, in the first instance, pay such expenses, with this limitation, that no occupier shall be liable to pay any sum exceeding the amount of rent due or to become due from him in respect of the premises. The owner immediately entitled in possession prima facie would be the person to pay, and the clause has not contemplated cases where the tenant in fee might be in possession of the land. I think that the clause refers to the definition in section 3. of the word "owner," and it means, "in the receipt of the rents and profits," and is put in contradistinction to an occupier of the premises, because the first is liable to the entire demand, and the other is liable only to the extent of the rent that might be due or become due from him. I think that what the legislature had in contemplation was making the party entitled to the permanent interest liable, since by section 74. if the "owner" cannot be found, or will not pay, the Commissioners have power to sell the structure, and it would be very inconvenient, to say the least, to think of selling in the case of the default of a sub-lessee, who might have, as in the present case, an interest only for four years and a half. To my mind the statute has a thoroughly rational and convenient interpretation, upon the principle I have stated. I do not mean to say but that the owner in fee simple, or somebody else, also may be liable. I do not pronounce any opinion upon that. But my opinion is clear that the owner of a long term, who has underlet the premises, and who is entitled to the rack-rents, is liable. The cases adverted to do not throw much light upon the question before us. In the case of Evelyn v. Whichcord (2), Evelyn was the owner in fee who had leased the land to one Searle at a peppercorn rent, with a covenant by Searle to build houses on the land so let, and the claim made by Whichcord, who was the district surveyor, was for surveying the houses which Searle was building, and in respect of which Searle was the person for whom the service was done, and on his becoming bankrupt Whichcord made a claim for his fees under section 51. of this Metropolitan Buildings Act on Evelyn, the owner of the fee simple. The judgment was that he was not liable, for he was not the owner within the definition in section 3; because, as stated in the judgment of Crompton, J., it is enacted that the word "owner" shall apply to a person entitled to the rents and profits; whereas a peppercorn rent cannot be called a rent or profit. I am reported to have only said in that case, "Under the peculiar circumstances of this case I read the statute as my Lord does." It was very clear to my mind, in that case, that it was the duty of the Judges to look a long way round before they shifted the liability to pay the surveyor from the builder to the owner of the fee simple. The statute states that "owner" means the man entitled to the rents and profits, and I considered in that case that the beneficial interest was in the lessee of the term, and not in the person entitled only to a peppercorn rent. That case throws very little light upon the present one, because it has nothing to do with the rights between owners of a party-wall. The same observation, to my mind, applies to the case of Mourilyan v. Labalmondiere (1). There a chapel had been let by Mourilyan to one Neill for twenty-one years, with a covenant by Neill to keep it in repair. I do not understand that there was any question there of building owner or adjoining owner. The conditions of the lease were not performed, and the chapel was pulled down by the Commissioners because it was in a dangerous state, and was a nuisance; then, as between Labalmondiere, who was the Commissioner of Police, and Mourilyan, the owner in fee, the Court came to the conclusion that Mourilyan ought not to have been proceeded against for the expenses of pulling down the chapel. There is, I think, a distinction between that case and the present; but in one point of view it is in favour of the judgment I have come to. The Court there say that the action ought not to have been brought against the owner of the fee, but against the lessee who was entitled to the rents and profits. I consider that Neill, during his lease for twenty-one years under a covenant to repair, stood exactly in pari jure with Harris in the present case. Neill was making a profit of the chapel by letting parts of it, for I assume he was making a profit by letting the pews, and he had twenty-one years of the entirety under a covenant to put it in repair, and he was the person within the reasoning of that decision, who ought to have been called on to pay, for the very reason that Harris ought to be called on here. It would be a source of infinite dispute and litigation, if without making Harris pay the whole, the building owner had to go against the different under-tenants. In coming to the conclusion at which I have arrived, I do not in the smallest degree contravene any of the authorities referred to.

BYLES, J.—After the manner in which my Lord has dealt with this case, I will only add a very few words. I cannot conceive, as the case at present stands, that any doubt can now remain upon the question. I think it right to say that, as far as I may venture to pronounce an opinion, all the three cases of Mourilyan v. Labalmondiere (1), Evelyn v. Whichcord (2) and Coven v. Phillips (3) were rightly decided. In the first case it was held that the party who was a tenant for twenty-one years, under a covenant to repair, was the party liable, and further that he was the only party liable. It is quite unnecessary to discuss the reasons why, but on a full examination of the statute, I come to the conclusion that there is no reason whatever for impugning the soundness of that decision. The next case is that of Evelyn v. Whichcord (2), where it was held that a receiver of a peppercorn rent was not in the beneficial occupation of the rents and profits, and therefore could not be the owner within the meaning of the statute. The third case was Coven v. Phillips (3), and it is to this effect: that though a man in point of law may be a tenant from year to year, yet if he has a contract for a term, he must be taken in a Court of equity to be possessed of the interest contracted for, because equity considers that to be done which is contracted to be done. That case only shews, that if a person paying a rent, and therefore a yearly tenant, has a contract for a beneficial term, he would be the party liable under the statute. Every one of those cases is quite consistent with our decision here. It is plain here that the defendant is the "owner," both within the meaning of the act of parliament and in the popular sense of the word. It seems to me he is more than that, he is the occupying owner. It appears that the ground-floor and the basement are let to one tenant, and the two upper floors are let to another tenant; and on the terms of a letting which we have not ascertained, the residue of the house, or a portion of it, is let to another. What is there to shew that the demise of these rooms carries any interest whatever in the party-wall? If such a letting were to carry an interest in the party-wall, so might the letting of lodgings carry with it such an interest. We certainly do not find that the defendant demised any portion of the party-wall, and I should be astonished if I took a lease of rooms for a term of years, if I was told that it included a demise of a portion of a party-wall. I quite agree with what my Lord has said, and I entertain no doubt but that this verdict ought to stand.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It may be difficult to put a definite construction upon this statute. The best the Court can do is to look narrowly to the facts of each case. I think that in this case the defendant answers the description of "owner" in the statute. He is in the immediate possession of the whole of the rents and profits, and therefore the beneficial owner, and the evidence does not satisfy me that there are other persons who answer that description.

{ FOWLER AND ANOTHER v. THE ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH MAR-INE INSURANCE COMPANY,
LIMITED.

Marine Insurance—Insurance against War Risks—Embargo—Total Loss.

By a policy of insurance on a vessel against capture and detention the assurers contracted "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation." The vessel having been detained under an embargo within the meaning of the policy, —Held, that when the thirty days after receipt of official news of such embargo had expired, the assured was entitled to recover for a total loss, although before action, but subsequently to such thirty days, the embargo was taken off and the vessel was restored to the assured.

This was an action on a policy of insurance, which was tried, before Erle, C. J., at

The policy was upon a ship called Ernst Jacob, valued at 2,500*l.*, at or from Riga to London, and the insurance was "only against such risks as are excluded, free from capture, seizure and detention, or the consequences of any attempts thereof, to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation."

The first count of the declaration set out the policy, and alleged a loss by the seizure and detention of the ship under an embargo by the King of Denmark, and that, before action brought, thirty days after receipt of official news of the said seizure and detention had elapsed, and that the defendants had not indemnified the plaintiffs against the said loss, or paid the said sum of 2,500*l.*

The defendants pleaded to the first count, so far as relates to the total loss of the ship, first, a denial of the detention of the ship under an embargo by the King of Denmark, until after the lapse of thirty days after receipt of official news of the said seizure; and secondly, a plea to the effect, that within thirty days after the said embargo, and before action, a decree was made by the King of Denmark, by which this embargo was taken off, and that the ship afterwards sailed upon and completed her voyage from Riga to London in safety.

The facts were these: The ship, the Ernst Jacob, was a Prussian ship, and on the 4th of December 1863, in the course of her voyage from Riga to London, she was obliged to put into Elsinore for repairs. War being then imminent between Denmark and Prussia, the plaintiffs on the 15th of December effected the policy in question, being an insurance of the vessel against war risks only. On the 3rd of February 1864, war having been declared between Denmark and Prussia, an embargo was laid by the Danish Government on the Ernst Jacob, then still at Elsinore. On the 4th of February a telegram was received at Lloyd's, giving information of the embargo on the Ernst Jacob, and on the same day an entry of the loss was made in the loss-book at Lloyd's, which the jury found was the official news contemplated by the policy. The thirty days after the receipt of such news expired on the 6th of March. On the 15th of February a decree was made and promulgated by the King of Denmark, by which enemies' vessels, then lying under embargo in Danish harbours, were permitted to depart until the 1st of April, under proviso of reciprocity on the part of the governments interested. The Prussian Government assented to the terms of this decree on the 13th of March 1864, on which day the embargo was taken off the Ernst Jacob, and she shortly afterwards sailed from Elsinore, and arrived in good condition in London on the 29th of April. It was admitted that the vessel would not have been allowed to leave the Danish harbour until the 13th of March, when the Prussian Government assented to the decree. The present action was brought after the embargo had been taken off, and the plaintiffs claimed to recover a total loss.

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 2,500*l.*, and interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent., leave being reserved to the defendants to move to set the same aside, and enter a verdict for the defendants. Pursuant to such leave,

Mellish obtained a rule nisi to that effect, on the ground that the loss ceased to be total when the embargo was taken off. Against this rule,

Lush and Sir G. Honyman now shewed cause.—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover for a total loss, the right to recover having vested in them absolutely on the expiration of the thirty days. But for this clause in the policy, it is clear from the authorities that immediately on the embargo being put on the ship they could have given notice of abandonment, and brought their action for a total loss; but that if the ship had been restored before the action was brought, they could not have recovered for a total loss—Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 1072, where it is said, "Immediately, therefore, the assured receives intelligence that his ship is captured, he has a right to give notice of abandonment; and he may insist on such notice, and recover as for a total loss, 'provided the capture, and the total loss occasioned thereby, continue to the time of bringing the action,'" quoting the words of Lord Mansfield in Hamilton v. Mendes (1). Now this clause in the present policy binds the assured not to sue before the thirty days have expired; this is to obviate the necessity of bringing an action directly the vessel was seized, which the state of the law rendered necessary in order to secure the assured's right to recover for a total loss. But at the expiration of the thirty days the clause in question is an absolute engagement to pay for a total loss; otherwise it would be wholly for the benefit of the underwriters, which was not the intention of the parties when it was inserted. The English rule, that an abandonment, though rightfully made, is not absolute, and that if the loss has ceased to be total before action the abandonment becomes inoperative, was doubted by Lord Eldon in Smith v. Robertson (2); and it does not prevail in America—3 Kent's Commentaries, 403, 8th edit.

Mellish and Archibald, in support of the rule.—The contract of insurance is one only of indemnity—Hamilton v. Mendes (1), Brotherston v. Barber (3); and therefore if the vessel be restored to the assured before action, the loss cannot be total, but must only be partial. According to the construction the plaintiffs put on this clause in the policy, no meaning is given to the words "without waiting for condemnation." Moreover, if the words relied on by the plaintiffs, viz. "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo," are to be taken in their literal meaning, the assured would be entitled to be paid for a total loss whether, before the thirty days had expired, the ship was restored or not; and yet it would seem to be admitted by the plaintiffs that they would have no right to sue for a total loss if the vessel were restored before the thirty days expired. It is submitted that the clause meant only to point the time when the policy should be payable; but not to alter the law, by which the assured is only to recover to the extent he has been damnified at the time of bringing his action. Such a clause might be desirable, because, without it, although there might be a right of action immediately the vessel had been captured, yet in practice the underwriter never paid until some time afterwards, as he required to have evidence of such capture before he paid on the policy. An embargo may or may not be such as to amount to a total loss. In Arnould on Marine Insurance, s. 387, p. 1085, it is shewn that embargo may be a ground of abandonment where it is likely to be of long or uncertain duration, for which Rotch v. Edie (4) is cited; but the learned author says, "Of course, if the arrest be only momentary, if it creates only a temporary obstruction of the voyage, without giving rise to any permanent loss of control over the ship, it cannot give any right to abandon;" for which he cites Foster v. Christie (5). He then proceeds to say, "In France the assured is allowed to give notice of abandonment immediately after capture; but in case of detention by arrest or embargo, he is obliged to wait before doing so for different periods fixed by the 387th article of the Code de Commerce." The evidence shews that the embargo here was only temporary. The words in this policy, "without waiting for condemnation," imply that the vessel still continues liable to capture; but they ought to be "without waiting for restoration" to give effect to the construction the plaintiffs seek to put on the policy.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for a total loss. There is no dispute as to what the law was when the parties made this contract, and the only duty which is cast upon us is to put a construction upon the words of the contract. The insurance is only against such risks as are excluded, free from capture, seizure and detention; and the clause which has given rise to the dispute in this action is, "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation." If those last words, "without waiting for condemnation," had been left out, it appears to me to be clear that when the thirty days elapsed the assured were entitled to claim for a total loss. Am I, then, to alter the meaning of the rest of the clause because I cannot put a construction on those words, "waiting for condemnation"? I think not. The contracting parties must be taken to have known the law when they made their contract, and by that they contract that after the thirty days have expired the loss shall be paid as for a total loss. The embargo here was not a temporary one, and it seems to me that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover their claim for a total loss.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Had the words "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news" stood by themselves, it is clear that after the expiration of such thirty days the money insured would have been payable as for a total loss. It is to be remembered that this policy is an insurance against capture as well as embargo; and the word "condemnation" which is afterwards used, and which may refer to the determination of a prize Court, is applicable to the determination of one of the matters insured against, but not to the others; and it still leaves the previous words, and these are incapable of any other meaning than what I have already stated.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the true construction of the policy is to give a vested right to the assured to recover for a total loss in the event there stated, and which has happened, namely, after the expiration of thirty days after the receipt of the official news. Then it is said there are the words "without waiting for condemnation," and no effect is given to those words. They might mean that in the case of capture the delay of the recovery for the loss until the expiration of the thirty days was to be equivalent to a condemnation of the vessel. I am at a loss to put any other construction on those words; and if the meaning were given to the policy which has been contended for by the defendants, the consequence would be to tie up the hands of the assured for the thirty days, and then afterwards, if the ship were restored, the assured would have no right at all. That would make the clause entirely restrictive of the rights of the assured, and not such as, I think, were intended.

Church-Rate—Power of Justices under a Local Act to enforce Rate—Quaker disputing Rate—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 74.—Appeal to the Quarter Sessions—Jurisdiction of Justices to inquire into Validity of Rate—Inhabitant.

By a local act (5 Geo. 1. c. ix.) power was given to choose a certain number of "inhabitants" of a parish to be vestrymen for such parish, and for the rector and majority of the vestrymen to assess persons and property in the parish for defraying the expense of obtaining the act, and for buying of bells for the church, and for doing what should be fit to be done in or about the church and keeping the same in repair, and, in case of default in payment of the sums so assessed, the Justices were empowered to issue their warrant for the levy thereof by distress and sale of the offender's goods. The act also stated that any person aggrieved by any such assessment or distress might appeal to the Quarter Sessions "within three months after such distress".—Held, that the jurisdiction of the Justices under such local act to enforce the rate was not taken away by the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 74, though the person on whom the rate was made was a Quaker and disputed its validity.

Held, also, that the local act gave a power of appeal against the assessment before as well as after the distress, and that it was, therefore, not competent to the Justices to inquire as to the validity of the constitution of the vestrymen.

Semble—That it was not necessary for the qualification of a vestryman chosen pursuant to the act that he should sleep as well as reside within the parish, the word "inhabitant" not having in the act such a limited meaning.

Costs—County Court—Concurrent Jurisdiction—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128.—Place of Dwelling.

The defendant had two residences, one in London, which was within, and the other in the country, which was more than twenty miles from the plaintiff's residence. At the time the action was brought, the defendant was at his London house, but two days before he had written to the plaintiff's attorney from his house in the country:—Held, that the superior Court had concurrent jurisdiction with the County Court within the meaning of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128.

This was an application for a rule directing the plaintiff to have his costs. The facts, as they appeared from the affidavits, were as follows: The defendant had two residences, one a town house, in Chesham Place, Belgrave Square, which was less than twenty miles from the plaintiff's residence, and the other a country house, near Ashford, in Kent, which was more than twenty miles from the plaintiff's residence. The plaintiff had been the defendant's butler, and had been hired by the defendant in his house in London, and the action, which was brought to recover 15*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* for wages, was tried before the Under-sheriff, when the plaintiff obtained a verdict. The action was commenced on the 5th of January last; and on that day it appeared the defendant was at his London house, but on the 4th of January the plaintiff's attorney had received a letter from the defendant, dated on the 3rd of January, from his country residence, in reply to a letter he had addressed to him there.

B. T. Williams, in support of his motion.—It is submitted that the plaintiff is entitled to his costs, as this is a case in which the superior Courts had a concurrent jurisdiction given them by section 128. of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. In Butler v. Ablewhite (1), where the plaintiff had two permanent dwelling-places, and at the time of action brought he was residing with his family at the residence, which was situate more than twenty miles from the defendant, it was held by this Court, differing from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Bailey v. Bryant (2), that it was a case in which the superior Court had concurrent jurisdiction, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to his costs. The case of Kerr v. Haynes (3) shews that a plaintiff may dwell in the country, though he has also a London house.

Marshall Griffith shewed cause in the first instance.—The facts in Bailey v. Bryant (2) cannot be distinguished from those in Butler v. Ablewhite (1); therefore there is a difference between the two Courts on this point. There is, however, some distinction between the present case and that of Butler v. Ablewhite (1), as here the hiring of the plaintiff was at the defendant's London residence, and also when the writ was issued the defendant was at his London residence. There is this further distinction, that in both the cases which have been cited for the plaintiff, it was the plaintiff, and not the defendant, who had the double residence. In M'Dougal v. Paterson (4) Maule, J. says, "Assuming that a man may have a dwelling-house in two places at the same time, he may, as I read the act, have the rights which belong to a man who dwells more than twenty miles off, and also those which belong to a man who dwells less than twenty miles off. There are no negative words in the act." Here the practical effect of making this rule absolute would be to make the words of the acts disabling words in the case of a defendant who has two residences.

[BYLES, J.—Suppose a suggestion entered on the roll that the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the dwelling of the defendant, and that were traversed, how would that be? Does not the plaintiff so dwell, although the defendant has two residences? We are dealing, it must be remembered, with a statute which repeals the Statute of Gloucester.] within twenty miles of the plaintiff's residence.

B. T. Williams replied.

ERLE, C.J.—In Butler v. Ablewhite (1) the plaintiff had two residences, one within and the other more than twenty miles from the defendant's residence, and this Court founded their judgment, that the plaintiff in that case was entitled to his costs, on the ground that the actual residence of the plaintiff at the time of bringing the action was the more distant residence. I do not dissent from that case as it stands, but it is not exactly in point here, because the question here arises in respect of the defendant's residence, and there may be, though I cannot find it, a distinction between where it depends on the plaintiff's residence and where it depends on the defendant's. I give, however, my judgment in like manner as it was given in Butler v. Ablewhite (1), because I think, in fact, the defendant's residence was at the time when the action was brought more than twenty miles from that of the plaintiff, though perhaps, at that time, the defendant was bodily within such twenty miles. This rule must therefore be absolute, but without costs.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In Butler v. Ablewhite (1) this point of two residences was discussed and fully considered. No doubt the decision in that case proceeded on a literal construction of the statute, and I think rightly so. The plaintiff is entitled to his costs under the Statute of Gloucester, unless he is deprived of them by the statute of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and he says, "I dwell more than twenty miles from where the defendant dwells." If an issue were taken on that, it would be decided for the plaintiff. I see no distinction between the case where the defendant has two residences and the case where the plaintiff has two residences, and it seems to me that the present case is concluded by one, if not by two authorities, in favour of the plaintiff.

SMITH, J. concurred.

It was proved that the appellant was the occupier of a hall, which, though licensed for public dancing and music, was not licensed as a theatre, and that one end of that hall was fitted up with a stage, where, with lights and scenery and the other accessories of a stage, the appellant caused to be presented for the amusement of the public, for which they paid, a performance sustained by living persons with a dialogue between them and a regular plot, which was distinguished only from an ordinary stage play by all the actors except two (the dialogue between whom was wholly subordinate to the plot of the piece) being not bodily on the stage, but represented merely by a reflexion of their figures on a mirror at the back of the stage, so ingeniously contrived that to the spectators the appearance was that of persons actually upon the stage:—Held, that there had been a violation of the statute, and that the conviction was right.

TRINITY TERM, 28 VICTORIÆ.

1865. { PHELPS v. THE LONDON AND

Carriers by Railway—Detention of Passenger's Luggage—"Ordinary Luggage."

An attorney, going by railway to attend a county court, took in his portmanteau documents and bank-notes for use in certain causes in which he was engaged as an attorney. The portmanteau was carried under the private act of the railway company without charge as passenger's "ordinary luggage"; it was missing at the end of the journey, and not recovered for some days:—Held, that these articles were not "ordinary luggage" of the plaintiff as a passenger, and that the railway company were not liable in damages for the consequences of the temporary loss of them.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for the temporary loss of his portmanteau and its contents, forming part of his luggage as a passenger on the defendants' railway.

It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff was an attorney, who was on a journey to attend two cases in a county court, and that, in addition to his clothing and analogous articles, he had placed in his portmanteau certain deeds and documents which were to be used in the said cases, and also a sum of money in bank-notes in anticipation of his having to make payments therein. The portmanteau, which was labelled and carried without charge in the usual way as passenger's luggage, was not forthcoming at the end of his journey, and was not found and delivered to him for some days after. The consequence was, that not only was he put to inconvenience and expense in waiting and searching for his luggage, but the cases had to be postponed, his journey was rendered fruitless, and considerable expense and inconvenience entailed thereby.

By the defendants' private act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. cciv. s. 66, it was enacted that "every passenger travelling on the railway in a first-class carriage may take with him his ordinary luggage not exceeding 112 lb. in weight; and every passenger travelling in a second-class carriage may take with him his ordinary luggage not exceeding 60 lb. in weight; and every passenger travelling in a third-class carriage may take with him his ordinary luggage not exceeding 40 lb. in weight, without any charge being made for carriage."

The learned Judge left to the jury the two following questions: first, what damage did the plaintiff sustain on the assumption that he was entitled to carry the deeds, documents and bank-notes as part of his ordinary luggage? Secondly, what damage did he sustain on the assumption that he was only entitled so to carry his clothing and analogous articles?

The jury found that on the first assumption he was entitled to 4*l.* 1*s.*, and on the second to 20*l.*

A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for the larger sum, with leave reserved to the defendants to move to reduce the damages to 20*l.*, on the grounds that the deeds, documents and bank-notes were not the plaintiff's ordinary luggage which he was entitled to carry without payment, and that the alleged loss of the object of his journey was too remote to be recoverable as damage, and could not fairly and reasonably have been contemplated by the defendants (1).

A rule nisi having been obtained, pursuant to such leave,—

Huddleston and Prûleaux now shewed cause.—The question turns on the meaning of "ordinary luggage" in section 66. of the private act. There are no cases in point, or which define what is to be considered the ordinary luggage of a passenger. The only cases which seem in any way to bear on the point are Cubitt v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (2), and The Great Northern Railway Company v. Shepherd (3).

[WILLES, J.—There is also a case which was decided in the House of Lords, in an appeal from Ireland (4).]

In Cubitt v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (2), it was held that a box containing only merchandise was not personal luggage. In The Great Northern Railway Company v. Shepherd (3), where it was held that ivory knife-handles were not personal luggage, Parke, B. says, "Luggage, according to the true modern doctrine on the subject, comprises clothing and such articles as a traveller usually carries with him for his personal convenience; perhaps even a small present or a book for the journey might be included in the term;" and Story on Bailments, section 499, is to a like effect. What is "luggage" must vary, both with the habits and the profession of the traveller. A fishing-rod or a gun would be luggage of a sportsman, a wig and gown of a barrister, his deeds and papers of an attorney. Again, it may be observed, that the word in the statute is "ordinary" and not "personal." As to the remoteness of damage, in Smeed v. Foord (5), Crompton, J. gives a convenient rule: "I should tell the jury that they ought to give the plaintiff such damages as were the natural consequences of the breach of contract; but it is doubtful whether anything more than the general rule should be laid down . . . but all this is to be left to the jury." Here the matter has gone to the jury, and they have decided it.

Kemplay and Wheeler, in support of the rule.—Although the word "ordinary" is used, yet ordinary luggage of a passenger means his own ordinary personal luggage,—things required for his own personal use,—but not things which are to be used in the business of others. It is not necessary to decide what property, which is for the use of the passenger, falls within the statute; it is sufficient to say the property now in question was to be used for the benefit of others.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The question is confined to the damages in respect of the deeds connected with the plaintiff's professional character as an attorney making a journey to attend a county court, and the money which comes within the same category, and which, it is said, was necessary for him to take in his professional character for use in the litigation. I consider the loss in respect of each of these articles, so reduced into one category, is not a loss connected with luggage for his personal use in his journey as a traveller. It is impossible to draw a definite line. Luggage which one person might carry for his personal use might be a distress and annoyance to another. But still the habits of mankind must be considered to be within the cognizance of the railway company, so that anything carried according to usage for personal use would be a matter for which the company would be responsible as luggage of a traveller upon a journey. But these articles are entirely out of that category; they were not for the plaintiff's personal use, or usually required, but were taken by him in his capacity of attorney for the service of another person, and I think the defendants are not to be held responsible for them.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should doubt if a man's own title deeds and securities can be called "ordinary luggage," but when they belong to another person the case is still clearer. And as to the money, there is in this particular case no distinction between the money and the deeds.

JEFFRYES v. EVANS.

Game, Reservation of—Quiet Enjoyment—Destruction of Rabbits and Coverts by the Tenant.

A. let a farm to B, reserving the exclusive right of "hunting, shooting, fishing and sporting," and afterwards let to C. the exclusive right of "shooting and sporting over and taking the game, rabbits and wildfowl upon" the farm, and covenanted with C. for his quiet enjoyment of such right without interruption from persons claiming through him. B. shot rabbits and grubbed up a large quantity of gorse, &c., whereupon C. brought an action against A:—Held, first, that B. had no right to shoot rabbits, and that his act therefore was a wrongful one, for which A. was not liable; secondly, that B. was entitled to grub up the gorse, &c. in the reasonable use of the land as a farm, that there was no implied covenant with C. that this should not be done, and that A. was therefore not liable for such act of B.

The declaration (as far as it is necessary to refer to it) alleged, that the defendant demised to the plaintiff, for seven years, a certain messuage and lands, and also the exclusive right at all times during the said term of shooting and sporting over, and taking the game, rabbits and wildfowl upon the said premises and upon certain other manors and lands, with a certain reservation as to trees, &c. over the lands demised; and that the demise contained the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment without interruption from persons lawfully claiming under the lessor, and a covenant to repair. And it contained four breaches: 1. That one Rees, lawfully claiming under the defendant the right to shoot the rabbits in and upon the said manors and lands, and having good title under him, entered into and upon the said lands, and shot and killed and carried away large quantities of rabbits there, and evicted the plaintiff from the enjoyment of the said exclusive right of shooting and sporting and taking the said rabbits so to him demised and granted. 2. That the said Rees, lawfully claiming under the defendant the right to cut down divers furze coverts, woods and plantations in and upon the said manors and lands over which the plaintiff had the said exclusive right of shooting and sporting, cut down, carried away and destroyed large quantities of such furze coverts and plantations, and thereby evicted the plaintiff from and disturbed him in the enjoyment of his said right of shooting and sporting. 3. That there was an improper exercise of the right as to trees. 4. That there was a breach of the covenant to repair.

The defendant pleaded: to the first breach, first, that Rees did not enter the lands and shoot and kill the rabbits and evict the plaintiff from the enjoyment of his exclusive right of shooting and sporting and taking rabbits; secondly, that Rees did not lawfully claim under him the right to shoot rabbits: to the second breach, thirdly, that Rees did not cut down the furze, &c. and evict the plaintiff or disturb him in his said right; fourthly, that Rees did not lawfully claim under him to cut down the furze, &c.: to the third breach, fifthly, payment into court: to the fourth breach, sixthly, a denial of the non-repair.

On these pleas issue was taken.

At the trial, it appeared that the lands referred to in the declaration, and called the Upton Estate, were divided into two portions, viz., Upton Castle with a small quantity of land attached, and Upton Castle Farm. That the said Rees was tenant of the farm under the defendant by virtue of a lease of December 1857, which reserved to the lessor, &c. all timber and other trees, mines, minerals and quarries on the said farm, and also the exclusive right of hunting, shooting, fishing and sporting on the said farm. That the plaintiff was the tenant of Upton Castle and the annexed land under the defendant, by virtue of a lease of September 1860, which also gave a right of sporting over the farm in the terms disclosed by the declaration, and contained the covenants therein set forth. Evidence was given as to the destruction of the rabbits, furze, &c., the injuries in cutting trees, and the non-repair. The learned Judge was of opinion that Rees had no right under his lease to destroy the rabbits, and could not therefore be said to claim under the defendant; and that the cutting down the furze, &c. was not an eviction of the plaintiff from his right of shooting; and that therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed on the first two breaches. But he left it to the jury to say whether any and what damage had been done to the plaintiff on each of the breaches, assuming that he had a right to recover for damages accruing under them.

The jury found that the plaintiff had sustained damages from all the four alleged causes of action, and assessed such damages separatim. And the learned Judge thereupon directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff on the first, fifth and sixth issues; for the defendant on the second issue, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for the damage assessed on that issue, if on the true construction of the lease to Rees he had a right to shoot the rabbits; and for the defendant on the third and fourth issues, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for the damage assessed on those issues, if the Court should think the issues in fact proved;

but the rule to be drawn up so as to allow the defendant to move in arrest of judgment as to the second breach to which such pleas were pleaded, on the ground that the acts complained of did not amount to a breach of the defendant's covenant.

A rule nisi having been obtained, and in substance drawn up pursuant to such leave, (except perhaps the addition of the words, "and that on the construction of the said lease Rees had a right to cut furze and underwood," after the words "issues in fact proved,")—

Gifford, H. Allen and G. B. Hughes now shewed cause.—The first point made on the other side is, that rabbits are not game, and that, therefore, Rees had a right to shoot, and the defendant is consequently liable for his rightful act; and the case of Spicer v. Barnard (1) is relied on. The reservation in that case was no doubt the same as it is here; but there the question was as to the meaning of "game" in a particular statute; here it is as to its meaning in a contract between private parties. The legal technical meaning may vary from time to time; but in a contract all animals generally sported after will be included. Again, rabbits have been recognized as game in various statutes from 13 Rich. 2. st. 1. c. 13; and though not game within 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32, yet, if a man sports after them he will be surcharged; they are also within 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, and are not mere objects of diversion, as appears from the judgment of Bayley, J., in Hannam v. Mockett (2). The second point made was, that there was an implied covenant not to disturb by cutting the furze, &c.; but the other side is in this dilemma: if there be such a covenant implied in the lease to the plaintiff, it must equally exist in the lease to Rees, and his act, therefore, would be a wrongful one, for which we are not responsible; if there be not, then there is no covenant to break.

J. W. Bowen and C. Coleridge, in support of the rule.—First, rabbits never were game—Woolrych on the Game Laws, Paterson on the Game Laws, Chitty on the Game Laws, Fitzh. Nat. Brev., 86 and 87; they are not game within 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 23

(1) 1 E. & E. 874; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 176.

(2) 2 B. & C. 934.

— The King v. Yates (3), or within 5 Ann. c. 14. sect. 4.—Ashurst, J., in The King v. Thompson (4); and on a review of the various acts that have been passed, it will be found that rabbits are always expressly mentioned in addition to game whenever they are intended to be included. The cases of Padwick v. King (5), Thomas v. Fredericks (6), Graham v. Ewart (7), and Spicer v. Barnard (1), are all in favour of the plaintiff. Secondly, the reservation of trees in the lease to Rees did not include underwood—2 Platt on Leases, 42, Berriman v. Peacock (8); and there was in the lease to the plaintiff an implied covenant that the farm should be reasonably fit for his shooting—7 Bac. Abr. 252; and therefore this is an act of Rees for which the defendant is liable to the plaintiff.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged, and the verdict stand as entered. The action (as far as it relates to the present rule) is brought for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment of the exclusive right of shooting and sporting over and taking the game, rabbits, and wildfowl upon certain lands in the occupation of Rees; and the declaration alleges that Rees, lawfully claiming under the defendant the right to shoot the rabbits upon these lands, shot, killed and carried away large quantities of rabbits, and evicted the plaintiff from his exclusive right of shooting; and also that Rees, lawfully claiming under the defendant the right to cut down the furze, &c. upon such lands, cut down and carried away large quantities of it, and thereby also evicted the plaintiff from and disturbed him in the enjoyment of his said right of sporting. The great point is as to whether Rees had a right to shoot the rabbits, and I think he had no right to do so. The demise to Rees was of a farm, with a reservation to the landlord of the "exclusive right of hunting, shooting, fishing and sporting" over it. And I think that the fair meaning of the words is, that there is a reservation to the landlord of whatever ordinarily known as "hunting, shooting, is fishing and sporting." The word "game" is an indefinite word, and seems at various times to have had various meanings; to have at one time included one thing, at one time another; to have had at one time a wider, and at another time a narrower signification. And if the issue had been as to the meaning of a reservation of game, possibly we might have construed it according to the statutes for the time being in force. But the word "game" is not used. Further, in my opinion, when a tenant takes a farm with a reservation of "hunting, shooting, fishing and sporting," he should, if afraid of destruction that may be done by rabbits, make it a matter of arrangement, and stipulate either for compensation or for some powers for destroying them. Here there is no such stipulation, and, indeed, I see no evidence of any extraordinary increase of the rabbits. The second point is as to the destruction by Rees of the furze coverts, woods and plantations, the evidence not being definite as to its extent. It is said that the covenant for quiet enjoyment of the shooting, sporting, and taking game, rabbits and wildfowl, by the plaintiff, contains an implied covenant not to grub up the furze coverts, woods and plantations, and that the doing so was an eviction from the right of the shooting and sporting. The short answer is, that it was no eviction from the right of shooting and sporting, for the same right of shooting remained when the land became arable, and the covenant is only that the plaintiff shall have the shooting there. If his contention were correct, it might be said that it would be a breach of covenant for the tenant to give up growing turnips or any other crop favourable to partridges; and the same law applies where thirty or forty acres of brushwood are destroyed. If there had been a covenant for the enjoyment of shooting in a wood, it might have been different; in this case it is not so, and I am of opinion that there was no eviction. These are my two answers. There is also the dilemma which has been put by Mr. Giffard; but the foregoing are the reasons on which I decide.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The reservation in the lease to Rees is of "hunting, shooting, fishing and sporting," and I can see no reason why all things generally hunted, shot, fished or sported after should not be included. General words should receive a general construction. The consequence of the plaintiff's construction would be, that not merely might the tenant kill rabbits (which are beasts of warren), but also woodcock, snipe, quail, and landrail (which are birds of warren); and this, I think, leads to an absurdity. As to Graham v. Ewart (7) I have spoken to my Brother Martin, who delivered the judgment, and I find, as I supposed, that the words "game, commonly so called," were meant to refer to such things as are usually sported after, in contradistinction to small birds, and things of a similar character, as, for instance, rats and sparrows. I am clearly of opinion that Rees had no right to kill the rabbits; and, therefore, on the first point, my judgment is in favour of the defendant. As to the second point, the argument for the plaintiff would have been weighty if there had been a grant of woods or underwood; but that point does not arise here. I think that there is in this case nothing to hinder the landholder from using the land in the ordinary way; he is justified as long as he acts in reasonable use of the land, and does not resort to expedients for driving the game away; and I therefore am of opinion that the destruction of the furze and underwood was no eviction from the right of shooting. I am not aware of any case in which a man has succeeded in an action for breach of such a covenant for quiet enjoyment as this, where the grantor had what he professed to grant. Here whatever was reserved by the defendant was granted to the plaintiff; and any right that there might be to keep down a nuisance was recognized equally in the leases of 1860 and 1857. The grantor in this case had the right to that which he professed to grant; the interruption, therefore, was not one which was stipulated against, and our judgment should be for the defendant.

BYLES, J.—I do not desire to be supposed to dissent from the rest of the Court; but I desire to make two observations. First, I do not think that woodcocks, snipe, quails, and landrails are on the same footing as rabbits, inasmuch as rabbits may become a nuisance. Secondly, it must not be understood that I decide that when a landlord lets land, reserving to himself the right of sporting, the tenant may not destroy the rabbits if they become a nuisance.

SMITH, J.—I am also of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant. The first point is, whether the reservation in the lease to Rees included rabbits. I am of opinion that it did, and that the right so reserved was granted to the plaintiff. What Rees did, he therefore did unlawfully and against the reservation of his landlord. The second point is, whether the defendant is entitled to keep the verdict entered for him on the third and fourth issues, and I am of opinion that he is. The cutting of the underwood may have been in the ordinary use of the farm as a farm, and it was no interruption of the grant of the shooting, as the plaintiff might still shoot over the land as before. A man taking such a grant as this must stipulate that the woods must be kept, and that the nature of the cultivation must not be changed. There, further, is this dilemma: if there be no implied covenant against the destruction of the underwood in the lease to the plaintiff, there is no covenant to break; and if there be, then there must equally be one by Rees in the lease to him, and then his act is wrongful, and an act for which the defendant is not liable.

Rule discharged.

1865.) HURST v. THE GREAT WESTERN
June 10. } RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers by Railway—Passenger—Delay causing Loss of a Train.

The plaintiff took a ticket from the defendants from C. to N; the plaintiff, after waiting a long time, was told by a porter that the train was late in consequence of an accident, and the train eventually arrived an hour and a half late. The consequence was that the plaintiff was late for the train at G, which would have carried him on to N. The train-bill was not put in, but only some correspondence in which the defendants repudiated their liability on the ground that by the train-bills they gave notice they would not be liable for the trains not keeping time:—Held, that there was no evidence of a cause of action.

The declaration in this action contained two counts: the first alleged a contract by the defendants to carry the plaintiff within a reasonable time, and without any unreasonable delay, from Cardiff to Newcastle, and a breach thereof, whereby the plaintiff was delayed for a long time at Gloucester; the second alleged a contract by the defendants to carry the plaintiff by a certain train from Cardiff to Gloucester, within a reasonable time, and to use reasonable care to convey him there by a fixed time, and in time to go on to Newcastle by a certain other train, about to start within a reasonable time after such fixed time, and a breach whereby the plaintiff arrived at Gloucester after such fixed time and too late to go on by such other train.

The defendants pleaded not guilty, and denials of their being such carriers, and of the plaintiff being such passenger as in the two counts respectively alleged.

At the trial the defendant and a friend of his were called and deposed to the following facts. One of the defendants' trains starts from Milford, so as in the ordinary course of things to arrive at Cardiff at 4:34 P.M., and at Gloucester at 7:5 P.M., from which last-mentioned place a train of the Midland Railway Company starts at 8:17 P.M. for Birmingham and other places, in communication with other trains of other companies, which run through York and eventually to Newcastle. On the 17th of December 1864, the plaintiff arrived at the Cardiff station before 4:34 P.M., and asked the clerk if he could book him to Newcastle by the train about to start, and was given a ticket on which were the following words: "Great Western Railway, Cardiff to Newcastle, via Midland Railway, First Class." The plaintiff waited a considerable time, and was informed by a porter that the train was late and delayed in consequence of an accident. The train did not arrive at Cardiff till 6 P.M., and the plaintiff on his arrival at Gloucester found that the Midland train had already gone in due course, and he was delayed there about twenty-four hours. In addition to the facts so deposed to, a correspondence was put in, which, in substance, amounted to this:

on the one hand the plaintiff claimed a considerable amount; on the other, the defendants were willing to pay a portion, but at the same time repudiated all liability, on the ground that they gave public notice by their train-bills that they did not guarantee the arrival or departure of the trains at the times specified, and would not be liable for any delay that might occur, and also on the ground that the delay was from circumstances beyond their control.

It was submitted, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff had made out no case; the learned Judge, however, refused to nonsuit the plaintiff, and left the case to the jury, who found for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit, on the ground of there being no evidence of a cause of action, subject to the condition that the matter should go no further than the Court above.

A rule nisi having been obtained pursuant to such leave, and also for a new trial on the ground of the verdict being against evidence,—

Temple and Crompton now shewed cause, and contended that under the above circumstances they were entitled to keep the verdict.

E. James, Manisty and T. Jones, on the other side, were not called on to argue.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute, on the ground that there is no evidence of a breach of any duty or contract by the defendants. The grievance complained of is, that the train was an hour and a half late at Cardiff, and that the plaintiff consequently missed the train at Gloucester, and had to wait for the next train. The whole case rests on the ticket from Cardiff to Newcastle, and I am of opinion that the mere taking of a ticket does not prove a contract that a train will arrive at the time when it is expected. The train, no doubt, was expected to arrive earlier than it did, and if the train-bill had been put in evidence we should have seen what the contract was as to its arrival. No special contract arises from mere talk with officials, casual talk with an official whose duty may merely be to open or shut the doors of the carriages; and indeed all that the porter says is that the train is late. It is quite consistent with all that appears in this case that the duty of the defendants may have been fulfilled, and it lies with the plaintiff to shew that it has not.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff has suffered in consequence of the train not leaving Cardiff at the precise hour at which it was expected, or at such an hour as would fit the departure of a particular train from Gloucester which went on direct to Newcastle. And the question is, whether the company entered into such a contract, or undertook such a duty as to oblige them to have the train at Cardiff in time for the plaintiff to go on by the next train from Gloucester to Newcastle. This depends, first, on the wording of the plaintiff's ticket, and, secondly, on the other facts. As to the first, the language of the ticket is simply that the defendants will convey the plaintiff from Cardiff to Newcastle, and there is no statement beyond the fact that the journey will be by the Midland Railway. And the only duty which the law attaches to such a contract (taking the ticket as the contract) is, that the passenger shall be carried in a reasonable time. As to the second, the only other circumstance is, the evidence that the train ought to have arrived at 4.34 P.M. That means that it was due then. And the question arises whether the defendants warranted its arrival, or whether it was merely due then in the ordinary course without any warranty. The plaintiff must shew the duty of the defendants by evidence; and the only evidence would be either the statement by an authorized official of the company that the train would so start, or such obvious proof as the train-bill of the company,—evidence such as was given in the case of Denton v. the Great Northern Railway Company (1). It clearly lay on the plaintiff to give that evidence. The saying that the train is due is ambiguous, and open to either of the constructions I have just mentioned, viz., that the defendants warranted its arrival or that it was due in the ordinary course without warranty; and it lay on the plaintiff to clear this up. I am of opinion that both the merits and the law are with the defendants.

(1) 5 E. & B. 860; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 129.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an important case as it affects every railway ticket in the kingdom. I find here no evidence of a guarantee that the train will arrive at a particular time, and indeed there is no statement of it even in the declaration. The ticket is the only proof which has been given of the contract, and it affords no evidence in support of such guarantee, for it is silent on the matter, and only proves a contract for the employment of reasonable care for the fulfilment of the contract of carriage. If the plaintiff wanted to prove such a guarantee, he should have put the time-table in evidence, which might perhaps have proved it. Without the conversation at the station there would be no evidence even of when the train was expected to start, and that is no evidence of a warranty by the defendants.

SMITH, J.—I am of opinion that the contract was to carry in a reasonable time with reference to the usual trains of the company as shewn in the train-bills. It is perfectly clear from the correspondence that there were train-bills. The correspondence was either in evidence, and evidence of the contents of the train-bills, or it was not: if it was not, there was no evidence of the contents of the train-bills; if it was, it shews that the plaintiff is out of court, for it shews that they contained an express stipulation that the company did not guarantee the arrival and departure of the trains at the times specified, and would not be responsible for delay.

Rule absolute.

1865. } BUTTERWORTH v. BROWNLOW
June 19. } AND ANOTHER.

Carrier—Arrangement between Bailor and Sub-Carrier.

A, a carrier, was in the habit of carrying goods for B; the ordinary course was to deliver the goods to B. immediately on their arrival at M, where B. carried on business. B. requested A. to employ C. as his agent, and afterwards, without notice to A, arranged with C. not to deliver in due course, but to give him notice of the arrival of the goods, and to keep them till he sent for them. C. on one occasion forgot to give notice per-suant to this arrangement, and B. brought his action against A. for such neglect:—Held, that A. was not liable.

This was a case stated on appeal from the decision of the Judge of the County Court of Lancashire, and the facts were briefly as follows.—

The plaintiff was a cotton-waste dealer at Manchester. The defendants were carriers, who undertook to carry from Lille, and other places abroad, to Manchester and other places in England, at certain through-rates. The defendants principally carried on their business by means of other carriers, with whom they made their own arrangements; they themselves, however, making the contract with the customers on their own account as principals. The plaintiff, who had been for some time in the habit of dealing with the defendants, on the 20th of October 1862, requested the defendants in future to send his goods through Messrs. Carver & Co., by route of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, instead of through Messrs. Thompson, McKay & Co., who were usually employed by the defendants, and who used the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway. And from that time the defendants forwarded the plaintiff's goods through Carver & Co. In the ordinary course of business, and in the absence of special instructions to the contrary, Carver & Co., or any other carriers at Manchester, would, immediately on the arrival of the goods there, and without any previous advice of such arrival, deliver them at the warehouse of the consignee. Some time, however, before the transaction out of which the present complaint arose, the plaintiff gave instructions to Carver & Co. that, instead of pursuing the ordinary course of business they were to advise him of the arrival of the goods, and deliver them only on receiving a written or printed order from him to that effect. These instructions were accepted and regularly acted on by Carver & Co.; but the defendants had no notice of their instructions or alteration in the course of business. On the 7th of September 1864, three bags of waste were consigned from Lille to Manchester, in the ordinary way, through the defendants, for the plaintiff, of which the defendants gave him notice. The bags arrived at Manchester in proper time, on the 14th of September, and Carver & Co., in pursuance of the foregoing instructions, did not deliver them, but through some oversight never gave the plaintiff notice of their arrival. The plaintiff made no inquiries about them; but this might have been accounted for by his large business. The value of cotton-waste fell 50% per cent. between the 7th of September and the 1st of October, on which day the plaintiff, without any previous notice to the defendants of the non-arrival, invoiced those three bags to the defendants at their value in the Manchester market on the 7th of September, and sought to recover the sum in the present plaint. The learned Judge decided that the plaintiff, by his instructions to Carver & Co., had been the cause of the defendants' contract to deliver not having been carried out, and that the defendants, not having had notice of such instructions, were not bound to advise the plaintiff of the arrival of the goods in any other way than by their delivery, and were not liable in this action.

Holkar, for the appellant.—Carver & Co. are agents, for whose acts the defendants are liable—Muschamp v. the Lancaster and Preston Junction Railway Company (1); and though the act was beyond the ordinary course of business, they are still liable—Richards v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway (2). Carver & Co. were servants within the principle of Sadler v. Henlock (3), and the analogous cases.

Kemplay, for the respondents, was not called on to argue.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the Judge was right, and that his decision should be affirmed. The action is for not giving notice of the arrival of the goods at Manchester. The plaintiff must have known the ordinary course of business; he gets the defendants to send through Carver & Co., and then gives instructions to Carver & Co. not to deliver in the ordinary course of business, but only on the receipt of his order. The result of what the Judge finds is this, that the defendants were carriers to deliver to the plaintiff, and employed Carver & Co. to carry this out; and that the plaintiff entered into an arrangement with Carver & Co., which was, in fact, an arrangement for warehousing. It is impossible to say the Judge was wrong in this conclusion of fact, whatever the law may be, though as to that I have little doubt.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff says to Carver & Co., "Don't fulfil the contract in ordinary course, but give me notice of the arrival of the goods, and keep them till I send;" the defendant knows nothing at all about this, and thinks that the goods will be delivered in due course; the plaintiff therefore complains of an injury brought about by his own act.

Charter-Party—Freight payable in Advance—Lien—Recovery of Money paid in an Action on an enforced Guarantee.

A, of Alexandria, bought coals of B, of London, which were to be delivered at Alexandria, prior to be paid on delivery of bill of lading, less balance of freight payable at Alexandria. B. chartered C.'s ship to carry the coal, "coal to be delivered on freight being paid, . . . freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo, less advances, in cash, at current rate of exchange, . . . half the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading; owner to insure amount and deposit with charterer the policy and to guarantee the same." The bill of lading was signed, B. gave his acceptance for the half freight, the receipt of the half freight was indorsed on the bill of lading, and the bill of lading was indorsed in blank by B. and given to A. The average length of the voyage was two months; before the ship arrived B. became insolvent, and on arrival of the ship and before the acceptance was due, the master refused to deliver the cargo to A. unless the whole of the freight was paid or payment guaranteed. A guarantee was given by D. for A. under protest, and the cargo was delivered; D. then by A.'s direction refused to pay. An action was brought in the Consular Court against D, who then, by A.'s direction, paid under protest. A. repaid D. C. knew nothing of the arrangement between A. and B.:—Held, that A. was entitled to recover the half freight from C.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned. By consent of the parties and the order of Willes, J., the following case was stated for the opinion of this Court.

CASE.

The plaintiff is a merchant residing at Alexandria, in Egypt, and the defendant a shipowner residing at Sunderland, and owning the ship called the Parthenon.

On the 1st of September 1863 Messrs. Tizinia & Co., of London, as agents for the plaintiff, entered into a contract with Mr. De Mattos, of London, for the purchase of 2,000 tons of steam coal. The contract (which was set out in the case) provided that De Mattos should supply 2,000 tons of certain specified coal, the bills of lading for the entire quantity to be delivered at the end of September in two or more shipments; that Tizinia & Co. should pay on receipt of bill of lading and policy of insurance a certain price, deducting the balance of freight payable at Alexandria, together with a certain commission, the said balance of freight to be paid in cash at Alexandria at the current rate of exchange for three months' bills on London; that the coals should be taken alongside at buyer's risk and expense at a certain rate, and that in case of neglect by De Mattos, Tizinia & Co. might charter vessels for seller's account. In pursuance of this contract, on the 1st of October 1863, De Mattos entered into (amongst others) a charter-party of the Parthenon with the defendant. The charter-party (which was set out at length in the case) provided that the said ship, being tight, &c., should proceed to Sunderland, there load a complete cargo, and therewith proceed to Alexandria, and there deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 30*l.*, 5 guineas gratuity, per keel of 21 tons 4 cwt., taken on board and delivered in full of all port charges, &c., the act of God,

&c. excepted, the cargo to be delivered and be discharged in a specified way; *the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances, in cash, at current rate of exchange; (1) one-half of the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading; owner to insure the amount and deposit with charterer the club policy and to guarantee same; certain working days and demurrage to be paid; ship to be addressed to freighter's agent at port of discharge, paying usual commission; brokerage to be due lost or not lost; ship and freight bound to the venture, and all claim for average to be settled in London by Lloyd's Rules, and a penalty of 700*l.* for non-performance. In accordance with the charter-party, De Mattos shipped 20½ keels (weighing 426 tons 13 cwt.) of coal. The captain signed a bill of lading (set out in the case), which stated that such quantity had been shipped in good order, to be delivered in like good order in a specified way at Alexandria, as the agent for the charterer might direct (the act of God, &c. excepted), unto order or to his assigns; the ship to be discharged in a specified manner, with demurrage as in charter-party, and average accustomed. The freight of this coal at the date in charter-party was 603*l.* 15*s.* On the bill of lading being signed, De Mattos gave his acceptance at three months for 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* in favour of the defendant. The acceptance was dated the 31st of October 1863, and became due the 3rd of February 1864. On the acceptance being given, the defendant's agents indorsed the following receipt on the bill of lading: "Received on account of within freight 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* as per charter-party." De Mattos then gave the plaintiff's agent an invoice shewing what was due for the coals. In this invoice from the price of the coal was deducted the freight at 30*l.* per keel and the gratuity, "less advance on sailing, 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*"; 3*l.* per cent. on the price was added, and a receipt for the balance per cheque acknowledged. On the 28th of October 1863 De Mattos indorsed the bill of lading in blank to Tizinia & Co.,*

who paid the said balance due on invoice by cheque, as above stated, and forwarded the bill of lading to the plaintiff at Alexandria. The defendant had not before action any knowledge of the contract of the 1st of September 1863 between the plaintiff's agent and De Mattos, of the invoice, of the above payment, or of any of the transactions between the plaintiff or his agents and De Mattos. The ship sailed on the 4th of November 1863, and shortly after De Mattos became insolvent, and on the 4th of January 1864 executed a deed under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, without the assent of the plaintiff or the defendant, and on the 1st of February 1864 everything had been done to make such deed effectual. The ship arrived at Alexandria on the 5th of January 1864, and the captain reported her arrival to the plaintiff, and stated he should be ready next day to discharge the cargo. The plaintiff being holder of the bill of lading as such indorsee as above, thereupon took all necessary steps for receiving the cargo, and intimated to the captain that he was prepared to pay the balance of the freight remaining unpaid after deducting the 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* referred to in the receipt in the bill of lading. On the 6th of January 1864 the captain, who on his arrival had learned by letter that De Mattos had suspended payment, refused to deliver the cargo to the plaintiff unless he was paid the full amount of the freight without any deduction, or had a guarantee the payment of the same. The master thereupon claimed a lien on the cargo for the full chartered freight, and detained the cargo till the 20th of January 1864, the plaintiff refusing to make such payment or to give or procure such guarantee. De Mattos's acceptance was at this time in the hands of third parties; it was not paid at maturity, and, before action, was taken up by the defendant. On the 20th of January 1864 Messrs. Barker & Co., at the request of the plaintiff, and to procure delivery of the cargo, gave the following guarantee, as the master still refused to deliver without the payment of the whole freight, or a guarantee of the same: "In consideration of your agreeing at our request to deliver to Mr. Tamvaco the cargo of coals at present on board your ship, we hereby undertake and guarantee that when and so soon as you shall have delivered the said cargo unto the said Mr. Tamvaco, or his order, that we will on demand pay, or cause to be paid, to you in cash the full amount of freight due and payable to you in respect of said cargo without any deduction whatsoever, except commissions due." The master then began to deliver the cargo, and completed such delivery on the 13th of February 1864. On the completion of the delivery (the acceptance had now been dishonoured at maturity) the master applied to the plaintiff for payment of the full freight, and on his refusal applied to Barker & Co.; they, however, by plaintiff's directions, refused, and the master then took proceedings on the guarantee against Barker & Co. in Her Majesty's consular court at Alexandria, which had jurisdiction. The cause proceeded, and a day was fixed for trial; but on the day before such fixed day, viz. on the 7th of March 1864, Barker & Co., by order of the plaintiff, paid the master the whole freight, the plaintiff at the same time protesting against the payment, and serving a copy thereof on the master. The master gave a receipt (set out in the case), which is not material. The plaintiff afterwards, and before action, repaid Barker & Co. The average length of the voyage from Sunderland to Alexandria is two months.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were—

First, whether under the above circumstances the plaintiff was, when the captain refused to deliver the cargo, entitled to have it delivered to him on payment of the balance of freight after deducting 30*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

Secondly, whether, assuming the plaintiff to be entitled to recover in respect of the said refusal to deliver, he is entitled to recover anything, as damages, beyond the damages sustained by him by his being deprived of the possession of the cargo from the time of the said refusal to the time of the cargo being delivered to him.

If the Court shall be of opinion on both points in the affirmative, then the plaintiff to be allowed to sign judgment for 30*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* with costs.

If the Court shall be of opinion on the first point in the affirmative, and on the second point in the negative, then the plaintiff to be allowed to sign judgment for 10*l.* and costs.

If the Court shall be of opinion on the first point in the negative, then the defendant to be at liberty to sign judgment as in case of a nonsuit, with costs.

Mellish (Bidder with him), for the plaintiff.—The first question is, whether the master had a lien beyond the amount of freight payable at Alexandria. If the bill had run out and been unpaid, the question would, no doubt, have been whether the Court would follow Kerchner v. Venus (1), where the Privy Council decided that the contract for carriage was such as to prevent any lien, acting on Howe v. Kerchner (2), and against Gilks v. Middleton (3).

[WILLIAMS, J.—They thought they were acting contrary to that case, but in truth they were not.]

But here the bills were still running. The case with which Kerchner v. Venus (1) really conflicts is Neish v. Graham (4). Secondly, what are the damages? If the payment had been in money, it could have been recovered back, and the taking a guarantee makes no difference.

Manisty (Lewens with him), for the defendant.—The defendant knew nothing of what took place between De Mattos and the plaintiff, and therefore that is out of the case. The question is, whether the ordinary lien for freight was waived? The words of the charter-party are "deliver the same on being paid freight, . . . the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances in cash" (the words "for ship's use," which generally follow, being struck out), "at the current rate of exchange"; and therefore, putting the provision as to insurance out of the question, there was an advance, to be returned if the ship be lost; and the defendant therefore is entitled to succeed. Further, that the shipowner was to have an interest in this freight is shewn by his having to insure, which he could not have otherwise done. The cases reported in Moore's Privy Council Cases support the defendant's view. Secondly, when the ship arrived the bill was virtually dishonoured, and therefore the right of lien, even if suspended before, had revived. There is no authority on this point, but it is correct on principle.

[Mellish referred to Aleager v. the St. Katherine's Dock Company (5).]

Thirdly, after the proceedings at law and the payment made therein, the money is not recoverable; and there was no protest on the 20th of January, when alone it could have been available. Assuming that this point does not go to the root of the case, but only to the amount of the damages, still only the damage arising from the detention, excluding the guarantee, is recoverable; the money paid on that cannot be recovered, for that would be getting indirectly what cannot be got directly; and it could not have been got directly when on action brought the claim was not disputed, but paid—see the notes to Marriott v. Hampton (6).

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. The first question is, whether the shipowner under the circumstances, particularly the insolvency of De Mattos, had a lien, not only as to the half of the freight payable at Alexandria, but also as to the half which had been paid by a bill of exchange in pursuance of the charter-party, which provides "one-half of the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading, owner to insure the amount and deposit with the charterer the club-policy, and to guarantee the same"? This bill became due on the 3rd of February; the ship arrived in January, and in the mean time, and before her arrival, De Mattos had become bankrupt, and the bill was sure to be dishonoured, and it was certain that only a portion of its amount would be realized. Before the bill became due, the consignee of the bill of lading, on which was a receipt stating that half the freight had been paid as per charter-party, demanded the goods and offered the remaining half of the freight. The master, knowing of the insolvency of De Mattos, refused to deliver up the cargo, unless the whole freight were paid in cash or guaranteed. The plaintiff, in order to get the cargo, yielded, and procured from Barker & Co. the undertaking set out in the case, and which, looking to the circumstances of the case, was clearly intended to apply, not to the half, but the whole of the freight. The cargo was then delivered, and the delivery was completed on the 13th of February; and no new right accrued because of the previous demand and refusal to deliver. Subsequently, the master insisted on payment of the full freight. A suit was brought on the guarantee in the consular court against Barker & Co., who, on consideration, did not raise the present defence, but paid under protest the amount in dispute, viz. 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* The question is, whether the plaintiff, who has repaid Barker & Co., is entitled to recover this sum from the defendant the shipowner? and I conceive that he is. It is necessary to see what the rights of the shipowner were under the charter-party, and whether the master was right in detaining the goods. Assuming that there was no such right, there will arise another question, whether the subsequent transactions took away the right of the consignee? I entertain no doubt as to the effect of the clause in the charter-party; the words "in cash" were not intended to qualify "advances," but are to be taken in connexion with "at current rate of exchange." We have no assistance here from mercantile usage, none is stated in the case. The clause is "the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances, in cash, at current rate of exchange." If this be read "less advances in cash," there is no provision in the charter-party to which this can apply; to hold that it referred to advances for ship's use would be nonsense, for not only is there no provision for them, but the words "for ship's use," which stood in the form, are actually struck out. As I have already said, we have no assistance here from mercantile usage or practice, nor have we any from the form which has been handed up to us. But we find the charter does deal with advances not in cash, "one half of the freight to be advanced by the freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading," and therefore we are bound, in order to give effect to the charter-party, to read "advances" as applying to this advance of the half freight, and not to advances in cash. The words then read "freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo (less advances) in cash at current rate of exchange," and this makes the whole sensible, and gives effect to all the words. And this is not inconsistent with a mercantile transaction where credit is wanted, and a bill therefore is given, the shipowner saying to the charterer, "You shall pay half the freight three months hence, but must give me a negotiable instrument." Mr. Manisty's argument on the other words prevents me from giving any opinion as to whether the half freight is properly a loan to be restored, or whether, in case of loss of the ship, the loss is to fall on the charterer. I incline to the latter construction, but give no opinion, as it is not necessary. The refusal, then, to deliver having been whilst the bill was running, the plaintiff is therefore entitled to sue in trover, unless the transactions at Alexandria affect this right. The plaintiff is, prima facie, entitled to recover the value of the goods; and also where they are detained on an unfounded claim of lien he may pay the money and take the goods, and then recover the money he has so paid. The distinction between a payment, or a transaction in the nature thereof, and a contract entered into on duress of goods, is well put in Byles on Bills, 109; and, here, if the whole freight had been paid in money by the plaintiff, he might recover it. But, instead of this, a guarantie is given by Barker & Co., who, as strangers to the transaction, engage to pay the whole freight in consideration of the delivery of goods to which they are not entitled themselves, but under circumstances which entitle them to be recouped by the plaintiff. Barker & Co. are obliged thereby to pay the whole; and therefore the settlement of the action against them was wise. Assume they had engaged to deliver a specific chattel, performance could not be resisted by shewing part only of the freight was due; so, here, the matter depended on whether, on the construction of the contract, they did not guarantee payment of the whole freight; they did, and it was wise to settle. But, then, it is insisted that, looking to the contract, the action on it, and the payment in the action, the money paid is not recoverable. The master refused to deliver unless the money was paid or a guarantie given. What was the character of this transaction? Was it to settle the dispute? It was certainly binding and final in one sense, that the master was to receive the whole freight. But was it final so as to allow the retention of the sum extorted? I apprehend that what the master suggested was not a final agreement to settle the dispute, but a suggestion to get the money, or a guarantie, he not to be in a better position by a guarantie being given instead of the money. By law the plaintiff in trover is, prima facie, entitled to recover the whole value of the goods; but if the defendant gives up the goods, this is to be taken into account. Here we have a middle case; here the goods are given up, but so that the plaintiff is 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* out of pocket; a jury might find a verdict for this sum, and, therefore, our judgment is for the plaintiff for that amount.

(5) 14 Mee. & W. 794; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 34.

(6) 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 237.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the bill of exchange for the half freight was to fall due after the voyage, it is clear no lien was contemplated for that amount—Horncastle v. Farran (7) and Alsager v. the St. Katherine's Dock Company (5). Here, there was no advance in the nature of prepayment of freight when the bill fell due; the debt would, no doubt, revive, but it is another thing to say that the lien does. This bill was not due till after the time for delivery; if that be so, there was no right to detain the goods quoad the amount of the bill. The plaintiff enters into an agreement, as to which it is not necessary to decide, whether there was good consideration. By this agreement, he says to the master, "If you will deliver the goods, I will pay the whole freight; you shall be depositary of that sum, and the dispute shall hereafter relate to that money and not to the goods. I will give the cash subject to future adjudication, and I give this agreement under protest." The parties, therefore, were, in my opinion, just where they were before, and I think it a very plain case.

Judgment for the plaintiff for Bargain and Sale—Delivery on Board Ship—Passing of Property.

A. bought coal of B, to be shipped in a ship chartered by A, payment in cash against bill of lading in the hands of B's agent. Before shipment A. sold to the plaintiff, and at the time of both sales the coal was unascertained. The coal was shipped and three bills of lading signed for delivery to A. or order; one only was stamped and retained by B, another was sent to A. Not being paid, B. sent the stamped bill of lading to the defendant and the captain delivered the coal to him:—Held, that the plaintiff had no right of action against the defendant.

In this case the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the conversion of a cargo of coal; and the following facts were proved at trial.

On the 9th of December 1864, at Hull, a person named Pope bought of a person named Josse a quantity of coal, and a great deal of evidence, oral and written, was given at the trial in order to shew the terms of the sale, the defendant contending that by the terms of this sale there was to be "payment in cash against bill of lading in the hands of Josse's agent in London," and that it was not the intention of the parties that the property in the goods should pass till payment. The coal at the time of the contract was lying undistinguished in a heap at Josse's yard, containing a much larger quantity than that contracted for, and it was to be shipped on board a vessel, which was chartered by Pope in his own name and on his own behalf, to carry it to London. On the 13th of December, whilst the whole or all but a very small portion of the coal was still undistinguished, Pope sold the coal he had contracted for to the plaintiff on the Coal Exchange in London. The plaintiff resold on the same day at a higher price, and before action had paid Pope. By the 19th of December the coal was shipped and the captain signed three bills of lading, stating the coal was to be delivered to "Pope or order" on being paid freight and demurrage as by charter-party. One only of these bills was stamped, and this Josse retained; the second, together with an invoice and a letter announcing the loading, was sent on the 19th of December to Pope, who received them next day. Josse not being able to get his money from Pope, sent the stamped bill of lading to the defendant, his agent, with directions to stop the delivery of the coal, and the captain, under the defendant's directions, refused to deliver to those claiming through Pope, and the defendant himself took the cargo.

The jury found that the sale was for cash, and the learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and gave the defendant leave to move to set this verdict aside and enter one for himself, on the grounds that on the facts admitted and proved the defendant was entitled to the verdict, that the defendant had a right to stop the coals in transitu, and that neither Pope nor the plaintiff had any right to the property and possession of the coals.

A rule nisi having been obtained pursuant to such leave,

D. D. Keane and Barnard now shewed cause.—The bill of lading is "to Pope or order," and not in blank; there is also the invoice and letter. All these documents are sent to Pope. It cannot be said, therefore, that the property did not pass by the delivery on board Pope's ship; at all events as respects a third person, who has bought for value in the public market, it would be a fraud to hold that the property did not pass. In the case of Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Dock Company (1) the circumstances were very different. And Joyce v. Swan (2) is in our favour.

Russell and Thesiger, in support of the rule.—When the plaintiff bought the goods they were unascertained and the documents not in Pope's possession. The contract was, that the property should not pass till the money had been paid; this has been found by the jury; and the effect of the delivery depends on the intention of the parties—Blackburn on Sales, 135, Brandt v. Bowlby (3).

[WILLES, J.—It is a question for the jury—Smith's Mercantile Law, 300, Van Casteel v. Booker (4).]

Yes, that is clear from Brown v. Hare (5).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The action is brought on the ground that the cargo had vested in Pope. The coals were sold by Josse to Pope, by Pope to Moakes (the plaintiff), and he again passes them on. One material point is, whether Moakes has a better title than his vendor Pope, and I think he has no better title. The rule that a man shall not have a better title than his vendor is not universal, because, for instance, there are cases where, if the goods be in possession of a man as ostensible owner, together with the documents of title, he may be able to confer on a purchaser a better title than he has himself. No such point, however, arises here, because at the time of the treaty between Josse and Pope the goods were unascertained; the treaty was that the property should not pass till the cash was paid, and, whilst the goods are so unascertained, Pope makes the contract with Moakes, who therefore is only in Pope's shoes. Then what, as between Josse and Pope, was the intention of the parties? The property in Josse cannot pass out of him unless there be a sale which passes it. Now Josse intended to retain the property till the cash was paid, and if so, the property did not pass; that was clearly the contract. The delivery on board ship had no effect. Even if the delivery had been to Pope, yet it might be only as a warehouseman. As to the difficulty which has been raised about the bills of lading, and as to their allowing Pope to pass as owner, under certain circumstances, such a question might have arisen; but it does not arise here, because when the plaintiff bought the goods they were neither ascertained nor loaded, and therefore there could have been no such bills; and besides, the only stamped bill of lading was retained by Josse, and the effect of an unstamped bill of lading is well known.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I had doubts at one time, because I thought that the goods were sold after they were on shipboard, and after the bills of lading were in Pope's hands; but it appears that at the time of the sale not only were the goods not on board, but they had not been distinguished; therefore no property passed then, and it is now clear from the decided cases that none passed at the time of shipment, because the shipment was not intended to be a delivery. The captain was a sort of supercargo, and (as the jury find) the property was not to pass till all the conditions were satisfied. As to any representations by means of the documents, the plaintiff could not have been misled, for he bought before Pope had them.

KRATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the means used by Josse to retain his property in and control over the goods were very slovenly, but it clearly was the intention that the property should not pass without the cash. The jury have found this, and their finding seems in accordance with the evidence. The means adopted were slovenly, for circumstances might have arisen which might have placed Josse in a precarious position. Because there was a stamp only on one of the bills of lading, he thought himself amply secured. Yet, if unstamped bills of lading had been produced to a subsequent purchaser in the market, the effect might have been to raise questions which might have jeopardized Josse's rights. It turns out, however, that the plaintiff contracted with Pope on the 13th of December, and it was not until the 19th of December that the goods were ascertained and shipped.

Rule absolute.

1865. } TRAYES AND ANOTHER v.
June 8. } WORMS.

Ship and Shipping—Charter-Party—Insurance—Advanced Freight—General Average.

*The defendant chartered a vessel, freight to be paid in bills at six months' date from date of sailing or in cash (less discount equal thereto), less, in either case, the cost of insurance, to be effected by charterers at ship's expense, and also 800*l.* to be paid on delivery of cargo:—Held, that such advanced* freight was not to be returned, and that the defendant was liable to contribute to general average in respect thereof.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover (as appeared by the declaration) money payable for certain general average alleged to have become payable in respect of goods on a voyage of a ship called the Hibernia, and in respect of certain loss, damages and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs, in and about the preservation of the ship and cargo and the said goods from damage and loss, and for general average for and in respect of money paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs, before completion of the voyage, by way of advance of freight, and for losses, damages and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in and about the preservation of ship and cargo and freight from damage and loss. There were also counts for money paid and money claimed to be due on accounts stated.

The defendant pleaded never indebted, payment, the Statute of Limitations, and a special plea setting up the American judgment afterwards mentioned.

The plaintiffs joined issue and demurred to the last plea.

The amount claimed by the plaintiffs on the writ was 1,007*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.*, together with interest at 4*l.* per cent. per annum, from the 29th of June 1854.

After issue joined by consent of the parties and by order of Byles, J., dated the 11th of January 1864, the following case was stated for the opinion of the Court, pursuant to the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided.

CASE.

On the 21st of April 1853 E. Oliver, the then owner of the ship Hibernia, through his agents, Parry, Brown & Co., effected a charter of the said ship to the defendant, whereby it was agreed that the said ship, being tight, &c., should, with all possible despatch, proceed to Bute Dock, Cardiff, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load from the factors of the said affreighters a full and complete cargo of steam coal; captain taking sufficient coal for ship's use independent of the cargo, same to be indorsed on the bills of lading; cargo to be brought and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, and not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions and furniture; and being so loaded should therewith proceed to San Francisco or any of the landing-places within the waters of San Francisco, or Sacramento, within one day's sail of the former, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight at and after the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* British sterling per ton of 20 cwt. delivered, ship to be addressed to charterers' agent at port of discharge on usual terms for doing the ship's business. (The act of God, &c., excepted.) The freight to be paid by good and approved bills on London at six months' date from date of sailing, less cost of insurance to be effected by the charterers at ship's expense, or in cash, under discount equal thereto, at charterers' option, less, in either case, 800*l.*, which was to be paid on delivery of cargo in cash at the current rate of exchange, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 10*l.* per day. Penalty for non-performance of the agreement 5,000*l.* The vessel to be loaded at the quickest turn obtainable with Powell & Wayne or Thomas & Joseph, and discharged at rate of not less than 20 tons per working day on being ready to deliver.

The defendant, under the said charter-party, loaded the ship with a cargo of coals, consisting of 1,246 tons, and a bill of lading was duly signed for the same by the master of the said ship, which stated that they were shipped in good order and condition for H. Worms, and were to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the port of San Francisco (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatever nature and kind excepted), unto H. Worms or order, on being paid freight for said coals as per charter-party, with primage and average accustomed.

Agreeably to the terms of the said charter-party, the defendant, in payment of the freight payable under the said charter-party less the sum of 800*l.* mentioned therein, payable on delivery of the cargo, gave two bills of exchange, amounting together to the sum of 4,518*l.* 6*s.*, being the balance of the freight, less the insurance thereon, which amounted to the sum of 288*l.* 14*s.*, and thereupon the master indorsed on the said bill of lading the following receipt—“Received of Mr. H. Worms the sum of four thousand eight hundred and seven pounds sterling, on account of the within freight, viz:

By two bills on London, each of 2,259 l. 3 s. , together . . .	4,518	6	0
Insurance, 5% on each 144 l.
7 s. , together . . .	288	14	0
	£4,807	0	0

Said amount of 4,807*l.* to be deducted from the freight at San Francisco.

(Signed) John Cleverley.”

Both the said bills of exchange were paid at maturity. On the 14th of July, 1853, the said E. Oliver transferred the said ship and the benefit of the said charter to the plaintiff Traves; and he, on the 26th of October, 1853, transferred eight sixty-fourths of the said ship to the plaintiff Williams. The ship, shortly after the shipment of her cargo, sailed on the voyage mentioned in the said charter-party, and during such voyage sustained considerable damage, and was for the safety of the general adventure compelled to and did put into Valparaiso, where she arrived on the 7th of January, 1854, and remained until March, 1854. Expenses were necessarily incurred at Valparaiso in the repair of the ship, the particulars of which appeared in the average statement hereinafter mentioned, and it was agreed between the parties that the portion put down to general average in such statement were general average charges. The master of the said ship not having funds at his command to defray the expenses, on the 10th of March, 1854, properly borrowed the requisite amount at Valparaiso, and duly executed a bottomry bond, on behalf of himself and the said E. Oliver, the owner, and for whomsoever might be owner or owners of the said ship, to Robertson Brothers, of Valparaiso, merchants, in the penal sum of twenty-six thousand dollars of lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to Edward D. Heatley & Co., of San Francisco, in California, in London, merchants, as agents for the said

Robertson Brothers, their certain attorney or agent, executors, administrators or assigns, or order, for which payment well and truly to be made he bound himself, the said ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture and appurtenances, the cargo of coals on board and the freight to be earned on the voyage, and hypothecated the said ship, together with all her tackle, apparel, furniture and appurtenances, the said cargo and freight.

After the completion of the repairs, the ship proceeded on her voyage to San Francisco, where she arrived in June, 1854, and duly delivered the cargo. The plaintiffs, after hearing of the injury sustained by the Hibernia, transmitted to San Francisco the sum of 1,000*l.* towards defraying the bottomry bond executed at Valparaiso. On the 16th of May, 1854, the plaintiffs entered into the following contract with one William James :

“Messrs. Valentine Traves and Bethuel Williams sell, and William James, of Liverpool, buys the ship Hibernia, now supposed to be on her passage from Valparaiso to San Francisco, on the following conditions, viz., that the ship is to be transferred to the purchaser at once by bill of sale, and in case she is net sold at San Francisco, or no heavy expenses incurred there upon her previous to the arrival of the person sent out by him, he is to take possession of her in the purchaser's name, and he, W. James, is to become the sole registered owner; but it is understood that one-eighth of the said ship is still to belong to the original owners, viz., say one-eighth of the net value of the ship and freight, after she is discharged in Cadiz and all expenses upon her are paid, is to belong to them; but in case the ship does not become the property of the said William James, any expense which he may be put to in sending a person out to San Francisco, interest of money, or otherwise, is to be refunded him by the present owners. In taking possession of the said ship, the 1,000*l.* already remitted to San Francisco by the present owners, with any balance of freight which may be due there (supposed to be about 800*l.*) is to become the purchaser's, and also any insurance which is now due, or may hereafter become due either in this country or New York, on said ship or freight, and all freight on the return voyage, subject to the above reservation, or any other thing connected with the said ship, is to become his also; and on payment for the said ship, the purchaser is to discharge the bottomry bond now upon her for 3,700*l.*, say about three thousand seven hundred pounds liabilities, in Cardiff, to Messrs. Parry, Brown & Co., Batehlor Brothers and the bank there, together about 1,500*l.*, all wages and expenses on the voyage and 500*l.* to the present owners, by his acceptance at six months from receiving advices of the said ship having left the port of San Francisco, and all right in the existing charter is transferred with the said ship also.

"Mem. Everything paid to be debited the ship and everything received to be credited her (with interest for and against), and one-eighth of the balance to belong to the original owners, the other seven-eighths to me; but nothing except what is named now. I to be liable for and only what wages may be due to the crew on the termination of the voyage."

And the said ship was, on the said 16th of May, 1854, transferred to the said William James by bill of sale, (a copy of which was appended to the case).

Disputes subsequently arose with reference to the said contract between the plaintiffs and the said William James, which gave rise to proceedings at law and in equity; and on the 2nd of August, 1855, the following agreement was entered into by the plaintiffs and the said William James:

"An agreement, made this 2nd of August, 1855, between Bethuel Williams, of Aberdare, in the county of Glamorgan, merchant, and Valentine Traves, of Cardiff, in the same county, broker, of the one part, and William James, of Liverpool, merchant of the other part. Whereas certain differences have arisen between the parties hereto as to the performance of an agreement between them, dated the 16th of May, 1854, and proceedings at law and in equity are now pending between them in reference thereto, and they have this day agreed upon certain terms hereinafter set forth, whereby all proceedings are to be stayed, and all questions whatever under the said agreement and otherwise between the parties settled. Now, the said Bethuel Williams and Valentine Traves on the one part, and the said William James on the other part, agree with each other as follows:

1. That all proceedings at law and in equity between them be stayed.

2. That each side pays his own costs of such proceedings.

3. That the said Bethuel Williams and Valentine Traves discharge the said William James from any claim in respect of the one-eighth of the ship Hibernia, say the one-eighth of the net value of the said ship and freight, reserved to them by the said agreement, and that the said William James is to be sole and absolute owner of the said vessel.

4. The said Bethuel Williams and Valentine Traves release the said William James from the liability to pay them or give them a bill of exchange for 500*l.*, as mentioned in the aforesaid agreement.

5. That the said William James has this day given to the said Bethuel Williams and Valentine Traves a bill of exchange at six months date for 750*l.* as the remaining full consideration under the aforesaid and this present agreement.

6. That the said William James hereby releases the said Valentine Traves from all claims under certain bills of exchange, making together 6,000*l.*"

After the ship's arrival at San Francisco an average statement was duly made out in accordance with the law, but this statement is not to preclude either party from raising the question,—who is to contribute in respect of freight? (A copy of the said average statement formed part of the case.) In the month of July, 1854, James paid the amount of the said bottomry bond given at Valparaiso, and this action is brought by and prosecuted for the benefit of the said James. The defendant, by himself or his agents, duly paid the 800*l.*, the balance of the freight, and also the sum of $912 charged on the cargo in the said average statement. The said James took proceedings in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California. (A copy of the proceedings in that Court and of the judgment pronounced therein formed part of the case.) The money directed by such judgment to be paid was forthwith paid. The defendant on the 21st and 25th of July 1853 effected two policies of insurance in France for 130,000 francs on advances made on freight of the cargo by the said ship for the said voyage from Cardiff to San Francisco, with faculty to call at any or all ports in the southern seas. The policy is stated to provide for reimbursement of the advances in all cases of fortune of the seas which might have for consequence the deprival of the said advances from the person assured. (Copies of the original policies formed part of the case.) The above were the only policies effected in respect of the advances. (The pleadings formed part of the case; and a demurrer to the fourth plea was argued on the 26th of April, 1861, when the Court held the fourth plea bad and the second count of the declaration good. The judgment of the Court will be found reported in the 10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. p. 149.)

The Court is to have power to draw any inferences of fact from the facts hereinbefore stated which a jury might draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover all or any part of the money claimed by them? If the Court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs as the Court may direct for such sum as the Court may think fit, together with costs of suit; but if the Court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nolle prosequi shall be entered for the defendant, with costs of defence.

During the argument it was arranged that the amount should be settled by a Judge at chambers, if the parties could not agree.

Sir G. Honyman (M'Leod with him), for the plaintiffs.—First, if the money advanced was to be returned, there would be no insurable interest; but the charter-party provides that freight (except 800*l.*) is to be payable, "less cost of insurance to be effected by charterer at ship's expense," and therefore this money was not to be returned, and on the loss of the ship the money is gone, and not recoverable. Secondly, the principle of general average adjustment is, that all the parties interested in the adventure for the benefit of which the loss was incurred should be sufferers by the loss in exact proportion to the extent of their respective interests, but no further—Arnould on Insurance, s. 343; here the expense was incurred for the benefit of all, whether interested in ship, cargo or freight, and the defendant being interested in this unreturnable freight must contribute in respect of it. Either the charterer insures (under this policy) so as to be reimbursed by the insurers on the occurrence of a loss, or he does not; if he does, it would be unjust that he should not contribute; if he does not, it is his own fault. Such an interest must contribute—Stevens and Benecke on Average, p. 215. The shipowner having paid is entitled to be recouped—Arnould on Insurance, s. 344, and the law of San Francisco does not apply, as the contribution is due at the moment of the outlay—Arnould on Insurance, s. 349.

Mellish and Milward, for the defendant.—First, this freight was returnable; the charter-party says that freight is to be paid at so much per ton "delivered." It is true that the provision as to payment by bills, "less 800*l.*, which is to be paid on delivery of cargo," is rather contradictory to the former provisions; but they are to be, and can only be, reconciled by saying that the freight depends on the delivery.

[WILLES, J.—Has it not been repeatedly held that a charterer's insuring is a conclusive test as to the return of the money!]

[Sir G. Honyman.—Yes, Hicks v. Shield (1).]

Secondly, whether this be so or not, yet the defendant is not liable to contribute—Phillips on Insurance, s. 1404.

ERLE, C.J.—The rule of contribution is undisputed. As to the advanced freight, it was not to be returned; the charterer is the person interested in it, either as an interest in the freight, or as an interest in the increased value of the goods, and he must therefore contribute in respect of it.

WILLES, J.—The first question is concluded by the charter-party; this advanced freight was insured, and therefore it is not to be returned, but the charterer must proceed against the underwriters. The second question is, whether a person who has thus advanced money on account of freight is liable to contribute to general average. I am of opinion that he is. This is not a question between underwriters, in which case it might then be a question whether this is to be considered an interest in the cargo or in the freight; but here, however that may be, the charterer is interested in having the goods carried. The general law of general average is, that the sacrifice shall be contributed to by those who are interested. The charterer here was interested in the cargo and the freight, just as if these goods had been partly his own goods and partly the goods of others for whom he was carrying for hire, in which case the sum payable to him, though not strictly freight, might be insured as such and would contribute. I am therefore clearly of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The charterer is as it were a purchaser of a part of the freight, and is liable to lose it by the loss of the ship, and he should therefore contribute. He may also be said to have an interest in the increased value of his goods, and be called on to contribute on this ground.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. This advance was not to be returned; the charterer therefore had an interest in the arrival of the vessel, and is liable to contribute.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition-Deed—Covenant by Sureties, void or voidable.

By a composition-deed made between an insolvent, the defendants as sureties, the plaintiff as trustee, and the body of creditors, the defendants covenanted to pay to the plaintiff certain instalments; and it was provided that, as between them and the creditors, the defendants should be deemed principal debtors, also that on non-payment of the instalments, adjudication of bankruptcy against the insolvent, or any different arrangement by him with his creditors, the release, the deed, and all its clauses and provisions should be at an end and void. After payment of the first instalment the insolvent was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for the second instalment,—Held, that “void” meant “voidable” at election, and that the defendants were liable.

This was an action for breach of covenant; and without pleadings, there was stated for the opinion of the Court the following

CASE.

One T. H. Palmer being in difficulties, an indenture was made between him of the first, the defendants of the second, the plaintiffs of the third, and the said T. H. Palmer's creditors of the fourth part; and was executed by T. H. Palmer, the defendants, the plaintiff, and the requisite number of creditors. This indenture, after reciting that T. H. Palmer was unable to pay in full, and had proposed a composition of 7s. 6d. in the pound, to be paid to the plaintiff as trustee in three equal instalments, at four, eight, and twelve months after registration of the indenture under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the defendants to be securities for the payment, witnessed that the parties of the first and second parts jointly and severally covenanted with the plaintiff that they would pay him 2s. 6d. in the pound on T. H. Palmer's debts, at or before the expiration of four months from the said registration, a like sum at or before eight months, and a like sum at or before twelve months after the same; that such money was to be applied in payment of the said debts; that the creditors released and discharged the said T. H. Palmer from their debts, &c.; provided always, that though as between the said T. H. Palmer and the parties of the second part the latter were sureties only for repayment of the composition, nevertheless, as between them and the creditors, they, the parties of the second part, should be deemed and taken to be principal debtors, so that they should not be discharged from liability by reason of time being given to, or any arrangement being made with T. H. Palmer, without their consent, or by reason of any other circumstance which might have the effect of discharging them, if only sureties; provided always that the indenture should not prejudice the rights of the creditors against sureties, or on any securities, but, nevertheless, so that on any security being realized by a creditor, the composition was to be paid only in respect of the remainder of his debt; provided always, "that in case default should be made in payment of any or either of the said instalments of the said composition, or any part thereof, or in case before the said composition should be fully paid to the said W. Hughes (the plaintiff) as aforesaid, the said T. H. Palmer should be adjudicated bankrupt, or make or attempt to make any assignment of his estate for the benefit of his creditors, or any arrangements with his creditors different to this present arrangement, then and in any of such cases these presents and the release and every other clause and provision therein contained should be thenceforth at an end and void" (without prejudice to any act which might have been done by the trustee), and the creditors should be at liberty to sue or prove for the amount of their debts still unpaid; and that the deed was intended to be within the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

The said indenture was duly registered, and the first instalment duly paid. Afterwards and before the second instalment became due, the said T. H. Palmer was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. This action was brought to recover the second instalment. None of the creditors had elected to treat the deed as void, nor had any of them proved under the bankruptcy, and after the adjudication they met and resolved that they would not treat the deed as void against the sureties, but would hold them jointly and severally liable to pay the balance of the composition. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the defendants were discharged from liability on their covenant.

Anstie, for the plaintiff, contended that the deed was not void, but voidable only at the election of the plaintiff and the creditors, and cited Hyde v. Watts (1), Doe d.

Bryant v. Banks (2), Roberts v. Dawy (3), Arnsby v. Woodward (4), and Pennington v. Cardale (5).

J. Brown, for the defendants, contended that the bankruptcy made the deed void, inasmuch as bankruptcy was not a wrongful act, was generally under pressure, only substituted another mode of distribution, and (by taking the property) prevented the defendants from recouping themselves, and also destroyed equality if the deed was to be still in force.

Anstie, in reply.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. The action is brought to recover the second instalment payable under a deed made between an insolvent, the defendants, the plaintiff, and the creditors, whereby the defendants covenant jointly and severally with the plaintiff to pay him three instalments, and by which it is provided, that though as between the insolvent and themselves they are to be sureties, yet as between them and the creditors they are to be deemed principal debtors. In consideration of this undertaking the creditors release their debts, subject, however, to this condition, on which the present question turns, "That in case default shall be made in payment of any or either of the said instalments, or in case before the said composition shall be fully paid to the said W. Hughes (the plaintiff), the said T. H. Palmer (the insolvent) shall be adjudicated bankrupt, or make or attempt to make any assignment of his estate for the benefit of his creditors, or any arrangements with his creditors different to this present arrangement, then these presents and release and every other clause and provision herein contained shall be henceforth at an end and void." It appears that one instalment was paid, that the said T. H. Palmer was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition, that the subsequent instalment became due, and that the defendants were called on to pay it, but that they refuse to do so, and say that by the bankruptcy the said condition came into operation, and they were discharged from their covenant. And the question is whether the bankruptcy had such an effect. To determine this, we must take the whole of the provisions, and see whether the intention was that the deed should be void as respects all parties on the acts being done which are contained in this condition, or whether the condition means that the deed is to be voidable as against such parties as are guilty of default, the remedies of the others being still preserved, as in the case of leases containing clauses of re-entry, &c., conditions which, however strong in words, are now held must be construed to operate only on the election of the landlord. The question is whether the present condition falls within that class. We must on principle give effect to the language in accordance with the scope of the deed and the real intention of the parties, and I am of opinion that in the present case "void" must be taken to mean "voidable" at the election of the parties not in default. Examples may be given to shew the justice of this. A condition may be that a deed shall be void on the performance of an act which is an indifferent one, such as the condition in a lease for twenty-one years that it shall expire on notice; there the notice is an indifferent act, and the lease may be ended by the act of either party. Now take the case of a condition that a lease shall be void in default of the payment of the rent or of repairing; in such a case to say that the lease thereon is absolutely void would involve a twofold absurdity, viz., that the lease might be ended by the default of one of the parties, and that not only the tenant might end the lease by such default, but also deprive the landlord of his remedies for breach of covenants before the default. The Courts therefore treat "void" to mean void for the benefit of the person not in default, void at his election. As to the election in the present case, it may be a question whether it must be joint or not, all agreeing to be represented by the trustee, yet each having a separate interest; on this I express no opinion, but content myself with referring to Co. Litt., 145, a. I see no difficulty in saying that the doctrine which has been applied to leases should apply here, and it is not necessary to decide whether the election is to be by all the creditors, by the majority, or by one. Having compared the present case with the case of a lease with a similar condition, I should have thought that enough to decide the question. However, there is a further argument. For not only is the case of bankruptcy provided for, but also of the non-payment of the instalments. Now it would be impossible to hold that the deed became absolutely void on such a default; and then, applying the ordinary rule of construction that you recognize words and persons by the company in which they are, you have in the proviso a condition which in leases is held to mean only void on election, and another which clearly depends on election; and I am of opinion that the true construction of the proviso is, that on the happening of the events therein mentioned, the deed is voidable at the election of the creditors.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The cases which have been cited shew "void" may mean "voidable" or "voidable at election." The words here are strong; but they are not so strong as those in Roberts v. Davey (3), "shall cease, determine, and be utterly void and of no effect;" and yet there it was held that "void" only meant "voidable" at the election of the grantor. In this case it is past controversy, and indeed admitted, that "void" means "voidable" as far as the non-payment of instalments. The bankrupt and the sureties engage to pay these instalments, with the proviso "that in case default shall be made in payment of any or either of the said instalments, or in case before the said composition shall be fully paid to the said W. Hughes (the plaintiff), the said T. H. Palmer shall be adjudicated bankrupt or make or attempt to make any assignment of his estate for the benefit of his creditors, or any arrangements with his creditors different from this present arrangement, then these presents and release and every other clause and provision herein contained shall be henceforth at an end and void." Therefore, in the first case "void" clearly means "voidable at election," and all the other cases are cases where the default either is or may be the act of the bankrupt; the condition as to his being adjudicated bankrupt may mean on his own petition, and then even if it can be split it would mean voidable; and as to the condition as to an arrangement, that must be his own act, and "void" there means "voidable."

In every case therefore is comprehended a disabling voluntary act of the bankrupt. The plain object of the deed is, that, in the event of the creditors losing an instalment they shall not be prejudiced by the release.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. After the full exposition given by my learned Brothers, it is only necessary to say that I agree with the reasons they have given.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Feb. 24 ; } JELlicoe v. GARDINER.
March 14. }

Will—Construction—Shifting Clause.

By his will a testator devised the C. estate to the use of his eldest son J. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to his (testator's) second and third sons R. and J. and their issue male, with remainder to every other son of the testator in tail male, with remainder to the first and other sons of his eldest son J. in tail general, with similar limitations in favour of the sons of testator's second and third and other sons, with remainder to the use of the first and other daughters of his eldest son J. in tail male, with similar limitations in favour of the daughters of testator's second and third sons, with remainder to the use of the first and other daughters of his eldest son J. in tail general, with similar limitations in favour of the daughters of testator's second and third sons, with remainder to the use of all and every testator's sons to be thereafter born successively in tail general, with remainder to the use of his eldest daughter E. for life, with remainders over. The will further directed that so often as the G. estates should come to any of the testator's sons or daughters or their issue being in possession of the C. estate, then that the persons next in remainder, according to the limitations in the will, should be entitled to and come into possession of the C. estate for the estate and interest thereby limited to him or her respectively, and so from time to time as often as the event might happen, in such manner and as if the person so becoming possessed of the G. estates had died or was then dead without issue. The testator's eldest son J. came into possession of the G. estates; and by a decree of the Court of Chancery it was declared that the testator's second son R. became entitled to the C. estate for life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with such remainders over as in the will mentioned. R. dying without issue, was succeeded in the C. estate by the testator's third son, who also died without issue. There being no other sons, the testator's eldest daughter E. then claimed the C. estate in preference to the eldest son of J, and contended that the will was to be construed as if J. had died without issue:—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that the shifting clause did not operate to prevent the eldest son of J. from taking the C. estate under the limitation in remainder to his first and other sons in tail general in priority to the testator's daughter E.

Quære—as to the correctness of the decree in Chancery.

This was an appeal against the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reported 15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 170; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 128, affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, reported 12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 568; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 17.

The facts of the case have been very fully set out in the report in the 32 Law J. Rep., and for the present purpose sufficiently appear in the head-note and in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Cairns (Sir Hugh), Manisty, and Udall, for the appellant, the defendant below, argued that the intention of the testator with regard to the shifting clause was, that whenever the G. estates came to any person taking under the will who should be the head of the stirps, the head and issue of that person was to be struck out of the will, and the will to be read as if there was no limitation to that person or any of his issue, until the ultimate limitation to the testator's right heirs might come into effect. That that was the principle upon which Sir William Grant dealt with the case before him; and that by shifting away the estate as if the head of the stirps was without issue, the intention of the testator was carried into effect as a reunion of the two estates was prevented. That the respondent's claim if operative at all was only operative as an executory trust or claim which could not be enforced in law, and that he was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

They referred to Carr v. Lord Erroll (1), and Doe d. Heneage v. Heneage (2).

The Attorney General, Mellish and Quain, for the respondent, were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, at the date of the will of Sir James Gardiner, the testator, the Gardiner estates stood limited under the will of Sir William Gardiner to Sir John Whalley Smythe Gardiner for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to the use of Sir James the testator for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to the first and other daughters of Sir John in tail male, remainder to the use of the first and other daughters of Sir James in tail male, with remainders over. Under these limitations no female issue of any son of Sir James could take or inherit it.

By the will of Sir James Gardiner, the testator, the Clerk Hill estates were devised to trustees in fee upon trust to convey the same to the use of the testator's eldest son James for life, remainder to trustees to preserve the contingent remainder, remainder to the first and other sons of James in tail male, remainder to the testator's son Robert for life, remainder to trustees to preserve the contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of Robert in tail male, remainder to the testator's third son, John Master Whalley, for life, remainder to trustees to preserve, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to every other son of the testator successively in tail male, remainder to the first and other sons of the testator's eldest son James in tail general, with similar remainders in tail general to the first and other sons of the second, third, and every other son of the testator in tail general, with remainder to the first and other daughters of the testator's first and every other son in tail male, with remainder to the use of Elizabeth Jane, the testator's eldest daughter, for life, with divers remainders over. This Elizabeth Jane is the present appellant.

Pausing for a moment, and contrasting the limitations of these two wills, it is apparent that if James, the eldest son of Sir James the testator, had daughters and no son, such daughters would not take under the limitations of the Gardiner estate, but would take the Clerk Hill estate severally and successively in tail male in remainder, anterior to the limitation to the appellant for life. Secondly, it is apparent that if the eldest son of the testator's first son James did not bar the entail, and died leaving daughters only, such daughters would take nothing under the limitations of the Gardiner estates, but would inherit under the limitation in remainder of the Clerk Hill estates to their father in tail general.

We now come to the shifting clause contained in the will of Sir James. By that clause the testator Sir James declares his will and mind to be that his devised estates should not be held or enjoyed by any one of his sons or daughters, or his, her or their issue after such son or daughter, or such his, her or their issue should have come into possession of the estates devised by the will of Sir William Gardiner, but that as often as the estates devised by the will of Sir William should come to the possession of any of his (Sir James's) sons or daughters, or any of their issue, that then the person next in remainder under the limitations of his (Sir James's) will should be entitled to his devised estates, for the estate thereby limited to him or her, and so from time to time, as often as the event might happen, in such manner and as if the person so becoming possessed of the Gardiner estates had died, or was then dead without issue.

It is plain from the first part of this clause that the word "issue" denotes and is limited to such issue as might take or inherit under the limitations of the Gardiner estates, which would not include the daughters of Sir James's first son, or the female issue of a grandson. It is reasonable to put the same meaning upon the word "issue" in the subsequent phrase, "had died or was then dead without issue"; for the testator plainly contemplates that the Gardiner estates would be the supervenient estate, and that the shifting clause would be called into operation by the Gardiner estate accruing under the will of Sir William Gardiner to some person taking the Clerk Hill estate under his own will; and as the guiding intent and object are to prevent unity of possession, the word "issue" ought not to be extended, so as to include issue not capable of taking or inheriting under the limitations of Sir William Gardiner's will. But, further, it is the object of the clause to propel the Clerk Hill estates from the devisee, who shall succeed to the Gardiner estates, to the person next in remainder under the limitations of the Clerk Hill estates; and the words, "as if such devisee 'had died or was then dead without issue,'" are used for this purpose, and denote the assumption or hypothesis necessary for effecting it; but it would be unreasonable to give the words a meaning beyond what is necessary for the intent and object with which they are used. So limited, they denote such issue as would take under the limitations anterior to the devise to "the person next in remainder," and exclude them only from taking under those limitations.

(1) 6 East, 58.

I agree with one of the learned Judges in the Court below that but for Sir William Grant's decree, the words, "had died or was then dead without issue," ought to be read as applicable distributively to the case of tenant for life and tenant in tail. But that construction is negatived by the decree, inasmuch as the son of Sir James No. 2. was made a party to the suit for the purpose of contending that, by reason of his father having succeeded to the Gardiner estates, the Clerk Hill estates were propelled to himself as next in remainder; but it seems to have been decided, and apparently on the words, "was then dead without issue," that the case must be treated as if Sir James the younger had died without leaving any issue inheritable under the limitation to his first and other sons in tail male; and therefore the words "was then dead without issue" were held to apply to the case of a tenant for life of the Clerk Hill estates becoming entitled to the Gardiner estates. Accordingly the decree declares Robert (being the second son of the testator Sir James) to be entitled to have the Clerk Hill estates settled on himself for life without impeachment of waste, save as in the will mentioned, with remainder to Robert's first and other sons in tail male, with such remainders over as are contained in the will of the testator Sir James with respect to the said estates: a declaration which expressly treats all the estates limited by the will of Sir James the testator in remainder expectant on the estate of Robert, as valid and capable of taking effect; and therefore the estates in remainder limited by the will to the first and other sons of James the younger, in tail general, and also the estates limited in remainder to the first and other daughters of Sir James the younger in tail male are treated by the decree as still subsisting and capable of taking effect, which would not be the case if under the shifting clause Sir James the younger, must be considered as having died without issue male or female.

The deed of release and settlement follows the decree, and converts the equitable life estate of Robert Whalley, and all other the estates limited by the will of Sir James, the testator, in remainder thereon, into legal estates. The point, therefore, now raised by the present appellant is inconsistent with this decree, and with the deed of release which was settled in the Master's office under the direction of the Court. The consequences of holding that the words "was then dead without issue," have a larger signification than what is required to pass on the Clerk Hill estate to the said devisee in remainder, would be very unreasonable. Thus, according to such construction, if Sir James the younger had daughters only, such daughters, although not inheritable to the Gardiner estate, would be deprived of the power of taking the Clerk Hill estate under the express gift to the first and other daughters of Sir James the younger in tail male; and so also the first son of Sir James the younger would be deprived of the estate given to him in remainder in tail general, by which his female issue would lose the right to inherit the Clerk Hill estate, although they could never take the Gardiner estates under the limitations in the will of Sir William. The express estates given by the will of Sir James the testator would be taken away and defeated by a construction put on the elastic word "issue" in the shifting clause not required for the object and proper operation of the clause, which ought not to be extended beyond its declared intent and purpose. I have examined, with great care, the learned and able judgment of Mr. Justice Williams, but I think the reasons for putting a limited meaning on the words "without issue," in the shifting clause, predominate.

Two other objections were faintly urged by the appellant, one founded on the Statute of Limitations and the other on an allegation that the respondent had not the legal estate. With respect to the Statute of Limitations, the argument is at variance with the decree of Sir William Grant; for it must be founded on the construction that when the Clerk Hill estate passed from Sir James the younger as tenant for life, it vested in his eldest son James Whalley Smythe Gardiner, who died unmarried on the 11th of October 1837, when the respondent's title accrued, being twenty years before the action of ejectment. But this is not in accordance with the true construction, for the respondent claims under the limitation in remainder to the first and other sons of Sir James the younger in tail general; and with respect to the other suggested difficulty, it seems clear that the whole of the legal estate was conveyed by the trustees of Sir James the testator to uses correspondent with the trust estates declared by his will of the Clerk Hill estate in remainder expectant on the estate for life given to his second son Robert.

I therefore humbly move your Lordships to affirm the judgment and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH. — My Lords, the direction contained in the shifting clause is that as often as the Gardiner estates should by virtue of the will of Sir William come to the possession of any of the testator's sons or daughters, or any of their issue, then the person next in remainder under the limitations of his will should take the Clerk Hill estate, as if the person so succeeding to the Gardiner estates had died without issue. The testator speaks of the Gardiner estates devolving on any of his sons or daughters. This could not have happened, for those estates were devised only to sons in tail male. But the clause may be read as if sons and their issue had alone been mentioned. The question is, what issue is contemplated by the testator under the words "had died without issue"? I think certainly, that issue which stood under the limitations of the will in order before the next remainderman, and so would but for the shifting clause have prevented him from succeeding. There is no intention, express or implied, to alter the limitations, except so far as was necessary for preventing the two estates from coalescing under the limitations of the two wills; and when, therefore, the respondent became entitled to an estate tail under the limitations of the will, subsequent to that under which the remainderman had taken by virtue of the shifting clause, there was nothing in the language of the will preventing him from taking the Clerk Hill estate, for he was not in possession of the Gardiner estates; at all events, was not in possession of them under the will of Sir William, the possession of which was obviously the sole motive influencing the testator to direct that his own estates should go to younger branches of his family.

With respect to the question of the legal estates, I entertain no doubt whatever. The whole of the will, with all its limitations, is set out in extenso, by way of recital, in the conveyance executed under the authority of the Court of Chancery; and though no other uses are in express terms declared, except those to Robert, the son, for life, and to his first and other sons in tail male, this was probably done merely to avoid unnecessary prolixity, the other uses being sufficiently indicated by the general expressions referring to them as previously set out.

I therefore concur with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that the judgment below ought to be affirmed.

LORD CHELMSFORD. — My Lords, I agree with my two noble and learned friends, and think it unnecessary to add anything to what they have said.

Judgment affirmed; and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Game — Property in Animals Feræ Naturæ—Game killed by Trespasser.

Game started and killed wrongfully by one person on the land of another becomes the absolute property of the owner of the land, and not of the captor, though it be killed and carried away in one continuous act.

Quære—Whether there would be any difference if the game were started on the land of one person and killed on that of another.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reported 13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 844; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182, affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, reported 12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 501; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 151.

In October 1860 an action was brought, in the Court of Common Pleas, by the appellant, the plaintiff in the Court below, against the respondents, the defendants in the Court below, for the conversion of the appellant's rabbits, and also for assaulting him and taking them from him by force.

The defendants pleaded that they were not guilty, and that the rabbits were not the plaintiff's; and they pleaded, further, a justification of the assault to get the rabbits from the plaintiff, as being rabbits belonging to their master, the Marquis of Exeter; and issues were joined upon those pleas, which came on to be tried at Nisi Prius, at the Summer Assizes for Leicester of 1861, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with 6*l.* 10*s.* damages.

In the following Michaelmas Term the defendants obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict found for him should not be set aside, and a new trial be had, on the ground that the Judge presiding at the trial misdirected the jury in telling them that the facts relied upon by the defendants, if taken as proved, did not constitute evidence that the right to the possession of the rabbits was in the Marquis of Exeter; and the same, after argument, was made absolute.

Against this judgment the plaintiff, William Blades, appealed to the Exchequer,

Chamber, and a special case was agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendants, which special case was also used and referred to for the purposes of the present appeal, and, so far as is material, was as follows.—

“William Blades, the above-named plaintiff, is a fishmonger and licensed dealer in game at Stamford, in the county of Lincoln, and the defendants, William Higgs and Thomas Percival, are, the former the steward, and the latter a servant in the employ of the Marquis of Exeter. Between seven and eight o'clock in the morning of the 16th of October 1860, the plaintiff bought of a man, named Yates, two bags, containing about ninety rabbits, and ordered them to be consigned to him at the Midland station at Stamford. The plaintiff, upon the purchase, paid 4*l.* 15*s.* for the rabbits. A few minutes before nine the same morning, the plaintiff went to the Midland station with a barrow, for the purpose of bringing the rabbits away to his shop. The bags arrived, directed to the plaintiff, with one of his own printed labels, and the plaintiff paid 4*s.* for the carriage of them to Stamford, and they were delivered to him. As he was proceeding to put the two bags in the barrow, and before he had got them on, the defendant Higgs came up to the plaintiff, and said he wanted to see what was in the bags, to which the plaintiff said he should not allow him, and, with the assistance of a porter, the plaintiff lifted the bags on the barrow. The defendant Higgs remained there until two policemen came, and then he directed them to see what the bags contained. The plaintiff said he might. One of the policemen looked into them, and seeing that they contained dead rabbits, he allowed the plaintiff to take them, and assisted him in putting them back on the barrow. The other defendant, Percival, then came up and said, “I shall take these rabbits; they are mine,” and the defendant Higgs said also, “They are the Marquis of Exeter's.” The defendants then attempted to get possession of the bags, and the plaintiff resisted for some time, until at length, one of the policemen saying to him, it was no use his struggling any longer, he discontinued his resistance, and the defendants took possession of the bags and their contents. Another game-dealer in the town, called Pollard, was fetched to the spot to buy the rabbits, and they were sold to him by the defendants, the plaintiff protesting against the sale of his property. The two bags were directed to the plaintiff, and had been sent from the Ketton station on the Midland Railway.

"The counsel for the defendants proposed to prove, on their behalf, that the persons who transmitted the rabbits to the plaintiff went upon the Marquis of Exeter's land and took the rabbits, and killed them, and put them into the bags there, and then carried them to the railway station at Ketton, and contended that the property in the rabbits was in Lord Exeter, and that the defendants, acting under his authority, were justified in the course they adopted."

The Judge who presided at the trial, thereupon ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to the rabbits, and that the defendants were not entitled to take them from him, and accordingly the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff as above mentioned.

The question on this appeal was, whether the Court of Common Pleas ought to have made such rule as above mentioned.

Hayes, Serj. (Beasley with him), for the appellant.—The judgments in the Courts below were founded on the ground that the case was governed by Lonsdale v. Rigg (1); but in that case the question of the property in the game was treated as immaterial, and it was so. The whole question tried in that case was as to the ownership of the soil, and the only authority referred to on the question of property in game was the opinion of Lord Holt in Sutton v. Moody (2). The weight of authority shews that there is no property in game in the owners of the land—Bract. lib. 2, cap. 1, Just. Inst. II. tit. 1. s. 12, Case of Swans (3), Fitz. N. B. 87, Com. Dig. tit. 'Biens,' F., Year Book 43 Edw. 3. p. 23, pl. 2, Mallocke v. Eastly (4), Fines v. Spencer (5), Bowlston v. Hardy (6). The opinion of Lord Holt in Sutton v. Moody (2) was not warranted by the previous decisions, and it is the only case in which an opinion will be found opposed to the appellants' contention as to there being no property in game. The opinion of Lord Holt is not to be found in the cases on which he is said to have come to his decision. The only other case opposed to the appellants' view is Churchward v. Studdy (7), which merely follows Sutton v. Moody (2). Pollexfen v. Crispin (8), referred to in Sutton v. Moody (2), turned on judgment after verdict; Hannam v. Mockett (9) is another authority that there is no property in game. There is no property in wild animals so as to make it larceny to take them—1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 511. The game laws also shew that game is not considered property—1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32; by that act the taking of game was made a misdemeanor, and there was no need for this if the property in it was in the owner of the land.—They also referred to the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114. s. 2, 2 Russ. on Crimes, 84, and 2 East's Pleas of the Crown, 607, in support of the same view.

Macaulay and Field, for the respondents.

—The larger class of wild animals must be divided into two classes, viz. first, vermin; and secondly, game. There is no property in the first class of unprofitable animals—Gundry v. Feltham (9), as to foxes—Hannam v. Mockett (10), as to rooks, and Year Book 12 Hen. 8. p. 9. By the law of England there has always been a property in available or profitable game; not an absolute property to exist in all places, but a limited property. The Civil Law has no application, because it is not the law of England in this respect. Sutton v. Moody (2) shews that there was always some property in game, either ratione privilegii, by reason of a warren or chase, or ratione soli, by reason of the ownership of the soil, and that both are local, and this position is fortified by Bowlston v. Hardy (6); but when the game is once killed it becomes the absolute property of the owner of the soil or warren—Christian on Game Laws, 49 (ed. 1817). The statute 11 Hen. 7. c. 17. speaks of property in game, and see Year Books 12 Hen. 8. 9, 14 Hen. 8. 1. That the property in animals feræ naturæ follows the ownership of the soil is also laid down in the Case of Coneys (11), Keble v. Hickringill (12), Hadesden v. Gryssel (13), and Graham v. Ewart (14). There may be property in things of which larceny cannot be committed—1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 512, Newton and Richard's case (15), and Manwood's Forest Laws, 198 (ed. 1741). No man can acquire a right of the kind contended for by the appellant by his own wrongful act. Lord Holt's view of the law in Sutton v. Moody (2) has been universally acted upon for 150 years.

Hayes, in reply, referred to 2 Russ. on Crimes, 136 (2nd ed.) 'Larceny'; and 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 29. s. 30 : and contended that the act committed was merely a trespass.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, when it is said by writers on the common law of England, that there is a qualified or special right of property in game, that is in animals feræ naturæ, which are fit for the food of man, whilst they continue in their wild state, I apprehend that the word "property" can mean no more than the exclusive right to catch, kill, and appropriate such animals, which is sometimes called by the law a reduction of them into possession. This right is said in law to exist ratione soli or ratione privilegii, for I omit the two other heads of property in game which are stated by Lord Coke, namely, propter industriam, and ratione impotentia, for these grounds apply to animals which are not in the proper sense feræ naturæ. Property ratione soli is the common law right which every owner of land has to kill and take all such animals feræ naturæ as may from time to time be found on his land, and as soon as this right is exercised, the animal so killed or caught becomes the absolute property of the owner of the soil. Property ratione privilegii is the right which, by a peculiar franchise anciently granted by the Crown, by virtue of its prerogative, one man may have of killing and taking animals feræ naturæ on the land of another, and in like manner the game when killed or taken by virtue of the privilege, becomes the absolute property of the owner of the franchise, just as in the other case it becomes the absolute property of the owner of the soil.

The question in the present case is, whether game found, killed, and taken upon my land by a trespasser becomes my property as much as if it had been killed and taken by myself, or my servant by my authority. Upon principle there cannot, I conceive, be much difficulty. If property in game be made absolute by reduction into possession, such reduction must not be a wrongful act, for it would be unreasonable to hold that the act of the trespasser, that is of a wrongdoer, should divest the owner of the soil of his qualified property in the game, and give the wrongdoer an absolute right of property, to the exclusion of the rightful owner. But in game when killed and taken, there is absolute property in some one, and therefore the property in game found and taken by a trespasser on the land of A, must vest either in A. or the trespasser; and if it be unreasonable to hold that the property vests in the wrongdoer, it must of necessity be vested in A, the owner of the soil.

This view of the case is supported by a series of decisions. In the case of Sutton v. Moody (2) Lord Chief Justice Holt deduced several conclusions from the Year Books on the subject of property in game. Among these are the following propositions: "If A. starts a hare in the ground of B, and hunts it and kills it there, the property continues all the while in B." In the case thus put, it must, of course, be taken that A. has hunted and killed the hare without the leave or licence of B, and therefore that it is a wrongful act by A. which enures for the benefit of the true owner, viz. the owner of the soil. Another proposition is, that if A. starts game in the forest or warren of B, and hunts it into the ground of C, and there kills it, the property remains all the while in B, the proprietor of the chase or warren, because the privilege continues; and consequently B. is entitled to the absolute property in the dead game so chased and killed by A, who from the statement of the case must be taken to have acted without the licence of B, and therefore to have been a trespasser. A third proposition is, that if A. starts a hare in the ground of B. (who is entitled ratione soli only, for that is plainly implied), and hunts it into the ground of C, and there kills it, the property is in the hunter; for it cannot be in B, (who is entitled ratione soli only, and not ratione privilegii,) for the hare is not killed upon his land; and it cannot be in C, for the game was not originally found in his possession; but was driven upon his ground by the chase and pursuit of the hunter.

These propositions appear to me to prove clearly that game, found and killed by a trespasser under such circumstances as that it would be the absolute property of the owner of the soil, or of the owner of right of free warren, if it had been found and killed by such owner instead of by the trespasser, does in law become the absolute property of the proprietor of the soil or privilege immediately on its being so caught and killed by the trespasser. The law so laid down in Sutton v. Moody (2) is consistent with several earlier cases decided subsequently to the Year Books, of which I will mention one, The Coney's case (11), which has been recognized and acted upon in several subsequent decisions. Of these I may mention Churchward v. Studdy (7), Graham v. Ewart (14) and, lastly, The Earl of Lonsdale v. Rigg, in the Court of Exchequer (16), and Exchequer Chamber (1), on which so much reliance was placed by the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber in their decision of the present case. With respect to this case of Lonsdale v. Rigg (1), I entirely concur in the observations of Mr. Justice Blackburn, and consider the case as a conclusive authority upon the point before us, which it is not desirable to question or disturb. The case when condensed amounts to this, that grouse were shot and taken away by a trespasser upon and from the land of the plaintiff, who brought trover for the dead grouse. And it was clearly held by the Judges of the Court of Exchequer, and afterwards by all the Judges in the Court of Error, that the grouse, as soon as they were killed and fell upon the land of the plaintiff, became and were his absolute property, in respect of his ownership of the soil. This conclusion would not be affected, even though it be true that an indictment at common law will not lie against the trespasser for killing and carrying away of game, if it be one continuous act, inasmuch as the ownership of the game is considered as incident to the property in the land. But this consequence is the result of a peculiarity in the law of larceny, which holds that the act of severing and taking away things attached to the freehold is not a felonious taking,—a result which does not affect the existence of the rights of property.

I am therefore of opinion that the learned counsel for the defendants on the trial at Nisi Prius were right in requiring the evidence to be admitted, which they proposed to give, in order to prove that the property in the rabbits was in Lord Exeter; and that the learned Judge was wrong in his direction to the jury that such evidence was immaterial, and ought not therefore to be admitted. I am therefore of opinion that the order making the rule nisi for a new trial absolute was right, and that the present appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, I think it is safe and just to adhere to the law as laid down by Lord Holt (2). He had evidently considered the subject carefully, and according to his view of the law, the rabbits killed by a trespasser on the lands of Lord Exeter certainly belonged to his Lordship. Lord Holt's opinion was followed in Churchward v. Studdy (7). There the hunter (who was a poacher) was eventually held to be entitled to the hare, but that was because he started in on the land of a third person, and followed it on to the ground of the defendant, and there caught and killed it. It was in strict conformity with Lord Holt's view of the law to hold that in these circumstances the hare belonged to the poacher. The rule nisi was granted by the Court of King's Bench, on the supposition that the hare had been caught on the land of the defendant by his servant acting as his agent, in which case the Court clearly thought it would have been the property of the defendant, whereas in fact the defendant's servant was assisting the hunter and his dogs.

This case was followed by that of Lord Lonsdale v. Rigg (16), afterwards affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (1), where the subject was carefully considered. It was there decided that grouse killed by a poacher belong to the owner of the soil on which they are killed,—strictly following Lord Holt's doctrine. There was not a formal plea in that case traversing the property in the birds; but it was agreed to waive that objection in point of form, and to dispose of the case as if such an issue had been expressly raised.

It was argued before this House that if game killed by a poacher is the property of the owner of the soil, then every poacher is guilty of larceny. But that is a fallacy. Wild animals, whilst living, though they are, according to Lord Holt, the property of the owner of the soil on which they are living, are not his personal chattels so as to be the subject of larceny. They partake, while living, of the quality of the soil, and are, like growing fruit, considered as part of the realty. If a man enters my orchard and fills a wheelbarrow with apples which he gathers from my trees, he is not guilty of larceny, though he has certainly possessed himself of my property;—and the same principle is applicable to wild animals.

It was further said, that the late Game Act, which authorizes the stopping of a poacher having game in his possession, and the selling of the game for the benefit of the parish, shews that the legislature could not have understood the game to be the property of the person on whose land it was killed; for in that case, it was said, it would have been an unjust appropriation of the property of another. But this arrangement was probably made because it might often be impossible to know on whose land every particular head of game had been killed, and was considered to be on the whole an arrangement beneficial to the landowner. On the whole, I see no reason for disturbing the decision of the Court below, and think that there ought to be a new trial.

LORD CHELMSFORD. — My Lords, the question to be determined on this appeal is, whether animals feræ naturæ killed or reduced into possession by a trespasser on the land of another become the property of the owner of the land. The case was very learnedly argued on both sides, and all the authorities with respect to property in wild animals, either in a state of nature or reclaimed, were fully examined, and both the civil and the common law were referred to for doctrine on the subject. By the civil law the person who took or reduced into possession any animal feræ naturæ, although he might be a trespasser in so doing, acquired the property in it. This appears clearly from the following passage in the Institutes (lib. II. tit. 1. s. 12) cited in the argument: "Feræ igitur bestiæ et volucres et pisces, et omnia animalia quæ mari cælo et terrâ nascuntur, simulatque ab aliquo capta fuerint, jure gentium, statim illius esse incipiunt; quod enim ante nullius est id naturali ratione occupanti conceditur; nec interest feræ bestias et volucres utrum in suo fundo quisque capiat an in alieno."

If the same rule prevails in our law, then the rabbits in question were not the property of Lord Exeter, but of the poacher who took and killed them upon his land. This doctrine, however, as to the right of property in wild animals captured seems never to have prevailed in our law to its full extent. With respect to animals in a wild and unreclaimed state there seems to be no difference between the Roman and the common law. A distinction was suggested in argument between wild animals which are unprofitable and regarded as vermin, and those which are fit for food, and therefore profitable; and it was said of the latter, that by the law of England there is always a property in game, whether alive or dead, in somebody. But this is not reconcileable with the authorities. In the Case of Swans (3) Lord Coke says, "A man hath not absolute property in anything which is feræ naturæ. Property qualified and possessory a man may have in those which are feræ naturæ; and to such property a man may attain in two ways, by industry, or ratione impotentia et loci." . . . "But when a man hath savage beasts ratione privilegii, as by reason of a park, warren, &c., he hath not any property in the deer, or conies, or pheasants, or partridges, and, therefore, in an action quare parcum warrennum, &c. fregit et intravit et tres damas lepores cuniculos phasianos perdices cepit et asportavit, he shall not say suos, for he hath no property in them, but they do belong to him ratione privilegii for his game and pleasure so long as they remain on the privileged place;" à fortiori, therefore, where a person is merely the owner of land without any other privilege attached to it than that which the ownership confers, he can have no property in the wild animals upon the land so long as they are in a state of nature and unreclaimed. Indeed, this notion of the existence of property in wild animals is inconsistent with the whole current of the authorities from the Year Books downwards, which almost invariably shew that no action lies merely for taking away hares, conies, pheasants, and partridges; and that where the taking animals of this description is stated in addition to the trespass upon the land, the plaintiff shall not say "lepores, &c. suos."

With respect to wild and unreclaimed animals, therefore, there can be no doubt that no property exists in them so long as they remain in the state of nature. It is also equally certain that when killed or reclaimed by the owner of the land on which they are found, or by his authority, they become at once his property absolutely when they are killed, and in a qualified manner when they are reclaimed. So far every thing is clear, and the only difficulty which arises upon the subject of property in wild animals is that which the present case presents. As animals feræ naturæ, when killed or reduced into possession by the owner of the land where they are found, or by his authority, become instantly his property, does the unauthorized act of a trespasser by the very act of killing them convert them at once to the use of the owner of the land? To this question Lord Holt, according to the case which he puts in Sutton v. Moody (2), would have given a distinct answer, that provided the game was both started and killed on the ground of the same owner, the property would be in him. I think Lord Holt must have been of opinion that as long as the game continued upon the land there was a species of property, or rather, perhaps, a right to take it, existing in the owner of the land which was sufficient to make it his, the instant, by being killed or taken, it became the subject of property. But I cannot so easily discover the principle upon which he proceeded when he said that, "If A. starts a hare in the ground of B, and hunts it into the ground of C, and kills it there, the property is in A, the hunter; but A. is liable to an action of trespass for hunting in the grounds as well of B. as of C." I have some difficulty in understanding why the wrongdoer is to acquire a property in the game under the circumstances here supposed. If the animal had left the land of B. and passed into the land of C. of its own will, and had been, immediately it crossed the boundary, killed by C., it would unquestionably have been his property. Why then should not the act of a trespasser, to which C. was no party, have the same effect as to his right to the animal as if it had voluntarily quitted the neighbouring land? And why not only should B. lose his right to the game, and C. acquire none, but the property by this accident of the place where it happened to be killed be transferred to the trespasser? It would appear to me to be more in accordance with principle to hold, that if the trespasser deprived the owner of the land where the game was started of his right to claim the property, unlawfully killing it on the land of another to which he had driven it, he converted it into a subject of property for that owner and not for himself. But the first proposition stated by Lord Holt with respect to game started and killed on the land of the same owner is free from all difficulty, and is sufficient to dispose of the present question. The case of Sutton v. Moody (2) has always been regarded as an authority upon this point, and as far as I can ascertain has never been questioned. It was recognized in Churchward v. Studdy (7), in Graham v. Ewart (14), by Baron Martin in Lord Lonsdale v. Rigg (16). And in this last case, when before the Court of Error (1), Mr. Justice Coleridge said, "The grouse shot on the land of the plaintiff" (i. e. shot by the defendant, a wrongdoer), "belonged to him according to all the authorities." It certainly would not be right to disturb a principle of law so long established unless it could be clearly shewn to be erroneous. And it appears to me not only that it is well founded, but that very strange consequences would follow from adopting the view contended for by the appellant. If he is right in saying that the owner of the land has no property in game, unless it is killed by him or by his authority, it will necessarily follow that a poacher reducing the game into possession, and thereby as possessor, though a wrongdoer, having a right to it against all the world but the true owner, there being no owner to challenge his possession, might maintain an action against the owner of the land for taking the game from him, even upon the land itself where it was killed. It is much more reasonable to hold that the trespasser having no right at all to kill the game, can give himself no property in it by his wrongful act; and that as game killed or reduced into possession, is the subject of property, and must belong to somebody, there can be no other owner of it, under these circumstances, but the person on whose ground it is taken or killed.

This view of the case will render the distinction suggested in the course of the argument, between killing and carrying away the rabbits, as parts of one and the same continuous act, and killing them and leaving them upon the land, and coming back for them, wholly immaterial. For the act of killing being at once that which made the rabbits the subject of property, and reduced them into possession, whether they were for an instant, or for hours upon the land, they equally belonged to the owner of the land. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, was right and ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Master and Servant—Railway Company—Neglect of Duty as Carriers—Tort arising out of Contract—Action by Stranger to the Contract.

A master cannot maintain an action per quod servitium amisit against a railway company, for an injury to his servant whilst a passenger on the company's railway, caused by neglect of their duty to safely carry the servant according to their contract with him as such passenger, unless the master was a party to the contract.

Declaration — For that one Charles Thomas Baxter, before and at the time of the committing of the grievances herein-after mentioned, was and from thence hitherto has continued and still is the servant and traveller of the plaintiffs in their business of brewers and otherwise, and the defendants were carriers of passengers upon a certain railway, to wit, the Midland Railway, from a certain station of the defendants at Trent to a certain other station of the defendants at Nottingham for hire and reward to the defendants; and the said C. T. Baxter, so being the servant and traveller of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, became and was received by the defendants as a passenger to be by them safely and securely carried upon the said railway on a journey from the said station of the defendants at Trent to the said station of the defendants at Nottingham for hire and reward to the defendants in that behalf, and thereupon it became and was the duty of the defendants to use due and proper care and diligence in and about the carriage and conveyance of the said C. T. Baxter, so being such servant and traveller of the plaintiffs as aforesaid upon the said railway on the said journey, yet the defendants did not safely and securely carry the said C. T. Baxter, so being such servant and traveller of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, upon the said railway on the said journey, and did not use due and proper care and diligence in and about the carriage and conveyance of the said C. T. Baxter, so being such servant and traveller of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and by their servants so negligently, unskilfully, carelessly and improperly behaved and conducted themselves in that behalf that the said C. T. Baxter, so being such servant and traveller of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, was thereby and by reason of the negligence, carelessness, unskilfulness and improper conduct of the defendants and their servants, wounded and injured, and became and was sick, disabled, and unable to attend to the necessary business of the plaintiffs about which he was employed at the time of the injuries complained of, and so remained from thence for a long time, to wit, for nineteen weeks, whereby the plaintiffs during all such time lost the services of the said C. T. Baxter in their said business, and all benefits and advantages which would otherwise have accrued to them from such services; and the said business of the plaintiffs, so carried on by the said C. T. Baxter, suffered great loss and injury; and the plaintiffs were, by reason of the premises, and of the wrongful and improper conduct of the defendants, otherwise injured and damaged.

The defendants demurred to the declaration, and also pleaded—That the defendants contracted with the said C. T. Baxter to carry him as such passenger, as in the declaration mentioned, on the said journey, and they received him, as in the declaration mentioned, under and by virtue of that contract, and they did not contract with the plaintiffs to carry the said C. T. Baxter, and that the matter complained of in the declaration was not a breach of any contract between the defendants and the plaintiffs, but was a breach of the said contract between the defendants and the said C. T. Baxter.

The plaintiffs demurred to the plea.

Keane (Graham with him), for the plaintiffs.—The question raised by these pleadings is, whether a railway company who have been guilty of negligence are liable to the master for the loss he has sustained by an injury to his servant through such negligence of the company. That a railway company are common carriers, and are subject to the same liability which an ordinary carrier is subject to at common law, is well established—Hodges on Railways, 2nd edit. 596, Carpue v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (1), Crouch v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (2), and Tattan v. the Great Western Railway Company (3); and the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. ss. 86, 89. shews that the legislature intended that a railway company should carry passengers, and that as such carriers they were not to escape from their duty of common carriers. Then the master has such an interest in the services of his servant as to entitle him to bring an action against any one who has deprived him of the benefit of such services—Hall v. Hollander (4); and it matters not whether the person who was to render him services stood in the relation to him of an ordinary servant or of a higher character, such as that of a public singer—Lumley v. Gye (5). Several instances of the action by the master for the loss of the services of his servant are stated in Manley Smith's Master and Servant, 2nd edit. 96; and in Martinez v. Gerber (6) the form of a writ for a master is given by Serjeant Manning.

Yes.

[WILLES, J.—Is there any authority to be found in favour of a master suing for damages consequential on a breach of a duty which arose out of a contract with the servant?]

It is submitted that the duty which is the foundation of this action is not to perform a contract. It is a duty which does not arise out of the contract to carry for remuneration made by Baxter with the company, but out of what is anterior to such contract; for apart from and collateral to such contract, there is the duty which the law imposes on a common carrier to carry with due care any person who offers himself for that purpose. The case of The Great Northern Railway Company v. Harrison (7) shews that it is not necessary that there should be any contract to support an action against the carrier for negligently carrying a passenger, but that it is sufficient if the passenger be lawfully there for the purpose of being carried; and in Ansell v. Waterhouse (8), which was an action against a coach-proprietor for injury sustained by a passenger by reason of the coach being overturned through the negligence of the defendant's servants, Holroyd, J. says, "This action is founded on that which is collateral to contract; for the terms of contract with a common carrier, provided they do not vary his general responsibility, are quite immaterial." So in Bretherton v. Wood (9), Dallas, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Error, says, "This action is on the case against a common carrier, upon whom a duty is imposed by the custom of the realm, or, in other words, by the common law, to carry and convey their goods or passengers safely and securely, so that by their negligence or default no injury or damage happen. A breach of this duty is a breach of the law, and for this breach an action lies founded on the common law, which action wants not the aid of a contract to support it." The cases of Marshall v. the York and Newcastle, &c. Railway Company (10), Pozzi v. Shipton (11), Pippin v. Sheppard (12), Colletti v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (13), Gladwell v. Steggall (14), Dixon v. Bell (15), Mytton v. the Midland Railway Company (16), Coxon v. the Great Western Railway Company (17), and Blake v. the Great Western Railway Company (18) support the proposition contended for, that the action will lie against the carrier for a breach of his duty as carrier, and that such duty is collateral to and independent of the contract. The case of Everard v. Hopkins (19) was an action by a master against a surgeon for giving unwholesome medicine to the plaintiff's servant, whom the defendant had undertaken to cure, per quod servitium amisit. The Court gave no judgment; but in the course of the argument the case was put of a servant being sent by his master to pay money on a bond for him, and of the servant's horse being carelessly pricked by a smith when shoeing the horse, so as to prevent the servant from being in time to pay the money, and it was said by Coke, C.J., "This being the servant's horse, he shall have an action on the case for pricking of his horse, and the master also shall have his action on the case for the special wrong which he hath sustained by the non-payment of the money occasioned by this." It appears that the whole Court were agreed as to this, as well as that in the case where a man sends his servant upon a message of some importance, and the servant falls into a hole which has been digged in the highway, and hurts himself so that he cannot go upon his master's message; both the servant and the master shall have their several actions on the case for their several wrongs against the person who dug the hole. In Com. Dig. tit. 'Action on the Case for Negligence,' (B) 1, it is said, "The master may have an action for goods lost at an inn where his servant was a guest." Moreover, a father can maintain an action for the seduction of his daughter, though there has been a breach of promise to marry, and the father is a stranger to such contract. In Grinnell v. Wells (20) the law as to the right of the master to sue for the invasion of his right to the service of his servant is fully stated and explained. The result of the authorities is this, that when a railway company allow any one to be a passenger for hire on their railway, they become common carriers, and subject to the duty which such a carrier is subject to, and which is analogous to that of an innkeeper or surgeon, &c., and is something which is independent of and collateral to the contract for remuneration. This duty the defendants here have failed to perform, and they have thereby also invaded the plaintiffs' right by depriving them of services to which they were entitled, and for this the plaintiffs have a right of action, notwithstanding there may happen to be a contract between the defendants and the plaintiffs' servant.

Bovill (O'Malley and Douglas Brown with him), for the defendants.—The only case which has been cited which has any bearing on the point here is that of Everard v. Hopkins (19), and there there was not only no judgment, but the case itself is distinguishable, as it appears there the agreement to cure the plaintiff's servant was made by the defendant with the plaintiff; and with regard to the observations made by the Judges in the course of the argument, they are merely dicta. There being, therefore, no decided authority in favour of this action, the right to maintain it must be determined by a resort to first principles. It is said that there is a duty imposed on the defendants as common carriers; but whether such duty be imposed by the custom of the realm, or be created by statute, it applies only to them as the carriers of goods, and has no application to them as the carriers of passengers. They are bound to carry goods, but not passengers; and when they do carry passengers they are responsible, no doubt, for carrying them with a certain degree of care; but such responsibility does not arise from any custom, but from the contract, and it is only such a responsibility as any one would incur who should undertake to carry another. Without any privity of contract, to whom, and how, can any duty on the part of the railway company arise? In Langridge v. Levy (21) the action was maintainable because there was fraud, and the defendant had notice of the person by whom the gun was to be used. That case was so explained by the Court of Exchequer in Winterbottom v. Wright (22). In the latter case the defendant had contracted with the Postmaster General to provide a mail-coach to convey mail-bags along a certain line of road, and some other persons who had contracted to horse the coach along the same line hired the plaintiff to drive the coach, and it was held that the plaintiff could not maintain an action against the defendant for an injury sustained by him while driving the coach, by its breaking down from latent defects in its construction. There, Lord Abinger says, "There is no privity of contract between these parties, and if the plaintiff can sue, every passenger, or even any person passing along the road who was injured by the upsetting of the coach, might bring a similar action. Unless we confine the operation of such contracts as this to the parties who entered into them, the most absurd and outrageous consequences, to which I can see no limit, would ensue." And Alderson, B. observes, "If we were to hold that the plaintiff could sue in such a case, there is no point at which such actions would stop. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract." And in Tollit v. Sherstone (23) Maule, J. says, "It is clear that an action of contract cannot be maintained by a person who is not a party to the contract, and the same principle extends to an action of tort arising out of a contract." Moreover, where, as in this case, no notice of any other party was disclosed at the time the contract was made, how can any duty to such person be implied?—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

Keane, in reply.—The fallacy is in supposing that the duty is one which arises only out of a contract. It is submitted that the duty is imposed on the defendants as carriers by the custom of the realm—Addison on Torts, 2nd edit. p. 395, citing the American case of Cole v. Goodwin (24), where Cowen, J. says, that the traveller is under a sort of moral duress or necessity of employing the common carrier, and the latter shall not be at liberty to throw off his legal liability. He is a public servant, with certain duties defined by law, and, as Ashurst, J. said of the duties of innkeepers, they are indelible.

[WILLES, J.—Is this one of those personal actions which would die with the party injured, or could his executors after his death sue for the injury?]

It is submitted that the executors could not sue, and that the cause of action would die with the party.

ERLE, C.J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs against the Midland Railway Company, and they allege in their declaration that the defendants, by their negligence in carrying Baxter, a servant of the plaintiffs, injured him, and that by reason thereof the plaintiffs lost the services of Baxter in their business. On the face of the declaration it appears that the relation between the defendants and Baxter arose out of a contract, for it alleges that Baxter was received by the defendants as a passenger to be carried by them upon their railway for hire and reward. There is a demurrer to the declaration, but the point on which my judgment turns is made more clear by reference to the plea that the defendants contracted with Baxter to carry him as in the declaration, and that they did not contract with the plaintiffs. Therefore it is admitted, on the demurrer to that plea, that the relation between the defendants and Baxter was created by a contract with him. The damage done to Baxter is in substance a breach of that contract, and the plaintiffs complain that they have thereby lost the services of Baxter. It is clear law that where a servant is damaged by a wrong ex delicto, and by reason of that injury the master loses his services, the master may have an action for the consequential damage. The distinction which I rely on is, that in all the instances in which the action by the master has been sustained, the damage to the servant was by a wrong ex delicto, and there is no instance of the master sustaining such an action where the damage was by breach of contract. I do not go into the origin of these actions by the master; whether they arose or not at the time when the master had some sort of property in the servant; but I must take the law as I find it decided by the cases, and I do not find one case in which the master has sustained an action for consequential damage resulting from an injury to the servant where the damage has arisen from a breach of contract. Martinez v. Gerber (6) and Hall v. Hollander (4) were cases in which there had been injuries arising from a wrong done to a person using a public way; and in Gilbert v. Schwenck (25), where the defendant had taken away the children from the custody of the plaintiff, there was in that, as in all other cases, a wrong done, on which the action was founded; whereas here the action is founded on a contract between the railway company and Baxter. I am aware that there may be causes of action for which a party may seek redress either in the form ex contractu or ex delicto; and there are instances in which advantages can be obtained in the procedure by suing in the form ex delicto instead of ex contractu; but it appears to me that whenever it is necessary to resort to the substance of the cause of action, it is important then to find whether it is tort or contract, as the distinction between them is then maintained. This distinction is adverted to in 1 Wms. Saund. 291 d.—291 e, in the notes to Cabell v. Vaughan. It is there said, "The same rule applies where the action is founded on matter ex quasi contractu; and therefore if an action be brought against one only of several persons upon a matter founded in contract, though the form of the action be case for nonfeasance or malfeasance, and the plea not guilty, yet the defendant must plead it in abatement;" and then several cases, amongst which is Powell v. Layton (26), are cited; and again, at p. 291 f, note (g), it is said, "But where the action is not maintainable without referring to a contract between the parties and laying a previous ground for it by shewing such contract, although the plaintiff shapes his case in tort, he shall yet be liable to a plea in abatement if he omit any defendant, or to a nonsuit if he join too many; for he shall not, by adopting a particular form of action, alter the situation of the defendant." It seems to me, therefore, in these cases, the substance was adverted to; and I do not find an instance of making the defendant liable in tort out of a contract with another person than the plaintiff. I think this distinction is further recognized in Green v. Greenbank (27). That was an action for a deceitful warranty of a horse, and a plea of infancy was upheld, because the substantial ground of action was contract, and the plaintiff could not, by declaring in tort, render a person liable who would not have been liable on his promise. So in Roll. Abr., tit. 'Action sur Case,' (D,) pl. 3, there is a case in which it was held that an infant is not liable on the custom of the realm for the loss of goods committed to his care as an innkeeper; yet there is as much duty on him as there is on a carrier to take care of the goods he has received. That being the general line of authority, I think there is immense weight in the observations of the Judges in Langridge v. Levy (21) and Winterbottom v.

Wright (22) in guarding the public against an undefined liability. It seems, therefore, to come back to that on which my opinion is founded, namely, that this is an action for the consequential damage on a breach of contract between Baxter and the railway company, and is therefore not maintainable by the plaintiffs, who were not parties to the contract. As to the cases of costs which have been cited, they do not apply, as, in my opinion, they stand on the law of procedure. For the reasons I have already given, I am of opinion that this action is not maintainable.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted by the defendants that the authorities establish this, viz. that a master may sue for the loss of the services of his servant which has been caused by a wrong or injury done to the servant in the course of his master's business. On the other hand, it is indisputable that no such action has ever been sustained (if it has ever been brought), where the injury done to the servant was not one which was actionable as for a simple wrong, but was for a breach of duty arising out of a contract made with the servant. The question for us to determine is, whether the present action is of the latter kind, or whether it falls within the principle of the decisions in which the action has been maintained. I apprehend that this action is a novelty, and that it does not fall within any principle in which the action has been held to lie, because the right to be carried safely, for the violation of which the present action is brought, is a right which was acquired by the servant by a contract between him and the railway company. To sustain, therefore, such an action as this, we must hold that a person can sue in respect of a contract to which he was no party either by himself or his agent. It has been argued for the plaintiffs that the cause of action is founded on a wrong; but this is not so; the law does not treat this cause of action as founded simply on a wrong, but it gives the person injured the election of proceeding by a form of action either in contract or in tort. Here, however, a third person, who seeks to sue in respect of an injury to his servant, takes upon himself to exercise the election which the law gives to the servant and which it does not give to a stranger.

I will add this by way of illustration,—The servant may bring an action against the railway company on the contract, and therein recover damages for the injury he has sustained, and so determine the election which the law has given him; and the master may elect to treat the injury as a wrong, and so determine the election otherwise than the person who entered into the contract with the company thought proper to determine it; that, to my mind, would reduce the contention on the part of the plaintiffs to an absurdity. If the matter with respect to electing the form of action in these kind of cases was traced to its origin, it would be found to be a process by which the law, by means of what may be called fictions, gives a more compendious remedy to the person injured. I will first start with the doctrine of implied promise. The law imposes a duty which the contracting parties did not stipulate for. Thus a man enters into an elaborate contract under seal, and afterwards there are various modifications and allowances to be made in the subject-matter of the contract, as in the case of a large building agreement, where what was anticipated by the parties at the time of the contract has not come to pass, but work has been done in respect of which money ought to be paid by one party to the other. The party who has so done the work may elect to declare either on the special contract or on an implied promise to pay for the work done. That was the state of things in Bretherton v. Wood (9) and the other cases to which reference has been made; but no one would say that the rights of the parties were affected by declaring in one form instead of in the other. Take another case, that of a man selling the goods of another without authority, and receiving the proceeds of such sale. The law says that the person whose goods they were may declare ex delicto as for a wrongful conversion, or he may declare for the money received from such sale, alleging that the person who had so received it had promised to pay it to him on request. These are cases in which the law has invented certain modes of proceedings with allegations that cannot be traversed in order that justice may be done between the parties; and, subject to the incidents of infancy and set-off, a party may take his election as to the form of action whether it shall be in contract or in tort. The case now before the Court is one in which there has been no duty but what arises from the contract. The duty is superadded by law to the contract to carry, and the passenger, as it were, purchases of the railway company the duty which the law says arises out of the contract. I asked Mr. Keane if the executor could sue for this injury, and he replied that he thought he could not. I did not dissent from that answer, as I thought it might be like the action for breach of promise to marry, and that it could not be maintained after the death of the party. But suppose the passenger took luggage with him, and the luggage was lost, it is clear that in that case the executor could sue—Knights v. Quarles (28), cited in 1 Wms. Executors, 5th edit. 712, where it was held that such an action was maintainable. It is there observed, that “if a man contracted for a safe conveyance by a coach, and sustained an injury by a fall, by which his means of improving his personal property were destroyed, and that property in consequence injured, though it was clear he in his lifetime might at his election sue the coach proprietor in contract or in tort, it could not be doubted his executor might sue in assumpsit for the consequences of the coach proprietor’s breach of contract.” There is this further remark I would wish to make. The contract with the defendants in this case was for the reasonably safe conveyance of a passenger; and there is a wide distinction between the liability of a carrier of passengers and that of a carrier of goods, though I do not found my judgment on that distinction. No authority, however, has been found to support such an action as this, and I am not for now introducing one.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case must be decided according to first principles, and I agree with the observations which have been made by my Lord and my Brother Willes. It is clear that there was no contract, either express or implied, with the plaintiffs; but that the contract to carry was wholly between the traveller and the railway company. There is no doubt that in most cases of this nature a plaintiff may elect to sue in either form of action, tort or contract; but he must not thereby expand the right of action, that is, he must not by changing the form of action allow other persons to sue who could not otherwise have done so. No one can sue for a breach of duty except for a breach of duty to himself. I remember that in Winterbottom v. Wright (22) a precedent, which has always been known to be a bad one, was cited from Wentworth’s Pleadings, where an attorney having been instructed to make a will failed to do so in proper time, and the intended testator, therefore, died intestate, and the precedent is a form of declaration by the legatees against the attorney for negligence in not getting the will prepared in time; but the attorney’s duty was to the testator, and not to the legatees; and if such an action as that could have been maintained, the heirs of the legatees or devisees might also have sued, and there would have been no end to the attorney’s liability. So, in the case of an improperly made anchor, the maker of it would be liable, not only to the person to whom he sold it, but to the shipmaster and to every passenger in the ship who was injured by the anchor breaking. Take the case of a surgeon who is employed to attend a servant, and suppose the surgeon to be supplied with an improper instrument by the surgical-instrument maker, by which the servant is injured, the master of such servant might, according to the plaintiffs’ argument in this case, bring an action against the maker of the instrument. The moment we depart from the rule that the action for a breach of duty cannot be brought except for a breach of duty against the party suing, the door is opened to most extensive and unknown liabilities. The Court has asked for an authority for such an action as this, and the only one is said to be that of Everard v. Hopkins (19); but on examination of that case, it turned out that the contract there was with the master, and the case therefore is no authority for this action; whereas the case of Winterbottom v. Wright (22) is a distinct authority the other way, and so is the law in Langridge v. Levy (21). I do not think that a more important case than the present one has come before this Court for many years, and it is one on which we ought to express a very decided opinion.

SMITH, J.—I have not heard all the arguments; but, as far as I have heard them, I concur with the rest of the Court. I think the foundation of the argument for the plaintiffs is unsound, for the contract is the groundwork of the whole duty imposed on the defendants; and, consequently, the only parties to sue on such contract are the parties to it.

Judgment for the defendants.

1865. } EVERETT AND ANOTHER v. THE June 1. } LONDON ASSURANCE.

Insurance—Fire-Policy—Damage by Gunpowder not on the Premises.

A damage sustained from the atmospheric concussion caused by an explosion of gunpowder at a distance, is not a damage insured against by a policy for the payment of such loss or damage as should be occasioned by fire to the property insured.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants for the recovery of 20*l.*, being the amount of damage occasioned to the plaintiffs' house, under the circumstances hereinafter stated; and by the consent of the parties, and by the order of Erle, C.J., according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the following CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court, without any pleadings.

By a policy of insurance, bearing date the 17th of April 1862, numbered 211,525, and sealed with the common seal of the defendants, for the considerations therein expressed, the defendants covenanted and agreed that, subject to the terms therein mentioned, which have been duly complied with on the part of the plaintiffs, the capital stock, estate and securities of the defendants should be subject and liable to pay, make good and satisfy unto the plaintiffs, their heirs, executors or administrators, such loss or damage as should or might be occasioned by fire to the property of the plaintiffs therein mentioned and thereby insured, according to the conditions and stipulations thereon indorsed, not exceeding in each case respectively the sum of 600*l.* The premium was stated in the policy to be paid for the insurance of the property mentioned in the policy from loss or damage by fire, according to the exact tenor of the conditions and stipulations indorsed on the policy (a copy of the said policy and the conditions indorsed accompanied and was to be taken as a part of the case). The 5th condition indorsed on the policy was as follows: "That losses by lightning will be made good where property assured by the corporation has been actually set on fire thereby and burnt in consequence thereof." The 8th condition indorsed on the said policy was as follows: "That books of account, manuscripts, written securities, money, bank-notes, bills, stamps and gunpowder will not be insured or comprehended in any insurance effected by or with this corporation, nor will any loss or damage in any case or of any description be made good when more than twenty-five pounds weight of gunpowder shall be deposited or kept on the premises."

On the 1st of October 1864 a large quantity of gunpowder in the gunpowder-magazine of Messrs. Hall, at Erith, ignited and exploded, but from what cause is unknown, and the before-mentioned premises of the plaintiffs were thereby injured to the extent of 20*l.* The plaintiffs' premises, which are rather more than half-a-mile distant from the spot at which the explosion took place, were not set on fire by the explosion of the gunpowder, nor was any part thereof burnt, heated or scorched by the explosion. The injury they sustained consisted in the shattering of the windows and window-frames, and the damaging of the structure generally by the atmospheric concussion caused by the explosion. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the damage, so caused to the plaintiffs' premises was a loss or damage insured against under the before-mentioned policy.

Hannen, for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether this injury which the plaintiffs have sustained was an injury within the meaning of the policy. It is submitted that it was. The policy is not limited to a loss occasioned by fire on the premises. It contemplates also an injury from the explosion of gunpowder, for there is a stipulation in the 8th condition that not more than 25 lb. weight of gunpowder shall be kept on the premises. Then, again, take the case of injury from lightning. The company supposed they would be liable for such, although there should be no actual fire, for there is an express condition in the policy that losses by lightning are to be made good where it has actually set fire to the property and burnt it. Where property is injured by water used to put a fire out, it is always considered an injury from fire within the meaning of a fire-policy, although the water and not the fire is the proximate cause of the injury. Suppose the injury were from an explosion of gas or gunpowder in an adjoining house, would not that be an injury resulting from fire within the meaning of the policy? What difference is there between such a case and the present one, except that of distance? The injury to the plaintiffs' premises from the explosion in question was an injury which was as much the direct consequence of fire as scorching. The only case which seems to have any bearing on the present is that of Taunton v. the Royal Insurance Company (1), where directors of an insurance company having decided to pay for a loss occasioned by the concussion of the air resulting from an explosion of gunpowder upon a fire-policy, which provided that the company would not be responsible for any loss by explosion except explosion by gas, a shareholder filed a bill for an injunction to restrain the directors from so applying the funds of the company, but Wood, V.C. dismissed the bill with costs, as such payment was in accordance with the usual custom of fire insurance companies.

Maude, for the defendants.—The policy in this case contemplates only an injury by fire to the property insured, that is to say, there must be the action of fire on the property so as either to heat or burn it in order to bring the case within this policy. Here the damage was not caused by fire, but it was only the effect of atmospheric disturbance. If such a damage as this is to be considered as a damage by fire, where is the line to be drawn? Suppose the injury was from the explosion of the fire-lamp or of a boiler of a steam-engine, by which a railway carriage came against the building; or suppose the windows of a house were broken by the concussion of the air from the firing of ordnance at a review;—all these cases only shew the difficulty which would arise if the Court were to depart here from the words of the contract. The decisions on marine policies are somewhat analogous with reference to what is considered the proximate cause of the loss. In Green v. Elmalie (2), where a ship had been driven by stress of weather on an enemy's coast and there captured, it was held to be a loss by capture, and not by perils of the sea. The case of Ionides v. the Universal Marine Insurance Company (3) furnishes another instance of what is or not the proximate cause of a loss. In 2 Marshall on Insurance, 3rd edit., p. 790, there is a chapter on fire insurance, which is not inserted in the subsequent editions, and there it is said, "In order to bring the loss within the risk insured against, it must appear to have been occasioned by actual ignition, and no damage occasioned by mere heat, however intense, will be within the policy." In support of this reference is made to Austin v. Drewe (4), where a policy was effected against loss by fire on the stock of a sugar-house, and in an action on the policy it appeared that the sugar-house consisted of eight stories, in each of which there was sugar in a certain state of preparation, and that heat was communicated to each of the stories by means of a chimney, at the top of which was a register which was usually shut at night, after the fire was out, for the purpose of retaining the heat, and that on the present occasion the fire was lighted in the morning, but the register was negligently kept shut, whereby the building was filled with smoke and sparks and the sugar damaged, not by the smoke, but by the excessive heat, but nothing took fire. The Court held that the loss arose from the mismanagement of the machinery, and not from any of those accidents from which the policy was intended to protect the insured, and that therefore the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. With respect to the case of Taunton v. the Royal Insurance Company (1), it was there admitted that the loss was not one for which the company were liable at law.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendants. The question is, what is the meaning of this contract? The contract by the defendants is to pay the amount of such loss or damage as should be occasioned by fire to the property of the plaintiffs thereby insured. The damage occasioned by an explosion of gunpowder at a distance does not, I think, come within those words; I therefore think such words do not apply to the damage sought to be recovered in this action. There is a stipulation as to lightning and gunpowder; but this, which is a damage from the explosion of gunpowder off the premises, is not expressed in the policy. The whole matter lies in a small compass, and according to the best of my judgment the words of this policy do not apply to the damage in question.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In insurance cases we are bound to look to the immediate and not the remote cause of the loss. No one would say that the damage sustained by the plaintiffs in this case was occasioned by fire, but by a concussion of air, which was caused by an explosion of gunpowder, which was caused by fire. That is going to the causa causans, which cannot properly be done.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract is to pay for loss occasioned by fire, which means either ignition of the article itself, or of part of the premises where it is; in the one case the article might be lost and in the other damaged by fire. Otherwise it would offend the rule of law given by Lord Bacon: "In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur."—Bac. Max. Reg. 1. An eruption of Vesuvius might injure a ship sailing near it, and that might be said to be a damage by fire. Indeed, if the rule were broken into there is no absurdity at which to stop; the heat of the sun might be too great, and a damage resulting from that might even be said to be a damage by fire. What the Court has to do, however, is to give only the ordinary construction to the words of the contract, and according to such a construction the policy does not cover this loss.

Judgment for the defendants.

1865. { In the matter of THE ARBITRATION OF PETTIWARD v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.
June 26.

Sewers—11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. s. 38.—Compensation—Metropolis Local Management Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. ss. 148, 181.—Transfer of Liabilities.

By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. s. 38. power was given to the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers to construct sewers under any lands whatsoever, "making compensation for any damage done thereby," and by other clauses of that act the Commissioners were empowered to levy rates retrospectively, as well as prospectively, for the payment of such compensation. By the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120.) the powers of such Commissioners are put an end to, and the Metropolitan Board of Works is to stand in their place; and by section 148. the property vested in such Commissioners is transferred to the Board of Works, and all persons who owe money to the Commissioners are to pay the same to such Board, and all monies recoverable from the Commissioners are to be recoverable from the Board; and by section 181. "all mortgages, annuities, securities, and other debts and liabilities," which before the determination of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. might be charged on or payable out of any rates authorized to be levied thereunder, are to continue in full force and be a charge on the districts in which such rates would have been authorized to be levied:—Held, that a liability of such Commissioners to make compensation for land taken by them for a construction of a sewer under the powers of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, was transferred by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and was, therefore, recoverable from such Board, although at the time of the determination of the powers of the Commissioners the existence of such liability was not known, and no claim was made for compensation until several years afterwards.

The following CASE was stated by an arbitrator, with the consent of the parties, for the opinion of the Court.

Roger Petteward, deceased, was in the year 1832, and thence until his death, seised in fee of certain land, used as an orchard and market-garden, situate in the parish of St. Mary Abbott, Kensington, in the county of Middlesex.

By his will, dated the 13th of May 1833, he devised (inter alia) the land in question to trustees to settle the same in manner by the said will directed. The said Roger Pettiward died shortly after making his said will. In 1835 the trustees of the will of Roger Pettiward executed a settlement in pursuance of the said will, and Lady Hotham, under and by virtue of the said settlement, became and was tenant for life of the land in question, with power of leasing the same for not more than twenty-one years.

On the 6th of August 1841 Lady Hotham, in pursuance of the said power, granted a lease of the land in question to John Poupart for twenty-one years from June 1841.

On the 14th of December 1854 the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers served upon Mr. Poupart, then in the occupation of the land, the following notice :

"Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers to Mr. John Poupart, occupier of the piece or parcel of ground hereinafter mentioned, and whom else it may concern.—The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers hereby give you notice, that it has been duly ordered by the said Commissioners, that certain works necessary for the drainage of a portion of the area within the limits of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers should be executed and constructed, that is to say, the building of a certain sewer and works in connexion therewith, to commence at a point near the River Thames and near to Cremorne Gardens, in the county of Middlesex, and within the limits of the said Commissioners, in the course and direction shewn upon the plan produced to the said Commissioners, and that for the purpose aforesaid it is necessary to lay down, construct, and carry the said sewer into, through, along and under a certain piece or parcel of ground, used as an orchard and market-garden, in your occupation, in the county and within the limits aforesaid, and that for the construction of such sewer and works as aforesaid it is requisite and necessary that Thomas Lovick, one of the engineers of the said Commissioners, Robert Tomlinson Carlisle, contractor, of and with the said Commissioners, and their assistants, servants and workmen, some or one of them, should enter into and upon, lay open and otherwise lawfully interfere with the said orchard and market-garden, with or without horses, carts, barrows, planks and other vehicles, implements and things for the purpose and object aforesaid; and whereas the said Thomas Lovick and Robert Tomlinson Carlisle have been duly authorized by the said Commissioners to enter, with assistants, servants and workmen, in and upon the said orchard and market-garden for the purpose of executing the said works at some reasonable hour in the daytime, notice being first given to the occupier of the said orchard and market-garden of the said intended entry in and upon the said orchard and market-garden, and of the purpose and object thereof, twenty-four hours at the least before such entry,—notice is therefore hereby given, that the said Thomas Lovick, Robert Tomlinson Carlisle and their assistants, servants and workmen, some or one of them, will on the 16th day of December instant, at some reasonable hour in the daytime, enter into and upon the said orchard and market-garden for the purpose of executing the said works as aforesaid. Dated this 14th day of December, A.D. 1854. By the Court.

"John Pollard."

In pursuance of this notice the said Commissioners of Sewers, acting in execution of the powers vested in them by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, by their servants and agents entered upon the land in question and constructed under it a sewer, which was completed in the course of the year 1855, and having done so restored the surface of the land to its former condition. Lady Hotham never had notice from any one or knowledge of the intention to construct this sewer, or that it had been constructed. Lady Hotham died on the 30th of November 1855, and upon her death the claimant Robert John Pettiward became, under the settlement hereinbefore mentioned, tenant for life of the land in question, and at the expiration of the lease to Poupart in 1862 he entered into possession of the said land. Mr. Pettiward therefore determined to apply the said land to building purposes, and he accordingly caused to be prepared a plan for the erection of several houses on the property.

After this plan was completed, namely, in October 1862, it became for the first time known to Mr. Petteward that the sewer had been constructed under the surface of the land. The existence of this sewer rendered it necessary to alter the contemplated scheme for building, and, in fact, diminished the value of the land to the extent of 1,500*l*.

Mr. Petteward now claims from the Metropolitan Board of Works the sum of 1,500*l*. as compensation for the damage occasioned to the said land by the construction of the sewer.

By the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. s. 38. power was given to the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers to construct sewers under any lands whatsoever, making compensation for any damage done thereby, as therein after provided.

By the 69th section of the same act it is enacted that full compensation shall be made out of such rates to be levied under the said act as the Commissioners shall by their decree direct to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of the said act; and in case of dispute as to the amount, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by the said act.

By the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), section 145, it is enacted that from and after the commencement of the said act all duties, powers and authorities vested in the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers shall cease to be so vested.

By section 146. it is enacted as follows: "No action, suit, prosecution or other proceeding whatsoever, commenced or carried on by or against the said Commissioners, shall abate or be discontinued or prejudicially affected by the determination of the powers of such Commissioners, but shall continue and take effect in favour of or against the Metropolitan Board of Works in the same manner in all respects as the same would have continued and taken effect in relation to the said Commissioners if this act had not been passed, and the powers of the said Commissioners had continued in full force; and all decrees and orders made, and all fines, amerciaments and penalties imposed and incurred, respectively, previously to the commencement of this act, shall and may be enforced, levied, recovered and proceeded for, and all administrative proceedings commenced previously to the commencement of this act shall and may be continued, proceeded with and completed, the Metropolitan Board of Works being, in reference to the matters aforesaid, in all respects substituted in the place of the said Commissioners."

By section 148. it is enacted as follows: "All property, matters and things whatsoever vested in the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, except such sewers as are hereby vested in any vestry or district board, and except such sewers as are not within the limits of the parishes and places mentioned in the Schedules to this act, shall be vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works; and all persons who then owe any money to the said Commissioners of Sewers, or to any person on behalf of such Commissioners, shall pay the same to the Metropolitan Board of Works, or as they may direct; and all monies then due and owing by or recoverable from the said Commissioners shall be paid by or recoverable from the Metropolitan Board of Works; and all contracts, agreements, bonds, covenants and securities theretofore made or entered into with or in favour of or by the said Commissioners, and all contracts, agreements, bonds, covenants and securities made or entered into with or in favour of or by any former or other Commissioners, which under the said act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, were to take effect in favour of, against and with reference to the said Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, and are now in force, shall take effect and may be proceeded on and enforced, as near as circumstances admit, in favour of, by, against and with reference to the Metropolitan Board of Works, as the same would have taken effect and might have been proceeded on and enforced in favour of, by, against and with reference to the said Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers if this act had not been passed, and the powers of such Commissioners had continued in full force; and any retiring pension or allowance granted under section 27. of the said act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, shall continue payable on the like terms by the said Metropolitan Board of Works."

By section 225. it is enacted, that the amount of any compensation to be made under the said act by the said Metropolitan Board shall, unless therein otherwise provided, be settled, in case of dispute, by, and shall be recovered before, two Justices, unless the amount of compensation claimed exceed 50*l.*, in which case the amount thereof shall be settled by arbitration, according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which are applicable where questions of disputed compensation are authorized or required to be settled by arbitration.

By the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 106), it is enacted, that no writ or process shall be sued out against or served upon, and no proceeding shall be instituted against, the Metropolitan Board of Works for anything done or intended to be done under the powers of such board, under the acts therein mentioned or the said act, until the expiration of one calendar month next after notice in writing shall have been served on such board, and every such action and proceeding shall be brought or commenced within six months next after the accrual of the cause of action or ground of claim or demand, and not afterwards.

Mr. Petteward, in February 1863, gave notice to the Metropolitan Board of Works that he desired to have his claim settled by arbitration, and as the parties did not concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, he appointed Mr. Charles Lee as the arbitrator to whom the said dispute should be referred, and requested the said board also to appoint an arbitrator to whom the said dispute should be referred.

The said board, by an instrument under their seal, appointed, under protest, Mr. John Oakley to act as arbitrator in the matter of the said claim. The said arbitrators, before they entered upon the matters referred to them, duly nominated and appointed an umpire to decide on such matters on which they should differ, or which should be referred to him, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. It was agreed between the parties that the umpire should state his award in the form of a special case; and it was also agreed between the parties that if the Court should be of opinion that the said Robert John Petteward was entitled to have any sum of money awarded to him as compensation for the damage occasioned to the land in question by the construction of the said sewer, the amount of such compensation should be 1,500*l.*, together with the costs of and incident to this arbitration.

Watkin Williams, for the claimant, cited Harrison v. Stickney (1) to show that a retrospective rate might be made to pay off the liability of the old Commissioners of Sewers.

Mellish (Raymond with him), contra, admitted that the only point in dispute was, whether the liability of the Commissioners of Sewers, which had been incurred as stated in the case, was transferred to the defendants, the Metropolitan Board of Works; and he contended that it was not so transferred, as no claim in respect of it had been made in the time of the existence of the old Commissioners of Sewers.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court ought to be for the claimant. The only difficulty arises out of the fact of the powers of the Commissioners of Sewers, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, having been transferred to the Metropolitan Board of Works by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. From the earliest time, it has been an object of interest to the Government of this country, and it has from time to time attracted the attention of the legislature, that the country should be preserved by an effectual drainage from floods and inundations, and commissions have from very early times been issued for the purpose of effecting those beneficial objects, in the interest of the public and at the expense of those of the public who have derived benefit from the works of the sewers. That was the object of the legislature in passing the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. and the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120; but it was an object which the legislature did not think fit to accomplish at the expense of private individuals, and any damage which was done to a private individual in the course of making the sewers effectual was, according to section 38. of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, to be made good to him by the Commissioners of Sewers. By that section they were to make improvements, and in the course of doing so to carry their sewers through, across, or under any turnpike-roads, or any street or place laid out as or intended for a street, or through or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriage-way of any street, and (if upon the report of the surveyor it should appear to be necessary) into, through or under any land whatsoever; with this qualification, "making compensation for any damage done thereby as hereinafter provided." Now, I think it is perfectly well established, that the meaning of this is, that the making of the compensation should not be a condition precedent, but that the making of the compensation should be an obligation. Now that obligation is thus dealt with by the 69th section: "Full compensation shall be made out of such rates to be levied under this act as the Commissioners shall by their decree direct to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of the powers of this act; and in case of dispute as to amount the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by this act." If there be no dispute the damage is to be ascertained, and if the damage can be ascertained, whether by a surveyor or the opinions of skilled persons, the obligation would be as much to pay an ascertained sum as a sum on a bill of exchange. The obligation is a liability by the Commissioners to pay money, though not an obligation for which they are personally liable. And by the 76th and 77th sections conjointly it would seem, that if the Commissioners of Sewers, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, were now in existence and capable of exercising their powers, they might make a rate in discharge of the obligation which they have incurred. The fact that a considerable time has gone by is merely an argument of convenience. It is inconvenient for the debtor who is called upon at a time when he might suppose that claim forgotten. It is also inconvenient to the creditor, because it is more difficult for him to establish the existence and the extent of the claim which he makes; but in the absence of any Statute of Limitations, we can attach no importance to it. The only value of it is that which Mr. Mellish, in his argument, attributed to it, that it was probable that debts, the existence of which might be known, should be kept alive, and that the Commissioners of Sewers, or the new board substituted for the Commissioners of Sewers, should be liable for those, but not for unknown liabilities. But that argument, with deference, is not ad rem, because the liability might have arisen the very day before the Metropolitan Board stepped into the place of the Commissioners of Sewers. It was merely for administrative convenience that the powers and property of the Commissioners of Sewers were transferred to the Metropolitan Board. There was no reason, therefore, why the public, whom they represent, should be absolved from any liability to which they were exposed while the direction was in the hands of the Commissioners of Sewers. There is nothing, therefore, in the nature of the case, is there anything in the language of the act, to shew that it was intended that the obligation should not continue? Now, the first section which appears to be material is section 145, by which the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers are put an end to. Then, by section 146, the new board is to stand in the place of the Commissioners. Under section 147. they may recover all rates made by the Commissioners. By section 148. all property vested in the Commissioners of Sewers, except minor sewers vested in the vestries and district boards, is transferred to the new Board of Works; and all persons who owe any money to the Commissioners of Sewers, or to any person on behalf of such Commissioners, are to pay the same to the Metropolitan Board of Works, or as they may direct; and all monies then due and owing by or recoverable from the said Commissioners are to be paid by or recoverable from the Metropolitan Board of Works. Stopping at section 148, and reading it with its kindred sections, it would seem to be clear that it was the intention of the legislature that the new board should, with the exception of the minor sewers transferred to minor bodies, stand in the same position as the Commissioners of Sewers. Then comes the 181st section, which expresses this more largely. By that section all mortgages, securities, annuities, and other debts and liabilities, which, at or immediately before the determination or expiration of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, may be charged on or payable out of all or any of the rates authorized to be levied thereunder, shall continue in full force and be a charge on the same districts on which they were charged before. Here we have words apt and express in favour of the conclusion which, I think, the justice and good sense of the case would incline one to arrive at. We have the large word "liabilities," and we have that word coupled with a provision which, as I have shewn, is strictly applicable to the obligation of the Commissioners of Sewers to make compensation for the private property which they had taken away or injuriously affected. Two arguments have been advanced for the purpose of shewing that such might not be the construction of the statute. One of them I have already adverted to; the other is founded upon the doctrine or rule of construction, which may be shortly expressed, noscitur à sociis. It is said you find this accompanied by provisions applicable to debts for fixed sums of money, and with machinery that can only be applied to the gradual discharge of such debts; therefore it is said that the word "liabilities" ought to be read liabilities eiusdem generis. I am rather disposed to accede to that argument, but to deny that the liability must be in respect of monies numbered. Suppose a contract for the construction of a large sewer, and there were extras, for the payment of which the contract provided, but the exact price of which was not determined, you would say the claim for such extras was not a claim in monies numbered; the contractor might claim 40,000*l.* for that in respect of which he might not get 20,000*l.*, and so the board might well be in doubt as to what sum they should lay by for a sinking fund, as is mentioned in the latter part of the section; still the claim would not the less be a debt within the act. I think that the section deals distinctly with debts and liabilities, because it provides in respect of mortgages, annuities or debts, leaving out liabilities, that they should have priority as before; that they should be marshalled against one another as before, and the section resumes the word "liabilities" when it comes to give power to the Metropolitan Board to raise from time to time the sums becoming payable under or required for the payment of the said mortgages, annuities, securities, debts, and liabilities, which it gives power to raise and pay in like manner as the expenses of the board in the execution of the act. There seems to be, therefore, no reason why this obligation of the Commissioners should be extinguished, and there is a reason why it should be kept alive, and the language of the act is large enough for that purpose; and, therefore, I think the right of Mr. Petteward is not lost, and that he is in a position to claim compensation against the Metropolitan Board of Works.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I start with the admission that has been made that this was an unliquidated liability of the old Commissioners, and the only question is, whether this liability has been transferred to the Metropolitan Board of Works. The Commissioners took part of Mr. Petteward's estate, so that the district got the benefit of it, and one, therefore, feeling the justice of the claim, would look anxiously in the act of parliament to see whether the liability has not been transferred to the body who has succeeded the Commissioners. Now, section 148. strips the Commissioners of all property, and transfers it to the Metropolitan Board of Works, the present defendants. Are, then, the liabilities also transferred? I agree with what my Brother Willes has said about the construction of this section; but whatever that may be, there are general words in section 181. in which the word "liabilities" is used twice, applicable to this case, and I, therefore, agree that the claimant is entitled to the judgment of the Court.

RAY v. JONES.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankrupt Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.—Composition Deed—Covenant not to sue—Release.

By a deed of composition registered under the Bankrupt Act, 1861, the creditors agreed to accept payment of their debts by certain instalments, and they covenanted, "while the said instalments were duly and regularly paid by the debtor, not to sue the said debtor or enforce any judgment or other proceeding against him or his estate."—Held, that the deed could not, in the absence of any express stipulation to that effect, be pleaded as a bar to an action.

Declaration for goods sold and delivered.

Plea.—That after the accruing of the cause of action in the declaration mentioned, and after action, to wit, on the 10th of April 1865, the defendant, then being indebted to divers persons, made and executed a deed, which, without the schedule or signature and attestation thereto, is in the words and figures and to the effect following, that is to say, "This indenture, made the 10th day of April 1865, between Stephen Thomas Jones, of Cubit Court, Golden Lane, St. Luke's, Middlesex, box-maker (hereinafter called 'the said debtor'), of the first part, and the several persons, companies and firms, whose names are subscribed and seals affixed in the schedule hereunder written, being creditors of the said debtor, on behalf of themselves and all and every other the creditors of the said debtor who may assent to or become bound by these presents of the second part. Whereas the said debtor is indebted to the parties hereto of the second part, and other persons, in sums which he is unable to pay at the present time, and it has been agreed by and between the parties hereto to give the said debtor the time hereinafter mentioned for payment of his debts in full. Now this indenture witnesseth, that he the said debtor hereby, for himself, his executors and administrators, covenants and agrees to and with the said parties hereto of the second part, that he will duly pay all and every the debts and claims of the parties hereto of the second, and all other his creditors, whether executing these presents or not, the full amount of their respective debts and claims that are now due and owing by the said debtor, by nine equal monthly instalments, the first payment of an equal ninth part thereof to commence and be made on the 20th day of May next, and a similar payment to be made on the 20th day of each following month, until the whole of his said debts are satisfied and discharged. And this indenture further witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the debtor's covenant as hereinbefore contained, they the parties hereto of the second part, hereby covenant and agree to accept payment of their respective debts by the nine instalments hereinbefore mentioned, and while the said instalments are duly and regularly paid by the said debtor, not to sue the said debtor or enforce any judgment or other proceedings against him or his estate. And it is lastly agreed that this indenture shall operate (so far as it lawfully may) as a deed of arrangement between the said debtor and his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. In witness whereof, the said parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written." Averment.—That a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, did in writing assent to and approve of the said deed, and the execution of the said deed was attested by an attorney and solicitor, and within twenty-eight days from the day of the execution of the said deed by the defendant the same was produced and left, having been first duly stamped at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and together with such deed there was delivered to the said Chief Registrar such affidavits by the defendant as by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf is provided, and the said deed did before the registration thereof bear such ordinary and ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf; and at the time of the execution of the said deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the amount claimed herein pleaded to, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and all conditions prescribed by the said act having been observed and performed, and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became and was, and is, bound by the said deed as if he had been a party thereto and had executed the same.

Demurrer thereto and joinder in demurrer.

Prentice, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is pleaded after action brought and the composition-deed which it sets out contains no release, enabling it to be set up as a defence or bar to the action. The covenant by the creditors is not a covenant not to sue at all, which in effect would amount to a release; but it is a covenant only not to sue for a limited time, namely, until there has been default in payment of the instalments.

[WILLES, J.—The Court of Queen's Bench, in Keys v. Elkins (1), seem to think it might afford an equitable defence.]

It is here pleaded as a legal defence, and it is not a case for allowing an amendment at law: a covenant not to sue for a limited time is clearly not pleadable in bar to an action—Thimbleby v. Barron (2). The case of Walker v. Nevill (3), which may be cited by the other side, is very distinguishable, as there there was a particular clause in the deed by which it was agreed that a deed with such a covenant should be pleaded in bar. Another objection to the present plea is, that the covenant not to sue is by the creditors only who have signed the deed and who alone are the parties to the deed of the second part; it is true they are there described as being creditors on behalf of themselves and the other creditors of the said debtor; but it is submitted that non-assenting creditors are not parties to the covenant and are not therefore bound by it.

Piffard (Wilson with him), contra.—If the covenant is not made on behalf of all other the creditors of the debtor, it is not made at all. But it is so made, as indeed it professes to be a covenant on behalf of the other creditors, and then by force of the Bankrupt Act it binds the non-assenting as well as the assenting creditors, and as if they had executed the deed. The more important objection is, that the covenant is only a covenant not to sue for a limited period, and cannot therefore, according to a technical rule of law, be made the subject of a plea in bar, but can only form the ground of a cross-action. It is submitted, however, that that is not the true effect of this covenant, but that it is a covenant not to sue at all, with this defeasance, namely, that if the debtor should omit to pay the instalments agreed to be paid by him, then it should be as if there had never existed any covenant not to sue. Such a deed is pleadable in bar according to the cases of Gibbons v. Vouillon (4) and Hidson v. Barclay (5), which last case the present one very much resembles.

Prentice, in reply.—In the deed in Hidson v. Barclay (5) there was a clause similar to that in Walker v. Nevill (3), expressly making the deed pleadable in bar. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

WILLES, J.—Mr. Piffard has urged all that can be urged in favour of this plea, and has particularly referred us to Hidson v. Barclay (5); but notwithstanding this I am of opinion that he is not borne out by the authorities, and that this plea cannot be supported. The plea sets up a deed by which the statutory number of creditors have agreed to take the amount of their debts by certain instalments, and have covenanted not to sue, by a covenant which for the present purpose I will assume to be binding on all the creditors, though in terms it is only binding on the creditors who are parties to the deed of the second part. Viewing the covenant in that way, it is a covenant by the creditors that they will accept payment of their debts by nine instalments, and while such instalments are regularly and duly paid by the debtor, that they will not sue him or enforce any judgment or other proceeding against him. The terms in which the covenant is framed are obviously, not to sue only while the instalments are paid, and they do not extend to a release or defeasance which, if intended, would have been expressed, as in the case of Gibbons v. Vouillon (4) and Hidson v. Barclay (5). No authority has been cited to shew that a defeasance can be implied merely from a covenant not to sue. Such a covenant does not amount to a release unless it be an absolute covenant not to sue. By a violent construction of this instrument possibly the covenant here might amount to an absolute covenant not to sue when all the instalments have been paid, but there is no release until then, when all the conditions on the part of the debtor have been performed. The case of Ford v. Beach (6) is conclusive that a covenant not to sue cannot be pleaded as a bar to an action unless it be an absolute covenant; and all the Courts have concurred in holding that deeds under the Bankrupt Act are not pleadable as a defence without they contain a release or satisfaction of the debt, or something to that effect.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. A covenant not to sue, it is clear, since the case of Thimbleby v. Barron (2), effects nothing but a suspension of the remedy. If, however, there be an agreement that it may be pleaded as a bar to an action, as was the case in Walker v. Nevill (3), it may be otherwise.

KEATING, J.—I also think that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. It is impossible to extend the covenant in the present case beyond a covenant not to sue for a limited time, and there is nothing in it like a release of the debt.

Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.
—Fishery.

Rights in gross are not within the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.

The declaration stated, that the defendants broke and entered a certain close of the plaintiff, being part of certain lands called the Low Bank Ground Estate, and landed and brought into and upon the said close certain fishing-nets, and thereby and therewith damaged the grass of the plaintiff there then growing.

The fifth and sixth pleas were as follows: And for a fifth plea the defendants say, that at the said time when, &c. the said close adjoined and was and the same now is part of the shore of the inland lake or water called Coniston or Thurston Water, and that the defendant Hughes Le Fleming, and all his ancestors, whose heir he is, for sixty years before this suit enjoyed as of right, and without interruption, a free fishery in the said water, with the right of landing and bringing their fishing-nets into and upon any part of the shore of the said water as to the said free fishery appertaining. And the defendants further say, that the defendant Hughes Le Fleming, and the other defendants as his servants, and by his command, did what is complained of in the lawful and reasonable use and exercise of the said right, and not otherwise.

And for a sixth plea the defendants say, that at the said times, when, &c. the said close adjoined and was and the same now is part of the shore of the said inland lake or water called Coniston or Thurston Water, and that the defendant Hughes Le Fleming, and all his ancestors, whose heir he is, for thirty years before this suit enjoyed as of right, and without interruption, a free fishery in the said water, with the right of landing and bringing their fishing-nets into and upon any part of the shore of the said water as to the said free fishery appertaining. And the defendants further say, that the defendant Hughes Le Fleming, and the other defendants as his servants, and by his command, did what is complained of in the lawful and reasonable use and exercise of the said right, and not otherwise.

To these pleas the plaintiff demurred.

Mellish, for the plaintiff.—A claim in gross is not within the Prescription Act; there must be a dominant and servient tenement; section 5. shews this conclusively; it professes to give the form of pleading for all cases within the act, and its provisions would not apply to a right in gross. Again, in Welcome v. Upton (1), Parke, B. says, "If the only question in the case had been whether a right of common in gross be within the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 5, we should probably have granted a rule for the purpose of giving that question further consideration, although we might be disposed to think that the present case is within the equity of the statute;" and in Bailey v. Stephens (2), Willes, J. says,

"There is no doubt an easement in gross could not be claimed by an occupier under the Prescription Act;" and in Mounsey v. Iremay (3), Martin, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, intimated that the Court were inclined to think an easement in gross was not within the statute, though after the doubts expressed in Welcome v. Upton (1), and in Gale on Easements (p. 152, 3rd edit.), they were not prepared to decide that this was so. Again, mere user would not shew a right in a man and his ancestors, for the thirty or sixty years might be in one man's life, and he then surely could not prescribe in his ancestors.

Manisty (J. R. Russell, with him), contra. —The owner of the bank is, prima facie, the owner of the bed of the lake, and we may, therefore, suppose a grant of the right of fishing with the right to land nets as appendant to it; this is a profit à prendre, it might be prescribed for, and why should the statute not apply? The preamble is perfectly general, and the mischief to be remedied applies equally to a right in gross and to one appurtenant. And even if we suppose that there was a reservation, the reasoning is the same, for this would take effect as a grant—Wickham v. Hawker (4), where it was decided that a reservation of hunting, &c., to a man, his heirs and assigns, was a grant of an assignable profit and within the Prescription Act. Again, in Gray v. Bond (5), it was held that a jury might presume, from twenty years' user, a grant of a right to land nets from the owners of the land to the lessees of the fishery. In Welcome v. Upton (1), the expressions of Parke, B. are in the defendants' favour; so are the notes to Gale on Easements, 3rd edit. pp. 10, 13, 151, 152; and section 5. applies only where you prescribe in a "que" estate. The case of an enjoyment during one man's life alone presents no difficulty; such a right as this is one which may be granted to a man and his heirs—Gray v. Bond (5), and the judgment of Erle, C.J. in Bailey v. Stephens (2); and the enjoyment being had, such a grant may be presumed.

Mellish, in reply.—There is no case to shew that previous to the statute you could prove such a right as this by simple user; in Wickham v. Hawker (4) there was a deed which was actually produced; and in Gray v. Bond (5), as in Davies's case (6), the right was appurtenant and not in gross. Rights in gross ought not to be favoured in the same way as rights appurtenant to land. Such a right as the present does not come within the mischief of the statute; for the recital refers to "time immemorial," and a defeat by reason of "shewing the commencement;" whereas before the statute in no case had such a right been proved (nor could it be proved) without in some way shewing its nature and origin, as by producing a grant.

He also argued the question as to whether the words of the pleas meant to assert a sole and several fishery, or a common of fishery, and the consequences in the two different cases; and he cited, Malcolmson v. O'Dea (7), Co. Lit. 121 b, 122 a, Com. Dig. tit. 'Piscary,' but the view the Court took on the first point renders it unnecessary to allude further to the second point.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the COURT (Erle, C.J., Willes, J., Byles, J. and Smith, J.) was delivered (July 10,) by—

SMITH, J.—To a declaration in trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close and landing fishing-nets there, the defendant pleaded that the land was part of the shore of an inland lake called Coniston Water, and that the defendant Le Fleming and all his ancestors, whose heir he is, for sixty years before the suit enjoyed as of right, and without interruption, a free fishery in the said water, with the right of landing their nets on the shore as to the free fishery appertaining, and then justified the trespasses under these alleged rights. There was a similar plea alleging the enjoyment for twenty years. To these pleas the plaintiff demurred, and the demurrer raises the question, whether the rights, so pleaded to belong to the defendant in gross, are within the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.

The construction of the statute on this point is not free from difficulty, and, although the question has arisen in the courts, it has not been decided. We are now called on to determine it, and upon consideration of all the provisions of the act, we are led to the conclusion that rights claimed in gross are not within it.

The language of the first section may be sufficiently large to include some rights in gross. The subjects of claim are "right of common or other profit or benefit to be taken and enjoyed from or upon any land." The first and governing subject of claim referred to is "right of common." This general phrase, which defines no species of common, is no doubt wide enough to include a right of common in gross, as common of pasture; but it is not an apt or proper phrase to designate a several right to the exclusive pasturage of land, or any other several and exclusive right to take any particular profit of the land. A sole and several right of pasturage in gross claimed by prescription was upheld by the Court of Exchequer, in Welcome v. Upton (1). (See also Co. Lit. 122 a). So a right to take all the wood in a certain close may lawfully exist as a profit à prendre in gross—Sir Francis Barrington's case (8). But such a right cannot be claimed as appurtenant to land, because it is in its nature wholly unconnected with the enjoyment of the supposed dominant tenement and its necessities—Bailey v. Stephens (2). So a right to a several fishery and a right to take minerals may lawfully exist as a right of profit à prendre in gross. These rights in gross, however, would not be aptly or properly described by the expression "right of common" in the Prescription Act, and the succeeding words may reasonably be construed to relate to a profit or benefit of the same nature. If, then, there are some rights of profit à prendre in gross which do not fall within the fair meaning of the act, it seems a reasonable ground for presuming that the legislature did not intend to deal with rights in gross at all, but contemplated only those more usual and ordinary rights of common and profit à prendre which are in some way appurtenant to land, and are limited to the wants of a dominant tenement.

It may be observed that the instances in which rights in gross have come before the Courts are very rare, and that the mischief referred to in the preamble of the Prescription Act arose in the litigation which was of constant occurrence between the owners of dominant and servient tenements.

We think, however, that the 1st section ought not to be read alone, but must be construed by reference to the other provisions of the Act.

The 2nd section relates to easements and watercourses. We think this section refers to easements properly so called, and to rights which are in some way appurtenant to a dominant tenement. The Court of Exchequer, in the case of Mounsey v. Iremay (3), appears to have come to this conclusion. In the judgment of that Court it is said, "We further think that the 2nd section itself points to a right belonging to an individual in respect of his land." Again, "What we think Lord Tenterden contemplated were incorporeal rights incident to and annexed to property for its more beneficial and profitable enjoyment." The limited scope of the 2nd section affords some ground for arriving at what was the intention of the legislature in the 1st section, especially as the introductory words are the same in both; viz. "No claim which may be lawfully made at the common law by custom, prescription, or grant."

But the fifth clause, which relates to pleading, seems to us to give a key to the construction of the act. That section professes to enact forms of pleading applicable to all the rights within the act theretofore claimed to have existed from time immemorial, and which forms, it declares, shall in all such cases be sufficient. These forms have clear relation to rights which are appurtenant to land, and to such rights only. The second branch of the section enacts: "That in all pleadings to actions of trespass, and in all other pleadings wherein, before the passing of this act, it would have been necessary to allege the right to have existed from time immemorial," including therefore all rights claimable by prescription, "it shall be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof as of right by the occupiers of the tenement in respect whereof the same is claimed for and during such of the periods mentioned in the act as may be applicable to the case, and without claiming in the name or right of the owner of the fee, as is now usually done." The whole principle of this pleading assumes a dominant tenement and an enjoyment of the right by the occupiers of it. The proof must, of course, follow and support the pleading. It is obvious that rights claimed in gross cannot be so pleaded or proved. If, therefore, they are held to be within the act, the enactment as to pleading cannot be satisfied; for, then, that mode of pleading which the statute enacts shall, in all cases of rights theretofore claimed from time immemorial, be sufficient, would not only not be sufficient, but in certain cases manifestly inapplicable. Assuming the legislature to have had in view in this clause (as its language imports) all the rights formerly claimable by prescription to which the act was intended to apply, it is necessary implication to hold that prescriptive rights in gross are not within the scope of the statute at all. If the statute were in other respects free from doubt, possibly the effect of this clause might be got over; but we own that we think it indicates with tolerable clearness the subjects with which the legislature intended to deal.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that great difficulties would arise as to the evidence necessary to establish the nature and quality of rights in gross, if they were assumed to be within the statute, which do not occur in the case of rights proved and determined by user and enjoyment by the occupiers of a dominant tenement; as, for instance, whether sixty or thirty years' enjoyment by one man in the course of his own life, and no more, would establish any right, either a right in that man for life, or a descendible right in gross, although there might be nothing in the nature of his single enjoyment to indicate perpetuity. If rights in gross were intended to be dealt with, it might reasonably be expected that some guide to solve difficulties of this kind, either by the mode of pleading or otherwise, would have been found in the act. In the view we take it is not necessary to decide whether the words "free fishery" in these pleas mean a sole and several fishery, or a common of fishery. Whichever they mean, the right is claimed in gross. Having come to the conclusion that the provisions of the Prescription Act are not applicable to rights so claimed, it follows that the pleas are bad, and that our judgment on the demurrers must be given for the plaintiff.

Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, ss. 69, 73.—Sewers—Drains.

A vestry of a parish mentioned in Schedule (A.) to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, having resolved, under section 73, that the drainage of several houses into an old sewer was insufficient, and that such sewer should be discontinued, gave notice to the owners of such houses to make new drains into a new sewer, and upon default of the owners, the vestry made them themselves. They then attempted to recover the expense from the house-owners (by summons against the occupier under section 96. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102.) before a Magistrate, on the ground that they were acting under section 73. The Magistrate decided that the facts brought the case within section 69. and refused to make any order:—Held, that there was nothing to shew that the drains were insufficient; that the vestry could not by their finding conclusively bring the case within section 73; that it was competent for the Magistrate to refuse his order on the ground that the case fell within section 69; and that his decision on this matter (which was partly a question of law and partly one of fact) was right, as the facts shewed that the new drains were rendered necessary by the draining into the new sewer, and not by the insufficiency of the old drains.

Error in Fact—Contradicting the Record—Special Jury—Omission to Summon—Tales—Jury Act (6 Geo. 4. c. 50.)—Calling the Names of the Jurors in Court.

Upon a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff assigned as errors in fact, that the defendant obtained a rule for a special jury, whereupon twenty-four special jurymen were duly struck, pursuant to the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 50, as the jurors to be returned for the trial of the issue; that eight of this special jury so struck were not summoned, and the names of the special jurors not having been called over in court, at or after ten o'clock, the hour named in the summons, only ten of the special jurors appeared and were sworn on the said jury:—Held, that the errors so assigned were invalid, as they contradicted the record, which must be considered as containing a statement that all the requisites for having a sufficient jury had been observed, and that the Court sat at a time when, and was otherwise constituted so that it could properly exercise jurisdiction.

Held, also, that these and like objections are not, for all purposes, admitted by demurring to the assignment of errors, but only so when properly assigned and lawfully assignable as ground of error.

Semble—If the plaintiff had sustained any real injustice by the errors complained of, his remedy was to have applied by motion to the Court, when the Court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, would have interfered, if necessary.

Error in fact.

The nature of the errors assigned and the points argued are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

On the argument, the plaintiff appeared in person, and The Solicitor General (T. Jones and Hannen being with him), for the defendant, when the following authorities were cited in addition to those mentioned in the judgment—Haldane v. Beauclerk (1), Co. Lit., 156, 2 Chit. Arch., 11th edit. 1461, Bousse v. Cannington (2), Helbut v. Held (3), Plommer v. Webb (4), Malins v. Werby (5), Ex parte Newton (6), Bac. Abr., tit. 'Error,' K. 5, and Andrews v. Elliott (7).

The case was argued on the 19th and 20th of June.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

WILLES, J.—This is error in fact upon a judgment for the defendant founded upon a verdict in his favour pronounced by a jury of the county of Middlesex, upon a trial before the Lord Chief Justice. The argument took place on the 19th and 20th of June 1865, before my Brother Byles and myself, when we took time to consider.

The assignment of error states, in effect, that the defendant obtained a rule for a special jury, whereupon twenty-four special jurymen were duly struck, pursuant to the statute, as the jurors to be returned for the trial of the issue; that eight of this special jury so struck were not summoned to attend as jurors on the trial; that by reason of those persons not having been summoned, and the names of the special jurors not having been called over in court at or after ten o'clock, the hour named in the summons, only ten of the special jurors appeared and were sworn on the said jury. The precise objections upon which this assignment of error is founded are, therefore, first, that eight of the special jury were in fact unsummoned; secondly, that the names of the special jurors were not called over at or after ten o'clock; and lastly, that as a consequence there were only ten special jurymen on the jury, upon which, therefore, there must have been two talesmen.

The plaintiff in error relied upon the Jury Act (6 Geo. 4. c. 50), s. 30, by which it is enacted that when a special jury is struck, "the jury so struck shall be the jury returned for the trial of such issue," and he shewed much industry in citing numerous cases in which a trial by a common jury after a special jury had been struck was set aside by the Court upon motion, amongst which are Holt v. Meadcroft (8), Ilague v. Hall (9), Newman v. Graham (10) and Montague v. Smith (11); and he placed much reliance upon the opinion expressed by Lord Denman in O'Connell's case (12), as to the right to challenge the array when the jury-book is improperly made up. It was further insisted by the plaintiff that, notwithstanding the language of section 37. of the Jury Act, viz., "where a full jury shall not appear," a prayer of tales can only be made when the jury are in default, which they are not if they have not been summoned; that the issue not having been tried by a lawful jury, the judgment is a nullity; and that the names of the jury ought to have been called over at or after ten o'clock.

On the part of the defendant this line of argument was not traversed, nor was it denied that either party has a right to challenge the array if improperly constituted, or the individual jurymen if disqualified; nor that he has a right to object to a prayer of tales made before the proper jury panel has been perused; nor that the Court would, by virtue of its general jurisdiction to prevent abuse of its process, set aside the verdict upon motion absolutely, in the event of the defect of special jurors having been caused by malpractice of the successful party; nor that the Court would, in case of neglect, besides punishing the officer, redress any injustice which such neglect might have occasioned. But it was insisted that defects of the kind objected to in these proceedings, if not raised by challenge or motion, must be treated either as mere irregularities or as defects which have been passed by, and that the assertion of them at the present stage is in contradiction of the record, which either expressly or impliedly alleges regular proceedings, and so that the assignment of error is in violation of the well-established and wholesome rule that there shall be no averment of error against the record. Upon this point numerous authorities were cited, which were cited and commented upon by Lord Tenterden in The King v. Carlile (13). It was further argued that, consistently with the record, the plaintiff may have appeared at the trial and assented to the proceedings, intending to take his chance of the verdict being in his favour, and that so the objections, if any, may have been waived.

As to the first ground of objection, namely, that eight of the special jurors were not summoned by the sheriff, the assignment of error does not state how this omission took place. It imputes no fault to the defendant or to the sheriff, so that this objection falls nothing short of maintaining that an omission, whether wrongful or not, to summon any one or more jurymen or jurymen, makes all the subsequent proceedings void, if such omission, either alone or conjointly with any other irregularity, may have led to a talesman being upon the jury. This proposition is so novel as to require some authority to sustain it, and none has been adduced. Many causes have been tried, and are tried at every sitting, by a jury partly composed of talesmen, in cases where, either without any default on the part of either the parties or the sheriff's officer, or because of the inadvertence of the latter, one or more of the special jurymen have not been summoned. Similar irregularities, if they be such, must have been over and over again committed, without objection, since the passing of the Jury Act. It is simpler and safer, however, to conclude, not that all these trials have been unwarranted, and the judgments founded thereupon erroneous as contrary to the Jury Act, but that the express language of the 37th section of that statute was framed to exclude any such objection; and that a prayer of tales may be made when and "if a full jury shall not appear," without regard to the causes of their not appearing, over which the Court in banco may exercise a control by motion, if justice so requires. And this is consistent with what is stated in 3 Black. Com., 365, that "if, by means of challenges or other cause, a sufficient number of unexceptionable jurors doth not appear at the trial, either party may pray a tales." As for the alleged error in not calling over the names of the special jurors in court at or after ten o'clock, the hour named in their summons, it is not quite clear whether it is meant to say that the Court sat before ten, or that, sitting after ten, it proceeded without calling over the names of the special jurors, in a slipshod fashion directing such of the special jury as were in court to get into the box without naming them, and then proceeding to swear two talesmen to make the jury. Whichever be the true construction of the assignment of error, the Court has full control over such and similar irregularities upon motion; and in that proceeding it is enabled to decide according to the merits, and to interfere or not according as the irregularity complained of has wrought injustice in the particular case; of which good examples will be found in Curtis v. March (14), where the Court granted a new trial, because the Judge through mistake had sat before ten, and a verdict was found against a defendant who was taken by surprise; and in Williams v. the Great Western Railway Company (15), where the Court refused a new trial upon a verdict properly found for a railway company by a jury, one of whom was a shareholder, though that fact was unknown to the opposite party. In this form of proceeding we have no such control, but must decide "aye" or "no," whether there be ground of error, and if there be, we have no alternative, but must reverse the judgment, though no injustice appears to have been done, and, even if we should be of opinion that there is no cause of action upon the record. And in our opinion that equitable jurisdiction to which the plaintiff might have appealed if he had sustained any real injustice, is the limit of our authority over such irregularities; for the record of a superior court, when made up, is the conclusive statement of a proceeding conducted with all the formalities required for a judgment, and it states, either expressly or by necessary implication, that the proceeding was one in which the Court exercised its jurisdiction in a judicial way, and therefore that the jury was one not merely in name but in law and fact, and that the Court sat at a time when, and was otherwise so constituted that, it could properly exercise jurisdiction. It is scarcely necessary to observe that with respect to the objections urged, a writ of error in fact does not lie to correct an error of the Court which can only be set right by a writ of error in law, when such error does appear and ought to appear on the record—Mellish v. Richardson (16), and that the record of the postea is equally conclusive as the record of the Court itself: Lilly's Practical Register, tit. 'Error.' To shew that the errors assigned are in contradiction to this record, it is only necessary to refer to the old form of entry of the postea upon the record in Tidd's Forms. viz. "and the jurors of that jury being summoned, some of them, that is to say, E. F.," &c. "come and are sworn upon that jury, and because the residue of the jurors of that jury do not appear, therefore others of the bystanders being chosen by the sheriff of the county aforesaid, at the request of the said A. B. (or C. D.) and by the command of the said Chief Justice are appointed anew, whose names are annexed to the within-written pannel, according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided." The Judges, in framing the present compendious form of record did so not to alter the law in so material a point, but to express shortly and in a manner not so open to former objections that all the requisites for having a sufficient jury had been observed. Upon this ground, the validity of which has been so often affirmed, and for such convincing reasons in the authorities referred to by the Solicitor General, which we need not recite, we are satisfied that the judgment is not open to either of the objections urged against it by the plaintiff, and that it ought to be affirmed. To prevent misapprehension, we may add that these and like objections are not for all purposes admitted by demurring to the assignment of errors, but only so in the event of their being properly assigned and lawfully assignable as ground of error. In this case it was useless to inquire into the facts, because, admitting them for argument's sake to be true, they are not capable of being assigned as errors in fact, and we cannot allow of their validity without departing from au-

Ship and Shipping—Measurement of Tonnage of Steam Ships—Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. ss. 23, 29.—Rules, Validity of.

With reference to regulating the mode of ascertaining the register tonnage of steam ships, the 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.) provides, that in every ship propelled by steam power an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and that the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship; and in directing how such deduction shall be estimated, the section makes a distinction between ships propelled by paddle-wheels and those propelled by screws, and provides that where the tonnage of the space occupied by the boilers and machinery is above a certain per-centage, and there is no agreement between the Commissioners of Customs and the owners, the deduction shall consist of the actual space so occupied, with the addition, in case of paddle-wheels, of one-half, and in case of screws, of three-fourths of the tonnage of such space, and the measurement and use of such space shall be governed by the rules which are afterwards set out in that section. The 29th section empowers the Commissioners, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, to make such modifications and alterations in the tonnage rules as may become necessary, "in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principles of admeasurement therein adopted."—Held, that this last section did not authorize the making of rules which, abolishing the distinction between paddle-wheels and screws, in estimating the deduction to be made for space occupied by boilers and machinery, substituted one uniform allowance for all classes of steam vessels, together with a new mode of ascertaining by admeasurement such allowance.

The following SPECIAL CASE was stated by consent without pleadings.

The plaintiffs are a company trading between England and Ireland, and are possessed of many steam vessels of large tonnage, which are used by them in their trade of carrying passengers and goods to and from England and Ireland.

The defendant is one of the surveyors of Customs at the port of Liverpool, and represents the Commissioners of Customs, with whom the present question has arisen.

The question in dispute arises upon the construction of certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which regulate the mode of ascertaining the registered tonnage of steamships, and as to the power of the Commissioners of Customs to refuse the allowance for propelling power, which, as the plaintiffs insist, is provided for by the act of parliament as hereinafter mentioned.

By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.) s. 23, it is enacted as follows: "In every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine-room, an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid, and the remainder shall be deemed to be the registered tonnage of such ship; and such deduction shall be estimated as follows (that is to say):

(a) As regards ships propelled by paddle-wheels in which the tonnage of the space solely occupied by and necessary for the proper working of the boilers and machinery is above 20 per cent. and under 30 per cent. of the gross tonnage of the ship, such deduction shall be thirty-seven one-hundredths of such gross tonnage; and in ships propelled by screws in which the tonnage of such space is above 13 per cent. and under 20 per cent. of such gross tonnage, such deductions shall be thirty-two one-hundredths of such gross tonnage.

(b) As regards all other ships, the deduction shall, if the Commissioners of Customs and the owner both agree thereto, be estimated in the same manner; but either they or he may in their or his discretion require the space to be measured and the deduction estimated accordingly; and whenever such measurement is so required the deduction shall consist of the tonnage of the space actually occupied by or required to be inclosed for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, with the addition in the case of ships propelled with paddle-wheels of one-half, and in the case of ships propelled with screws of three-fourths of the tonnage of such space; and the measurement and use of such space shall be governed by the following rules (that is to say):

(1.) Measure the mean depth of the space from its crown to the ceiling at the limber strake; measure also three, or, if necessary, more than three breadths of the space at the middle of its depth, taking one of such measurements at each end, and another at the middle of the length; take the mean of such breadths; measure also the mean length of the space between the foremost and aftermost bulkheads or limits of its length, excluding such parts (if any) as are not actually occupied by or required for the proper working of the machinery; multiply together these three dimensions of length, breadth and depth, and the product will be the cubical contents of the space below the crown; then find the cubical contents of the space or spaces (if any) above the crown aforesaid, which are framed in for the machinery or for the admission of light and air, by multiplying together the length, depth and breadth thereof; add such contents to the cubical contents of the space below the crown; divide the sum by 100; and the result shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the said space.

(2.) If in any ship in which the space aforesaid is to be measured the engines and boilers are fitted in separate compartments, the contents of each shall be measured severally in like manner, according to the above rules, and the sum of their several results shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the said space.

(3.) In the case of screw steamers in which the space aforesaid is to be measured, the contents of the shaft-trunk shall be added to and deemed to form part of such space, and shall be ascertained by multiplying together the mean length, breadth and depth of the trunk, and dividing the product by 100.

(4.) If in any ship in which the space aforesaid is to be measured any alteration be made in the length or capacity of such space, or if any cabins be fitted in such space, such ship shall be deemed to be a ship not registered until re-measurement.

(5.) If in any ship in which the space aforesaid is to be measured any goods or stores are stowed or carried in such space, the master and owner shall each be liable to a penalty not exceeding 100*l*."

By the 29th section of the same act it is further enacted as follows: "The Commissioners of Customs may, with the sanction of the Treasury, appoint such persons to superintend the survey and admeasurement of ships as they think fit; and may, with the approval of the Board of Trade, make such regulations for that purpose as may be necessary; and also, with the like approval, make such modifications and alterations as from time to time become necessary in the tonnage rules hereby prescribed, in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principle of admeasurement therein adopted."

There are several other sections of the act which have some bearing on this question, and to which it may be useful to refer, viz., sections 20, 21, 84, 86. and 87.

On the 23rd of October 1860 the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, issued the following rules: "In pursuance of the powers granted by the 29th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the Board, with the approval of the Board of Trade, direct, with a view to the more accurate and uniform application of the principle of granting a certain allowance to steamers for their propelling powers, that, in lieu of the rules set forth in section 23. of the Merchant Shipping Act, and in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 18. and 20. of instructions to measuring surveyors, of 1855, the following rules be adopted in future, viz.:

(Rule) In every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine-room, an allowance of space or tonnage shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power; and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship, and such deduction shall be estimated as follows:

(1.) Measure the mean length of the engine-room between the foremost and aftermost bulkheads, or limits of its length, excluding such parts, if any, as are not actually occupied by or required for the proper working of the machinery; then measure the depth of the ship at the middle point of this length from the ceiling at the limber strake to the upper deck in ships of three decks and under, and to the third deck or deck above the tonnage deck in all other ships; also the inside breadth of the ship, clear of spousing (if any) at the middle of the depth; multiply together these dimensions of length, breadth and depth for the cubical contents; divide this product by 100, and the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the engine-room, or allowance to be deducted from the gross tonnage on account of the propelling power.

(2.) In the case of ships having more than three decks, the tonnage of the space or spaces betwixt decks (if any) above the third deck, which are framed in for the machinery, or for the admission of light and air, found by multiplying together the length, breadth and depth thereof, and dividing the product by 100, shall be added to the tonnage of such space.

(3.) In the case of screw steamers the tonnage of the shaft-trunk shall be deemed to form part of and be added to such space, and shall be ascertained by multiplying together the length, breadth and depth of the trunk, and dividing the product by 100.

(4.) In any ship in which the machinery may be fitted in separate compartments, the tonnage of each such compartment shall be measured severally in like manner, according to the above rules, and the sum of their results shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the said space.

Ordered, that the proper officers in London, and the collectors and comptrollers at the outports, do govern themselves accordingly in all future operations for estimating the allowance to steamers for their propelling powers; and with regard to the engine-rooms, or allowance to the steamers already measured, that they be re-measured agreeably to the above modification of the rule on the application of their owners or agents, and on delivery of the original certificate for indorsement."

At the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the plaintiffs were and still are possessed of (amongst other ships) the paddle-wheel steamer St. Colomba. Her tonnage space, solely occupied by and necessary for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, was and is above 30 per cent. of her gross tonnage.

After the passing of the said act the plaintiffs applied, in accordance with the provisions thereof, to have the said ship measured, and the vessel was accordingly measured by the proper officer, and a deduction for the space occupied by the propelling power was allowed according to clause (b) of the 23rd section of the act, including the addition of one-half the tonnage of the space of the propelling power. Her register tonnage for dues was then ascertained and fixed at 206 tons, and her tonnage was accordingly so entered in the registry of shipping in the port of Dublin.

In 1862 the plaintiffs lengthened the said ship St. Colomba by adding to her length 40 feet, and as this increased her tonnage, it became necessary, in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, to have her re-measured, and she was accordingly re-measured by the proper officer for the purpose in the port of Liverpool, where the alterations in her were being made, and without any application being made by the plaintiffs. The tonnage space solely occupied by the propelling power was then above 30 per cent. of her tonnage, as before mentioned.

On this re-measurement the gross tonnage of the ship was increased by 122 tons. The officers who conducted the measurement measured her according to the directions contained in the new Customs Rules of the 23rd of October 1860. They allowed only the exact space occupied by or required to be inclosed for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, and declined to allow the one-half the tonnage of the said space, as directed by the 23rd section of the said act. By this mode of measurement the tonnage for dues was increased to 456 tons. The plaintiffs objected to this mode of measuring and making the allowance for the propelling power, and required to have the allowance made according to their views of the provisions of the act of parliament, and insisted that the Commissioners of Customs had no power to refuse such allowance.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the additional allowance of one-half the tonnage of the space occupied by the propelling power ought or not to have been made by the officers of registry at Liverpool.

On the 20th of June—

Bovill (Watkin Williams with him) argued for the plaintiffs, and

The Solicitor General (Giffard and C. Pollock with him), for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEATING, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court (1).—In this case a steamship belonging to the plaintiffs, called the St. Colomba (paddle-wheel), at the passing of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. (the Merchant Shipping Act), had been measured under the provisions of the 23rd section of that statute, and its register tonnage ascertained in the mode pointed out thereby. An increase, however, in the length of the ship in 1862, by augmenting her tonnage, rendered a fresh survey necessary, and she was accordingly re-measured according to the directions contained in certain new Custom Rules of the 23rd of October 1860, framed by the Commissioners of Customs, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, the application of which to the plaintiffs' ship increased the registered tonnage beyond that which would have resulted from a measurement under the former system. To this the plaintiffs objected, and contended that the new Rules issued by the Commissioners of Customs were inoperative as contrary to the provisions of the act of parliament, and the question for the Court is, whether they are right in that contention, and we think they are.

The 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act provides that, in every ship propelled by steam, "an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship, . . . and such deduction shall be estimated as follows: as regards ships propelled by paddle-wheels in which the tonnage of the space solely occupied by and necessary for the proper working of the boilers and machinery is above 20 per cent. and under 30 per cent. of the gross tonnage of the ship, such deduction shall be thirty-seven one-hundredths of such gross tonnage; and in ships propelled by screws in which the tonnage of such space is above 13 per cent. and under 20 per cent. of such gross tonnage, such deductions shall be thirty-two one-hundredths of such gross tonnage." In all other ships, where there is no agreement between the Commissioners and the owners, the deduction shall consist of the actual space occupied by the machinery, &c., with the addition in case of paddle-wheels of one-half, and in case of screws of three-fourths of the tonnage of such space, and the measurement and use of such space, shall be governed by the following rules; and then follow five rules for measuring the space referred to.

The 29th section of the act gives power to the Commissioners, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, to make such modifications and alterations in the tonnage rules as may become necessary in "order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principles of admeasurement therein adopted." It was under this section that the new rules referred to were made, and those rules in effect repeal the provisions of section 23. of the statute as to all distinctions between the different classes and kinds of steam vessels therein referred to, as well as the different deductions appropriated to each class, and substitutes one uniform allowance for all classes of steam vessels, together with a new mode of ascertaining by admeasurement such allowance.

The Solicitor General, for the defendant, contended that the provisions in the statute establishing the distinctions referred to were not enactments properly so called, but merely tonnage rules, the alteration of which by the Commissioners came within the express powers conferred upon them by section 29, and that, although section 23. was subdivided into several rules, yet that it was itself a tonnage rule, and so within these powers, and he referred to the mode in which the rules were designated in the margin of the statute in support of his views. On the other hand, it was insisted that the tonnage rules referred to in section 29. of the act were the rules specified as such in the different sections of that part of the statute, and which regulate the mode of measurement and nothing more; so that the allowance of any deductions from the gross tonnage was not more clearly an enactment than the direction that such deduction should be estimated according to the specified differences in the classes of vessels enumerated in the section, whilst the mode of measuring the spaces according to such classification is expressly governed by the five rules set out at the end of the section, nor could the statements in the margin control or affect the terms of the enactment. We think this the correct view of the statute, and that it was not the intention of the legislature to give to the Commissioners the powers contended for by the defendant. Whether the new rules so framed would or would not be beneficial to the mercantile marine of the country, is a question which, although mooted at the bar, we do not inquire into. The rules themselves being, in our opinion, ultra vires, our judgment will be for the plaintiffs.

To a declaration for breaches of covenants contained in a lease, in writing, of certain premises from the plaintiffs to the defendant, the defendant pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy, a refusal by the creditors' assignee to accept the lease, his own execution of a surrender of the lease to the plaintiffs, his tender of the deed of surrender, and offer to deliver up possession to them, without, however, alleging that the lease was lost or destroyed, or that he was prevented from giving it up:—Held, that the plea was bad.

This was a demurrer to a plea.

The declaration was for breaches of covenants contained in a lease of certain premises by the plaintiffs to the defendant, whereby the defendant undertook to pay certain rent and keep up an insurance on the premises.

The fourth plea, after alleging at length that before the breaches the defendant had petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy, had been adjudicated bankrupt, and an assignee appointed, and that before suit he had obtained his discharge, went on as follows: "And the defendant further says, that after the said appointment of the said creditors' assignee of the estate and effects of the defendant as hereinbefore mentioned, and before this suit, the said assignee of the estate and effects of the defendant declined to take the said lease in the declaration mentioned, or the benefit thereof, and that within fourteen days after the defendant had notice that the said assignee had so declined, and before this suit, he, the defendant, duly made and executed and delivered a certain deed under his seal, whereby he, the defendant, surrendered to the plaintiffs the said demised premises, and all the residue of the said term then to come and unexpired therein, and all his, the defendant's, estate and interest therein, and was then and before this suit ready and willing to, and tendered and offered to deliver the said deed to the plaintiffs, and at the same time offered to deliver up possession of their said premises to the plaintiffs accordingly.

To this plea the plaintiffs demurred.

Pepper* (2), and Parke, B. in Briggs v. Sowry (3). The case of Manning v. Flight (4) shews that a strict construction should be put on a section like this.

Coleridge, in support of the plea.—The question is, whether the actual piece of paper is to be given up, and Slack v. Sharpe (1) is an authority that it need not. The words of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 75. are the same as in section 145. of the Bankrupt

Law Consolidation Act, 1849. The case of Grimman v. Legge (5) and other cases shew that a surrender destroys a lease. Suppose the lease destroyed, everything possible has been done by the lessee. Suppose the paper delivered up, but not possession, the words but not the spirit of the section would be fulfilled; and this shews that a literal construction is not to be adopted.

WILLES, J.—This is an action by a lessor against a lessee, on the covenants in a lease. The plea is founded on section 145. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and contains no statement that the lease is lost or destroyed, or that the bankrupt is prevented from giving up the lease, and I therefore think the plea is bad. Section 145. seems to imply that it contemplated a discharge on the giving up of a lease in writing, and if that section requires a literal construction, and applies only to a lease in writing, then the matter seems clear. But still, if the lessee shewed the impossibility of an actual delivery up of the lease, and gave up possession of the premises, this might be sufficient. Slack v. Sharpe (1) puts a different construction on the section, and I, for my part, do not say that that decision is not right. That case decides that the intention is to relieve the tenant, and that the section, therefore, applies to cases where the lease is by parol; and the language of the section is there explained to be that upon giving up the lease (if any) the bankrupt shall not be liable. It is urged here that we should act on that case, as the defendant has executed a surrender in so far as he has not been prevented by the refusal of his landlord. But in order to fulfil the requirements of Slack v. Sharpe (1) the plea should have shewn that there was no lease in writing, and that there has been a substantial compliance with the section, and I am of opinion that it is bad for not shewing the impossibility of a delivery up of the lease.

Baron and Feme — Conveyance — Dispensing with Concurrence of Husband — 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 91.

The Court will not make an order enabling a married woman to convey, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 91, unless there has been a sale of the property which she is desirous of having the power to convey.

Bridge moved for an order, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 91, to dispense with the concurrence of the husband of Mary Graham in the conveyance of certain property by her, to which she had become entitled under the will of her late father. It appears on affidavit that the husband has deserted his wife, and has not been heard of for fifteen years, and his residence is unknown. Part of the property has been sold, and it is probable that Mrs. Graham may sell the rest, and as the whole is very small, it is asked that one general order enabling her to convey may now be made, so as to save the expense of a future application to the Court, to enable her to convey the rest of the property when sold. The Court is never in the habit of inquiring to whom the property has been sold, nor will it sanction any particular form of conveyance—In re Woodall (1). There the rule, as drawn up in that case, is given in the note to the report, and it gives power to the married woman to convey her interest in the property generally “to such person or persons as she may think fit.”

[BYLES, J.—No authority was asked of the Court in that case for such a general licence as is here asked for.]

ERLE, C.J.—The practice has always been to make the order only where there has been some specific sale. It is now asked that the married woman may be enabled to convey part of the property in case she should find a purchaser for it. That has never been done, and the Court cannot make such general order.

Refused as to such general order.

1865. { THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY

LEY AND OTHERS.

Statute, Construction of—Private Estate Act—Leasing Power—Destruction of Power—Vesting settled Estates in Trustees to Sell.

By a private Estate Act of 1720 (6 Geo. 1. c. 29.) a family settlement of certain lands was confirmed, with a restriction on alienation; and a power to grant leases "at the usual and accustomed rents, boons and services," was conferred on each tenant in tail when in possession under the limitations of such settlement. By section 1. of an act of 1803 (43 Geo. 3. c. 40.) a portion of these lands was vested in trustees for sale, "freed, released and discharged, and absolutely acquitted, exempted and exonerated of and from all and every the uses, trusts, estates, entails, remainders, charges, powers, provisoes, limitations and agreements, in and by," inter alia, the said Estate Act of 1720, created and declared, except only such leases as had been theretofore made in pursuance of the powers contained in the said settlement and act, and the trustees were to re-invest the proceeds of the sale in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses and subject to the same powers as the lands so sold. The 7th section of the act of 1803 enacted, that until sale the said lands should be held and enjoyed, and the rents, issues and profits thereof should be received by such person as would have been entitled thereto in case such act had not been made:—Held, that the power of leasing given by the Estate Act of 1720 was destroyed as to the lands vested in the trustees for sale by the act of 1803, with the exception only of the leases which had been then made; and that therefore a lease made in 1838, in conformity with such power, was void as against the heir, notwithstanding section 7. of the act of 1803, and the fact that the lands had never been sold.

This was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover possession of certain messuages, lands, and hereditaments, in the township of Oxtan, in the parish of Woodchurch and county of Chester, to the possession whereof the plaintiffs, or one of them, claimed to be entitled, and to eject all other persons therefrom.

The cause came on to be tried, before Williams, J., at the Spring Assizes, holden at Chester, 1864, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

Charles Earl and Duke of Shrewsbury, being seised in his demesne as of fee of the whole of the township of Oxtan, in the county of Chester, by indentures of lease and release, dated the 30th and 31st of October 1700, settled the said township with other lands, after his own death and failure of his issue, and after other uses not necessary to be here mentioned and since determined, to the use of George Talbot for life, remainder to the first and other sons of the said George Talbot successively in tail male, remainder to John Talbot for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, remainder to Sir John Talbot for life, remainder to the first and other sons successively in tail male, reversion to the said Charles Earl and Duke of Shrewsbury in fee; and the said settlement contained powers of jointuring and leasing.

On the 1st of February 1717 the said Duke died, having by his will, dated the 19th of July 1712, devised other estates to the uses of the said settlement, and leaving his cousin Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury his heir-at-law.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 3rd and 4th of March 1718 (being the settlement on the marriage of the said George Talbot and Mary Fitzwilliam), the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury and certain other persons, according to their respective interests, conveyed, inter alia, the said township, after the determination of certain estates therein (which have long since determined) to the use of the said George Talbot for life, remainder (subject to a jointure rent-charge) to the use of the first and other the sons of the said George Talbot on the body of the said Mary Fitzwilliam, in tail male successively, remainder to his first and other sons by any after-taken wife successively in tail male, remainder to the said John Talbot for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male; and the now stating settlement contained powers of jointuring and leasing.

By section 2. of the said act it was enacted that, after the decease of the said George Talbot and John Talbot, and failure of issue male of their respective bodies (which events have happened), certain lands formerly of the said Duke, including the said township, should be and remain to the use of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, remainder to the use of all and every person or persons being issue male of the body of John the first Earl of Shrewsbury, to whom the title, honour and dignity of Earl of Shrewsbury should, after the decease of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, George Talbot and John Talbot, without issue male of their respective bodies, by virtue of the letters patent of creation of the said earldom, descend and come, severally and successively one after another, as they and every of them should succeed to and inherit the said earldom, and of the several and respective heirs male of the body and bodies of all and every such person and persons issuing to attend and wait upon the said earldom, and to be annexed to and descend with the same; and the said act contained powers to charge portions and other sums, and a restriction on alienation of the said estates.

By section 10. of the said act it was enacted that it should be lawful for the first and all and every son and sons of the body of the said George Talbot, and the several and respective heirs male of the body or bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing, and to and for the first and every other son and sons of the body of the said John Talbot, of Longford, and the several and respective heirs male of the body or bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing, and also to and for all and every other person and persons to whom the said hereditaments and premises were limited by the said act successively as aforesaid, by any deed or writing, by them respectively to be signed in the presence of two witnesses, to demise or lease all or any parts of the said hereditaments and premises, whereof the person making such lease should be actually possessed, to any person or persons in possession, and not in reversion, for the term of three lives or twenty-one years, or for any term or number of years determinable upon the death or determination of three lives, so as upon all and every such lease and leases there should be reserved and made payable yearly during the continuance thereof of the usual and accustomed yearly rents, boons, and services, with power of re-entry for non-payment thereof, and with the usual provision as to counterparts of the said leases.

At the time of the passing of the next-stated act, the said George Talbot was dead, and the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury was also dead, and the title of Earl of Shrewsbury, and the aforesaid hereditaments and premises, had descended to Charles, fifteenth Earl of Shrewsbury, who was grandson and heir male of the body of the said George Talbot by the said Mary his wife.

By an act passed in 1803 (43 Geo. 3. c. 40), intituled "An Act for vesting part of the settled estates of the Right Honourable Charles Earl of Shrewsbury, in the counties of Salop, Berks, Wilts and Oxford, in trustees, to be sold, and for laying out the monies to arise by such sale in the purchase of other lands to be settled in lieu thereof to the same uses and subject to the same restrictions," after recitals shewing the purposes of the act, it was enacted that certain hereditaments, limited and settled by the said indentures of the 3rd and 4th of March 1718, and "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," and mentioned in the schedule to the now stating act (which schedule included the whole of the said township of Oxton) should, from and after the passing of the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1803," be and the same were thereby vested in and settled upon Thomas Wright and Charles Conolly, Esquires, their heirs and assigns for ever, freed, released and discharged, and absolutely acquitted, exempted and exonerated of and from all and every the uses, trusts, estates, entails, remainders, charges, powers, provisos, limitations and agreements in and by the said indentures of settlement of the 30th and 31st of October 1700, the will of the said Charles Duke of Shrewsbury, the said indentures of the 3rd and 4th of March 1718, and the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," respectively created, limited, provided and declared of and concerning the same hereditaments and premises, or any of them, except only such leases as had been theretofore made or granted of the same respectively, in pursuance of the powers contained in the said settlement and act of parliament, upon trust that they the said Thomas Wright and Charles Connolly should, with all convenient speed, with the consent and approbation of the said Charles, the then Earl of Shrewsbury, to be testified by some writing under his hand, and after his decease then with the consent of the person or persons who should then be in possession of the said estates respectively by virtue of the limitations before mentioned, sell and dispose of the said hereditaments and premises so by the said act of 1803 vested in them as aforesaid, either together or in parcels, by public sale or private contract, unto any person or persons who should be willing to become the purchaser or purchasers thereof, for the best price that could be reasonably gotten for the same, and, upon payment of the purchase-mones for which the said hereditaments and premises should be sold, should convey and assure the same respectively unto and to the use of the purchasers thereof, their heirs and assigns respectively, or as they should direct or appoint, freed and discharged and acquitted, exempted and exonerated as aforesaid. The said act also provided for the re-investment of the proceeds of such sales in the purchase of other estates, to be settled to the same uses and subject to the same powers as the lands which had been sold.

By the 7th section of the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1803," it was enacted that, in the mean time, and until the said hereditaments and premises by the said act directed to be sold should be sold in pursuance of the trusts aforesaid, the same premises respectively should be held, possessed and enjoyed, and the rents, issues and profits thereof should be had, received and taken by and be applied to and for the benefit of such person as would have been entitled thereto, and ought to have held, possessed, or enjoyed and received the same respectively, in case the said last-mentioned act had not been made.

The 8th section of the said act conferred powers of appointing new trustees of the said act.

The plaintiff George Rice Lord Dynevor has been duly appointed and is now the sole surviving trustee of the said act, and the lands for the recovery of which this action is brought are now vested in the said George Rice Baron Dynevor, as such trustee as aforesaid, - but subject to the leases hereinafter mentioned, or one of them, in case the same are or is valid and subsisting.

The lands for the recovery of which this action is brought have not, nor has any part thereof, ever been sold under the provisions of the said act.

By indenture of lease, made the 2nd of November 1830 (which for the purposes of this case is admitted to have been executed and perfected in conformity with the powers contained in the act of 1720, save in so far as herein appears to the contrary), the Right Honourable John Earl of Shrewsbury being then heir male of the body of the second son of George Talbot (whose first son had died without leaving any issue male), son of Gilbert Talbot, in the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," mentioned, demised eighty acres in the said township of Oxtou (part of which are the lands sought to be recovered in this action) to Samuel Ackerley for ninety-nine years, from the said 2nd of November 1830, if three persons in the said indenture mentioned should so long live, at the yearly rent of 20*l.* for the first ten years, and 30*l.* for every year after the first ten; the said Samuel Ackerley covenanting to lay out 250*l.* in building on the said land within five years.

By indenture of lease of the 2nd of February 1838 (executed and perfected in like manner), the said John Earl of Shrewsbury, in consideration of the surrender of the said lease of the 2nd of November 1830, demised seventy-eight acres in the township of Oxtou (which are the lands sought to be recovered in this action) to Joseph Robinson Pim, for ninety-nine years, if three persons named in the said lease or either of them should so long live, at the yearly rent of 30*l.*, the said Pim covenanting to lay out 1,000*l.*

in building on the said land within five years.

One of the three persons named in the last-mentioned lease, upon whose deaths the same is determinable, is still living.

On the 9th of November, in the year of our Lord 1852, the said John Earl of Shrewsbury died, without leaving any male issue, and thereupon Bertram Arthur, the seventeenth and last Earl of Shrewsbury, succeeded to the title and estates annexed to it. He died a bachelor on the 10th of August 1856, and thereupon the issue male of George Talbot, on whom the estates were, by the settlement of the Duke of Shrewsbury and by the said act of 1720, settled in tail male, became extinct, and thereupon (upon failure and in default of issue male of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, of the said George Talbot, and of the said John Talbot, in the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," named) the present Earl of Shrewsbury became and now is the person, being issue male of the body of the said John, first Earl of Shrewsbury, to whom the said title, honour and dignity of Earl of Shrewsbury did, after the decease as aforesaid of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, George Talbot and John Talbot, without issue male of their respective bodies, by virtue of the said letters patent of creation of the said earldom, descend and come.

Prints of the Shrewsbury Estate Acts 1720 and 1803 respectively, and copies of the leases of the 2nd of November 1830, and of the 2nd of February 1838, respectively, were to be taken as part of the case.

The question for the consideration of the Court was, whether John Earl of Shrewsbury had power to demise by the said indenture of lease of the 2nd of February 1838 the lands by "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1803," vested in the trustees for sale, so as to bind the plaintiffs.

Manisty (Hannen with him), for the plaintiffs.—It is admitted that if the Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720 (6 Geo. 1. c. 29), had remained in force, John Earl of Shrewsbury was the person who might have granted the lease in question; but it is submitted that the leasing power which was conferred on him by section 10. of that act was destroyed by the act passed in 1803 (43 Geo. 3. c. 40). The 1st section of this last statute recites the settlement of March 1718 and the said act of 1720, and recites that parts of the settled estates consist of undivided shares, and others are dispersed, and far distant from the Earl's principal estates, and "that it would be greatly for the benefit of the said Earl and those entitled in remainder after him under the limitations in the said settlement and act of parliament, if all the said estates situated," &c. "were sold," and it then enacts that the lands and hereditaments mentioned in the schedule to the act (and which includes the lands sought to be recovered in this action) should be vested in the trustees for sale, Wright and Connolly, freed and discharged from all the powers created by the settlements of 1700 and 1718, and the act of 1720 (which would include, of course, the powers of leasing), except only the leases as had been then granted under such powers. The words of the 1st section of the act of 1803, which so takes the lands out of settlement and vests them in the trustees for sale, are fully set forth in the case, and they so completely destroy the previously existing powers to grant leases, that the Earl had no power to make the lease he did in 1838.

Sir Hugh Cairns (Mellish and Kay with him), for the defendants.—The lease in question is good, because the power of leasing conferred on the Earl by the first act, and which it is admitted by the other side would have authorized him to have made such lease in the way he did, if the act of 1803 had not been passed, was not affected by such last act as to lands which had not been sold when the power was exercised. It never was intended by the act of 1803 that, in order that the lands should be vested in trustees for sale, the whole machinery of enjoying the property (which would include, of course, that of leasing it for the best rents) should be destroyed, although the sale might probably not take place for some time, and, as has been the case here, perhaps not even take place at all. But the 7th section of this act of 1803 explains this, and shews that until sale the estates are to be enjoyed as if that act had not been passed, and therefore, conceding the legal estate in fee was vested in the trustees, still, until sale, the Earl was tenant in tail in equity, and entitled to enjoy the rents, issues and profits, and as a necessary consequence to have power of leasing, such power being a necessary part of enjoying the estate. It certainly was very desirable in this case that the person so entitled to the profits should have such, for as the trustees had only a power to sell and no power to lease, if leases were to be granted at all, they could only be granted by virtue of this 7th section. "Of all kinds of powers," says Lord Mansfield, in Taylor v. Horde (1), "the most frequent is that to make leases. For the encouragement of farmers to occupy, stock and improve the land, it is necessary they should have some permanent interest. Unless the owner of the estate for life was enabled to make a permanent lease, he could not enjoy to the best advantage during his own time; and they who come after must suffer by the land being untenanted, out of repair and in a bad condition." And in Skeels v. Shearly (2), Shadwell, V.C. observes, "As it is impossible that a settled estate can be enjoyed, except by means of the exercise of a power to lease, the Courts never allow leases granted by the tenant for life under his power to be defeated by the exercise of a power in the trustees to appoint new uses with the concurrence of the tenant for life." To the same effect is Sugden on Powers, 8th ed. 712, and Shannon v. Bradstreet (3), where Lord Redesdale shewed that a power to make leases was a power calculated for the benefit of the estate, and ought to be construed as liberally as powers of jointuring. The exercise of such a power would not impede the execution of the trust to sell; indeed, in practice, estates do not sell the worse, but, on the contrary, the better for being tenanted by solvent tenants at their full value. No precise words were necessary to reserve such power of leasing. "Powers," as stated by Lord St. Leonards (4), "are mere declarations of trust; and therefore any words, however informal, which clearly indicate an intention to give or reserve a power, are sufficient for the purpose." Moreover, the giving of such a power to one who had no estate, or only an equitable estate for life in the lands, is not inconsistent with an estate in fee in the trustees—Long v. Rankin (5). The parties interested in passing the statute of 1803 could have had no object in destroying the power to grant leases, and there can be no doubt that if other lands had been bought with the proceeds of the sale of the lands in question, such newly-acquired lands would have been subject to the powers of leasing given by the previous act of settlement. The trust under section 7. comes in as the first trust, and it is therefore a limitation of the estate to the trustees in trust, until sale, to allow the Earl to possess the estate, with all the incidents of such possession, namely, that of leasing; and a lease granted under such power would not be defeated by the subsequent execution of the power of sale—Sugden on Powers, 8th edit. 489 to 491.

Manisty, in reply. — The power of leasing given by section 10. of the statute of 1720 was not at the best rents which could be gotten, but "at the usual and accustomed yearly rents, boons, and services," so that there would be nothing to prevent the lessor from taking a fine on the granting of the lease. The statute of 1803 directs the trustees to sell freed and discharged from the powers of leasing, except as regards leases then already granted; and there is nothing in the 7th section in any way to alter this. That section enacts no more than equity would have allowed to the Earl in the absence of any such clause.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. By the statute of 1720, the settlement of March 1718 was confirmed, and the lands being thus in settlement, by section 10. of that statute a leasing power was given to each respective tenant in tail who should come into possession of the hereditaments under the limitations contained in that settlement; and it is obvious that it would be to the advantage of such tenant in possession not to lease at the best rents that could be obtained, but at the usual and accustomed rents, boons and services. Now, the estates being so settled, then came the statute of 1803, whereby a portion of such estates was taken out of settlement and vested in trustees for sale, with directions to re-invest the proceeds in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses and subject to the same powers as the estates which had been sold; and the words of the 1st section of that act are remarkably strong; they state that the lands are to be "freed, released and discharged; and absolutely acquitted, exempted and exonerated of and from all and every the uses, trusts, estates, entails, remainders, charges, powers, provisos, limitations and agreements in and by," inter alia, the said act of 1720 created and declared; and the said 1st section vests the lands so exonerated in trustees in fee, on trust for sale, and to convey the same to the purchasers, "freed and discharged and acquitted, exempted and exonerated as aforesaid." Now, if there was nothing more in the act than this, there would be an end of the power of leasing given by the previous act of 1720; but there is, however, the 7th section, which enacts, that until the lands be sold they "should be held, possessed and enjoyed, and the rents, issues and profits thereof should be had, received and taken by, and be applied to and for the benefit of such person as would have been entitled thereto" if the act had not passed. The question is, whether these words are to be construed in their literal sense, so as to give to the Earl for the time being the right to receive and take the rents, issues and profits only, or whether they are to be so construed that in respect of the lands not sold the Earl was to derive all the powers which were conferred on him by the settlement statute of 1720, and amongst them the leasing power given by section 10. of that act. The ordinary acceptation of the words would be only to allow the Earl for the time being to receive the rents and profits from the demises already made. I agree with Sir Hugh Cairns there would have been nothing more satisfactory to the estate than for the tenant in tail to have had the power of granting leases, if he had been bound to have got the best rents, but that is not so; and I think we should be defeating the statute of 1803 by holding that the tenant in tail had such power to lease for lives, and take, perhaps, a considerable fine for the lease, and so, in fact, to sell the land during the time the tenancy should last. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the power of leasing was not revived by the 7th section, and that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. At one time, under the influence of the argument addressed to us by the learned counsel on the part of the defendants, I was disposed to think that section 7. of the act of 1803 included the power to make such leases as would come within the terms of section 10. of the act of 1720; but I am now satisfied that the question which that would raise is not the question on which our decision should turn. Take, for example, a lease which might be made in 1803, under the powers given by section 10. of the act of 1720, and in respect of which the usual and accustomed rent had been reserved. Now it is clear that at the time this lease was granted, the lessor might have taken a fine from the tenant, with a covenant by him to lay out a large sum of money on the land; for so long as the usual and accustomed rent was reserved, the landlord might have taken for the lease any such fine as might be agreed on between him and the tenant. Such a transaction would, in effect, be a sale of the land in futuro; and whether such a lease comes within the meaning of section 7. of the act of 1803 depends on the question whether that section deals only with the profits as they from time to time arise, or whether it deals with the future profits. I am of opinion that it deals with the former only; and, further, I am of opinion that that 7th section, being a declaratory enactment, cannot authorize anything contrary to that which the trustees are directed to do by the 1st section; and that leads me to the conclusion that present profits only are dealt with by the 7th section. According to that section, the rents and profits are to be received by the tenant in tail for the time being, as if this act had not been passed; and I think that those words "rents and profits" are not to have the effect of enabling such tenant to enjoy, not only the rents and profits for the time being, but those in futuro. It appears to me that the 7th section excludes everything more than the temporary enjoyment of the rents and profits for the time being; and I think that the exception in the 1st section in favour of leases then granted shews that the framers of the act had in their mind this power of leasing under section 10. of the previous act, and that they did not intend that it should be exercised. For these reasons, I do not think that such power has been preserved, and I revert to the conclusion that the lease in question is void.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The key to the right interpretation of the statute of 1803 is, I think, to be found in its preamble. It appears from that, that several of the estates, including the subject-matter of this action, were dispersed in different counties, and that it was desirable they should be sold for the most money, and that the money arising from such sale should be invested in the purchase of other estates, to be settled to the same uses as the settled estates. The first and paramount object of the act was, therefore, to sell the lands for the best prices; and that would be defeated if, just before such sale, they could be demised at what might be termed nominal rents. The act, therefore, declares that all the powers of leasing given by the act of 1720 should be destroyed; but that in the mean time, until the lands were sold, the parties entitled to the rents and profits were to receive them as if the act had not been made; but if, as has been pointed out by the Chief Justice and my Brother Willes, their power of making leases was preserved, they would take not only the rents and profits, but the purchase-money for the time the leases had to run. Are we to imply the existence of such a power? The act carefully excepts leases which had been already granted, and if this power was intended to remain, why was it not expressed? Moreover, the act states that the trustees "should with all convenient speed" sell the lands, so that it contemplated a sale within a reasonable time after the act was passed. I hope that our judgment will do no injustice, and that the lessee will have ample redress from the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

SMITH, J.—I also agree that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. I think the act of 1803 vested the lands in the trustees in fee simple, freed and discharged from all the powers and estates created and declared by the previous act, with one exception only, namely, the then existing leases; and I think, also, that in the clause where such exception was expressly made, was the apt place to have inserted an exception in respect of this power of leasing, if it had been intended that such power should be preserved. The question, however, is whether such power has been preserved by section 7. One certainly would expect to find some strong words to shew that the direct effect of section 1. was not intended in this respect to take place; but I cannot collect any such intention from the words which are used in that 7th section. That section, and every word in it, may, on the contrary, be satisfied without disturbing the legal estate in fee as vested in the trustees by the 1st section. I am therefore of opinion, that when the lease in question was granted, the power of making such a lease did not exist.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

June 8. { AND OTHERS v. BEAZLEY AND OTHERS.

Statute, Construction of—Private Estate Act—Power of Leasing—Settlement.

By a private act of parliament certain lands were, in 1720, settled on those who should be Earls of Shrewsbury. In 1803 a portion of these estates, by another act, were vested in trustees for sale, freed from the uses, &c. of the prior act, with a provision that till sale they should be held for the benefit of those who but for the act would be entitled. In 1843, by a third act, which provided for the sale of another portion of the above estates, it was also provided that those to whom the estates limited by the first act were successively limited when by virtue of the limitations they came into possession or were entitled to the profits of the lands which should for the time being stand limited and settled to such of the uses of the said first act as should then be subsisting or capable of effect, might lease them in a particular way:—Held, on the construction of the acts, that this power of leasing extended to lands vested in trustees under the second act and still unsold.

This was an action of ejectment, brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, to recover possession of certain messuages, lands and hereditaments in the township of Oxton, in the parish of Woodchurch and county of Chester, to the possession whereof the plaintiffs or one of them claimed to be entitled, and to eject all other persons therefrom.

The cause came on to be tried, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Williams, at the Spring Assizes holden at Chester, 1864, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

Charles Earl and Duke of Shrewsbury, being seised in his demeane as of fee of the whole of the township of Oxton, in the county of Chester, by indentures of lease and release dated the 30th and 31st of October 1700, settled the township with other lands, after his own death and failure of his issue, and after other uses not necessary to be here mentioned and since determined, to the use of George Talbot for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the said George Talbot successively in tail male, remainder to John Talbot for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, remainder to Sir John Talbot for life, remainder to the first and other sons successively in tail male, reversion to the said Charles Earl and Duke of Shrewsbury in fee; and the said settlement contained powers of jointuring and leasing.

On the 1st of February 1717 the said Duke died, having by his will, dated the 19th of July 1712, devised other estates to the uses of the said settlement, and leaving his cousin Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury his heir-at-law.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 3rd and 4th of March 1718 (being the settlement on the marriage of the said George Talbot and Mary Fitzwilliam), the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury and certain other persons, according to their respective interests, conveyed, inter alia, the said township, after the determination of certain estates therein (which have long since determined) to the use of the said George Talbot for life, remainder (subject to a jointure rentcharge) to the use of the first and other the sons of the said George Talbot on the body of the said Mary Fitzwilliam, in tail male successively, remainder to his first and other sons by any after-taken wife successively in tail male, remainder to the said John Talbot for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male; and the now stating settlement contained powers of jointuring and leasing.

By "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720" (6 Geo. 1. c. 29), the said marriage settlement and all the uses therein limited were ratified and confirmed. By section 2. of the said act it was enacted that, after the decease of the said George Talbot, and failure of issue male of his body (and other events which have happened), certain lands of the said Duke, including the said township, should be and remain to the use of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, remainder to the use of all and every person or persons being issue male of the body of John the first Earl of Shrewsbury, to whom the title, honour and dignity of Earl of Shrewsbury should, after the decease of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, George Talbot and John Talbot without issue male of their respective bodies, by virtue of the letters patent of creation of the said earldom, descend and come, severally and successively one after another, as they and every of them should succeed to and inherit the said earldom, and of the several and respective heirs male of the body and bodies of all and every such person and persons issuing to attend and wait upon the said earldom, and to be annexed to and descend with the same; and the said act contained powers to charge portions and other sums, and a restriction on alienation of the said estates. By section 10. of the said act it was enacted, that it should be lawful for the first and all and every son and sons of the body of the said George Talbot, and the several and respective heirs male of the body or bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing, and to and for the first and every other son and sons of the body of the said John Talbot, of Longford, and the several and respective heirs male of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing, and also to and for all and every other person and persons to whom the said hereditaments and premises were limited by the said act successively as aforesaid, by any deed or writing, by them respectively to be signed in the presence of two witnesses, to demise or lease all or any parts of the said hereditaments and premises, whereof the person making such lease should be actually possessed, to any person or persons in possession, and not in reversion, for the term of three lives or twenty-one years, or for any term or number of years determinable upon the death or determination of three lives, so as upon all and every such lease and leases there should be reserved and made payable yearly during the continuance thereof the usual and accustomed yearly rents, boons and services, with power of re-entry for non-payment thereof, and with the usual provision as to counterparts of the said leases.

At the time of the passing of the next-stated act, the said George Talbot was dead, and the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury was also dead, and the title of Earl of Shrewsbury and the aforesaid hereditaments and premises had descended to Charles fifteenth Earl of Shrewsbury, who was grandson and heir male of the body of the said George Talbot by the said Mary his wife.

By an act passed in 1803 (43 Geo. 3. c. 40), intituled 'An act for vesting part of the settled estates of the Right Hon. Charles Earl of Shrewsbury in trustees to be sold, and for laying out the monies to arise by such sale in the purchase of other lands, to be settled in lieu thereof to the same uses and subject to the same restrictions,' after recitals shewing the purposes of the act, it was enacted, that certain hereditaments limited and settled by the said indentures of the 3rd and 4th of March 1718, and "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," and mentioned in the schedule to the now-stating act (which schedule included the whole of the said township of Oxton), should, from and after the passing of the said reciting act, be and the same were thereby vested in and settled upon Thomas Wright, Esq. and Charles Conolly, Esq., their heirs and assigns for ever, freed, released and discharged, and absolutely acquitted, exempted and exonerated of and from all and every the uses, trusts, estates, entails, remainders, charges, powers, pro-visoes, limitations and agreements in and by the said indentures of settlement of the 30th and 31st of October 1700, the will of the said Charles Duke of Shrewsbury, the said indentures of the 3rd and 4th of March 1718, and the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," respectively created, limited, provided and declared of and concerning the same hereditaments and premises, or any of them, except only such leases as had been theretofore made or granted of the same respectively in pursuance of the powers contained in the said settlement and act of parliament, upon trust that they, the said Thomas Wright and Charles Conolly, should, with all convenient speed, with the consent and approbation of the said Charles, the then Earl of Shrewsbury, to be testified by some writing under his hand, and after his decease then with the consent of the person or persons who should then be in possession of the said estates respectively, by virtue of the limitations before mentioned, sell and dispose of the said hereditaments and premises so by the said act of 1803 vested in them as aforesaid, either together or in parcels, by public sale or private contract, unto any person or persons who should be willing to become the purchaser or purchasers thereof, for the best price that could be reasonably gotten for the same; and, upon payment of the purchase-mones for which the said hereditaments and premises should be sold, should convey and assure the same respectively unto and to the use of the purchasers thereof, or as they should direct or appoint, freed and discharged, and acquitted, exempted and exonerated as aforesaid. The said act also provided for the re-investment of the proceeds of such sales in the purchase of other estates, and to be settled to the same uses and subject to the same powers as the lands which had been sold. By the 7th section of the said act of 1803 it was enacted, that in the mean time, and until the said hereditaments and premises by the said act directed to be sold should be sold in pursuance of the trusts aforesaid, the same premises respectively should be held, possessed and enjoyed, and the rents, issues and profits thereof should be had, received and taken by and be applied to and for the benefit of such person as would have been entitled thereto, and ought to have held, possessed or enjoyed and received the same respectively in case the said last-mentioned act had not been made. The 8th section of the said act conferred powers of appointing new trustees of the said act.

The said George Rice Lord Dynevor has been duly appointed and is now the sole surviving trustee of the said act, and the lands for the recovery of which this action is brought are now vested in the said George Rice Baron Dynevor, as such trustee as aforesaid, subject to the lease hereinafter mentioned, in case the same is valid and subsisting. The lands for the recovery of which this action is brought have not nor has any part thereof ever been sold under the provisions of the said act. In the year 1827 the said Charles Earl of Shrewsbury died without issue male, and upon his death the title and the said last-mentioned lands descended to John Earl of Shrewsbury, the lessor named in the lease hereinafter mentioned.

By an act, "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1843" (6 & 7 Vict. c. 28), after reciting, amongst other things, (as the fact was) that the said John, the then Earl of Shrewsbury, had no issue male, and that he was the heir male of the body of the said George Talbot and tenant in tail male in possession of the said settled hereditaments and premises, and that it would be for the benefit of the said John Earl of Shrewsbury and those who might succeed to the settled estates, if certain hereditaments were vested in trustees, in trust to sell the same, with a provision for investing the monies to arise thereby in the purchase of other hereditaments, to be settled to the uses and under the restrictions which should be subsisting or capable of taking effect in the settled estates not vested by the act of 1803 in trustees to be sold, and that it would be for the benefit of the said John Earl of Shrewsbury and those succeeding to the settled estates, if the said John Earl of Shrewsbury and the successive takers of the said settled estates were enabled to lease, and to enter into contracts for leasing, any part or parts of the said settled estates for such terms of years and under such provisions as would induce persons to build upon or improve the same, or to repair the messuages or tenements or other buildings standing thereon, or to build others in lieu thereof, it was enacted, that all and singular the manors or lordships, messuages or farms, lands, tenements and other hereditaments particularly mentioned and described in the second schedule to the said act of 1843 (which schedule does not include any of the lands in the township of Oxtan), should from and after the passing of the said act be vested in certain persons in the said act mentioned, their heirs and assigns for ever, freed and absolutely acquitted, exempted, exonerated and discharged from all and every the uses, trusts, estates, entails, remainders, charges, powers, provisoes, limitations and agreements, in and by the said indenture of the 31st of October 1700, the said will of the said Charles Duke of Shrewsbury, the said indenture of the 4th of March 1718, and "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," respectively created, limited, provided and declared of and concerning the same manors, messuages, farms, lands, tenements, hereditaments and premises, or any of them, upon trust with all convenient speed to sell and dispose of all and singular the said manors, &c., so by the said act vested as aforesaid, subject and without prejudice to any lease or leases which might have been made under the power of leasing in the said act thereafter contained. By section 11. of the said act, the aforesaid power of leasing contained in the said act of 6 Geo. 1. c. 29. was repealed, and by section 12. new powers of leasing were created. By the 33rd section of the said act it was enacted, that it should be lawful for the said John Earl of Shrewsbury, during his life, and after his decease for all and every other person and persons to whom the said hereditaments and premises limited by the said indenture of the 4th of March 1718, and the said "Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1720," are by the said settlement and act respectively limited successively as aforesaid, as and when they should respectively, by virtue of the limitations aforesaid, be in the actual possession or entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of the lands which should for the time being stand limited and settled to such of the uses limited by the said settlement of 1718 and the said act of 1720 respectively as aforesaid, as should be then subsisting or capable of taking effect, by indenture, to be sealed and delivered by him in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, to demise or lease all or any parts of the same lands, for any term or number of years not exceeding ninety-nine years in possession, to any person whomsoever, upon building leases, so as in such lease should be reserved the best yearly rent that could be reasonably had or gotten for the same, and that such leases should contain certain covenants in the said act particularly mentioned. Section 35. conferred powers to enter into contracts for leases. Section 36. contained a provision that such contracts should contain provisos for re-entry. Section 37. authorized the granting of new leases when possession had been recovered under the power of re-entry. Section 38. gave power to alter, vary and rescind contracts; and section 39. gave powers to confirm leases containing technical errors. By the 40th section of the said act, power is given to Earl John during his life, and after his decease for every person to whom the said hereditaments and premises limited by the indenture of the 4th of March 1718, and the act of 1720, were by the said settlement and act respectively limited, as and when they should respectively, by virtue of the limitations aforesaid, be in the actual possession or entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of the lands, which for the time being should stand limited and settled to such of the uses limited by the said indenture of the 4th of March 1718 and the said act of 1720 respectively, as should then be subsisting or capable of effect, to demise or lease all the mines in, under or upon any part of the same lands situate in the township of Little Neston, Oxton, and other places in the county of Chester, Salop and Stafford, in the manner in the said section mentioned.

By indenture of lease, made on the 2nd day of February 1851, which for the purposes of this case is admitted to have been executed and perfected in conformity with the power contained in the act of 1843, save in so far as herein appears to the contrary, between the Right Hon. John Earl of Shrewsbury of the one part, and James Beazley of the other part, it was witnessed, that under and by virtue of the power and authority in that behalf given and reserved to the said Earl by "The Shrewsbury Estate Act, 1843," and of every or any other power or authority enabling the said Earl in that behalf, the said Earl did demise to the said James Beazley a certain plot of land in the said township of Oxton for ninety-nine years from the 2nd of February 1851. The land comprised in this lease is sought to be recovered in this action. On the 9th of November in the year of our Lord 1852, the said John Earl of Shrewsbury died without leaving any male issue, and thereupon Bertram Arthur, seventeenth and last Earl of Shrewsbury, succeeded to the title and estates annexed to it. He died a bachelor on the 10th of August 1856, and thereupon the issue male of George Talbot, on whom the estates were, by the settlement of the Duke of Shrewsbury, and by the said act of 1720, settled in tail male, became extinct; and thereupon (upon failure and in default of issue male of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, of the said George Talbot and of the said John Talbot, in the said act mentioned) the plaintiff, the present Earl of Shrewsbury, became and now is the person, being issue male of the said John, first Earl of Shrewsbury, to whom the said title, honour and dignity of Earl of Shrewsbury has, after the decease as aforesaid of the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, George Talbot and John Talbot, without issue male of their respective bodies, by virtue of the said letters patent of creation of the said earldom, descended and come. Prints of the acts of parliament referred to, and a copy of the lease hereinbefore mentioned, accompany and are to be considered part of this case. [These acts contained recitals and sections of great length, but in so far as they are material, are sufficiently set forth in the arguments of the counsel and in the judgments of the learned Judges.]

The question for the consideration of the Court in this action is,

Whether John Earl of Shrewsbury had power to demise, by the said indenture of lease of the 2nd of February 1851, the lands therein mentioned, so as to bind the plaintiffs?

If the Court shall be of opinion in the negative of the above question, the plaintiffs, or such one of them as the Court shall direct, shall be entitled to judgment to recover the lands described in the writ in this action, with costs.

If the Court shall be of opinion in the affirmative of the above question, the defendants in the said action shall be entitled to judgment in the said action, with costs.

Manisty (Hannen and Howe, of the Chancery Bar, with him), for the plaintiffs.—The question in the present case is, whether the leasing power which is given to John Earl of Shrewsbury by section 33. of the act of 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 28.) extended to lands in Oxton. It is submitted that it did not. The whole of the lands in Oxton had been taken out of settlement by the act of 1803 (43 Geo. 3. c. 40), and the object of the act of 1843 was to take some other of the settled estates out of settlement, and to vest them in trustees for sale, but it was not intended to undo what had been done by the act of 1803. A power of leasing for ninety-nine years for building purposes is certainly granted by section 33. of the act of 1843, and the defendants will rely on that power as authorizing the lease in question; but that power, it is submitted, has reference to very different lands from those in Oxton, which are the lands comprised in the present lease. The power is confined to the settled estates, and does not extend to those which had been previously taken out of settlement by the act of 1803, as was the case with the lands in Oxton. There are various clauses in the act of 1843 which confirm this view of it; thus, in the preamble to the 1st section, it is recited, that "it would be for the benefit of the said John Earl of Shrewsbury, and those who may succeed to the said settled estates," if the lands there mentioned were vested in trustees for sale. And in that same section the lands are vested in the trustees upon trust to sell, with the consent of the said Earl John, and "after his decease then with the consent of the person who for the time being shall be in the possession of the settled estates by virtue of the limitations before mentioned." Then the 33rd section, on which the defendants rely, gives the power of leasing to the said Earl John during his life, and after his decease to the persons entitled under the limitations of the settlement, "as and when they shall respectively, by virtue of the limitations aforesaid, be in the actual possession or entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of the lands which for the time being shall stand limited and settled by virtue of or under," inter alia, the said Settlement Act of 1720, "as shall then be subsisting or capable of effect." How can that include the lands in Oxton which were then out of settlement? When the Earl made this lease of land in Oxton, it is clear that he was not in possession of such land under the limitations of the settlement, nor did such land stand limited and settled under the act of 1720.

Sir Hugh Cairns (Mellish and E. E. Kay, of the Chancery Bar, with him), for the defendants.—The act of 1843 had two purposes, one to vest the lands in trustees for sale, and the other to give aid to the leasing power given by the act of 1720, and to create new leasing powers. The contention of the other side is, that the moment lands are vested in trustees for sale they cease to be in settlement; but no sale having taken place, no distinction ought to be made, nor was intended to be made, between such lands and any other part of the settled estates. It is submitted that the expression "settled estates," in the 1st section of the act of 1843, includes the whole of the estates which had been settled, whether any part of them had or not been previously vested in trustees for sale by the act of 1803. The preamble to section 1. of the act of 1843 recites that "it would be for the benefit of the said John Earl of Shrewsbury and those succeeding to the settled estates if sufficient powers and authorities were given to the said John Earl of Shrewsbury and the successive takers of the settled estates to grant leases of any mines, layers, veins, seams, beds and strata of ironstone, coals, lead, copper and other minerals and substances within or under any of the said settled estates for such term," &c. Then section 40, which carries this out by giving the power to grant such mining leases, expressly mentions Oxton as one of the townships in which the lands having such mines are situate; so that it shews that Oxton is treated by that act as part of the settled estates. Section 2, moreover, which directs the monies arising from the sales by the trustees to be paid into the Court of Chancery, describes the account to which it is to be there placed as "ex parte the purchasers of the settled estates of the Right Honourable John Earl of Shrewsbury"; and yet the plaintiffs contend that those estates are taken out of settlement the moment they are vested in trustees for sale. Then section 13. gives a power to the Earl for the time being to accept surrenders of leases granted under the power of leasing in the act of 1720, and to grant new leases for sixty years. The power to accept such surrender is not limited to any particular lease, but is a power "to accept a surrender or surrenders of any lease or leases which have been granted," &c., under that first act. With regard to section 33, under the authority of which the lease in question was made, it is submitted that Earl John when he made such lease was in possession by virtue of the limitations contained in the said settlement and act of 1720; for if not, how otherwise was he in possession of the lands in Oxton? And, further, it is submitted that those lands were then part of the settled estates; for, as there had been no sale, there was no purchase-money or anything else then to represent such part of the settled estates.

Manisty, in reply.—The Oxton estate is in trustees on a trust under the act of 1803, which (except as to power to accept surrenders) is intact. In 1843 Oxton, though in a certain sense, perhaps, part of the settled estates, was not settled to uses of the old settlement capable of taking effect, and was not part of the then settled estate. John Earl of Shrewsbury was not a person entitled by virtue of the specified limitations, but the person who would have been if they had existed; and the argument on the other side comes to this, that the power is to extend not merely to lands limited, but to those which but for the statutes would have been. The power of leasing referred to in the 1st section of the act of 1843 is ratified by section 13, the terms of which differ from those of section 33.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment. The lease is a lease, under section 33. of the act of 1843, of lands in Oxton; and the defendants are entitled to our judgment if the lease be valid. The history of the property is, that large estates were settled, by act of parliament, in 1720, on the persons who should be Earls of Shrewsbury, and this land at Oxton is comprised in that settlement. In 1803 a portion of these estates were, by act of parliament, exonerated from the uses of the act of 1720, and vested in trustees for sale, section 7. of that act enacting, "that in the mean time and until the said manors, &c., hereby directed to be sold shall be sold in pursuance of the trusts aforesaid, the same premises, respectively, shall be held, possessed and enjoyed, and the rents, issues and profits thereof shall be had, received and taken by, and be applied to and for the benefit of such person and persons as would have been entitled thereto and ought to have held, possessed or enjoyed and received the same respectively, in case this act had not been passed." And it is very material to consider whether the Earl of Shrewsbury for the time being takes possession of the lands in Oxton. He has possession of Oxton by virtue of the act of 1720; he takes under the act of 1803; but that act refers to the act of 1720, and the rights of all persons have to be ascertained by that act. In 1843, it became expedient to part with some outlying property, and re-invest the proceeds in other lands, in order to make the estate more compact, and an act was then passed for the purpose of the sale of the farms set out in the schedule to such act. This was one object of the act of 1843; but it is clear that the proprietors of the estates obtained several other powers, applicable to the whole of the Shrewsbury estates, in particular the leasing power given by section 33, which extends to land unaffected by the act of 1803, and also in some degree to the lands in the schedule of the act of 1843 itself.—(His Lordship then read so much of section 33. as is set out in the case.)—In my opinion the Earl of Shrewsbury was the person in actual possession by virtue of the act of 1720, and the lands are lands limited to such of the uses limited by that act, "as shall then be subsisting or capable of taking effect." Subject to the power of sale, he was in possession under the act of 1720, and he therefore had power to demise. With respect to our decision in the previous case, the power of leasing here is binding on the remainderman, and is clogged in every way, and quite distinct from that given by the act of 1720. The whole context is confirmatory of this view. Exceptions are made in different places as to different parts of the estates, and where no exception is made the statute ought to be construed to extend to all the estates. In the recital we find, "And whereas it would be for the benefit of the said John Earl of Shrewsbury and those who may succeed to the said settled estates if the said last-mentioned manors, &c. were vested in trustees in trust to sell the same, with a provision for investing in the purchase of other manors, &c., . . . to be settled to the uses and under the restrictions which shall be subsisting or capable of taking effect in the settled estates not vested by the act of 43 Geo. 3. . . . or by this act, in trustees to be sold." Here by "settled estates" is contemplated the whole estate, with an exception for which the reason is apparent. Again, section 7, as to the jointuring power, extends to the whole Shrewsbury estate, with a specific exception of the lands contained in the schedule to the act of 1803, and the second schedule of the act of 1843. And the same observation applies to section 14, which gives a power to grant annuities. In these sections there is an express exception of these lands. Now let us consider the general clauses. Section 12, which gives a power to grant leases for twenty-one years—(His Lordship read the section),—is subject to an exception as to Alton Towers and the lands usually enjoyed therewith, shewing the care taken to use the term "settled estates" in a wide sense. Section 13. does not bear on the question. Then section 33. evidently gave a power of leasing the lands to be sold under the act of 1843, for the sale is to be without prejudice to the leases granted under the act, and these lands stand in a like position with those to be sold under the act of 1803. This view is also confirmed by section 40, which relates to mining leases, and which, in setting out nominatim various lands to which it shall apply, mentions Oxton. It is said this must have been done by mistake; but the statute, on the contrary, has been drawn with great care. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the lease is valid, and that the defendants are entitled to our judgment.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Our conclusion is in accordance with what might have been expected would be the provisions of the statute. Up to the year 1843, the Shrewsbury estates were enjoyed under the provisions of a statute passed in the reign of George the First, a statute which was passed under peculiar circumstances. By this statute the estates were settled on a Roman Catholic family, with a provision that on any person who inherited the property becoming a Protestant he might alien it, and a power of leasing for three lives or twenty-one years, or any term determinable on three lives, on the reservation only of the usual and accustomed rents. Therefore, in the previous case the Court was obliged to hold that the lease was void, for to hold that the leasing power given by section 10. of that statute applied to lands within the act of 1803 would have been to hold that the tenant for life under the powers of the old act might anticipate the sale of the lands which were to be sold by the trustees under the act of 1803. So matters stood till 1843; the whole property improved in value, and in that year a statute was passed which worked a remarkable effect on the family property, and which appears to have been intended to deal with the whole property except where expressly limited not to affect particular portions. One naturally looks to see whether the powers given by this act affect the powers for the sale of land or help them. The powers in the act of 1843 do not allow the person in possession of the estate to anticipate any of the income, but allow leases for the benefit of those enjoying from time to time. To a purchaser it would not matter whether this power of leasing affected the land or not; but to those enjoying the estates it makes all the difference, and the argument from convenience is in favour of the construction that the powers apply to the whole estate. And I think the language clear; I think that the language in section 33. and the other portions of the act shews they were so meant to apply. Section 33. applies to all the lands comprehended in the statute of Geo. 1. and not expressly excepted. (His Lordship referred to the section.)—I am clearly of opinion that the lessor enjoyed this land by virtue of that act; without that act he would not have enjoyed it at all. By section 5. of the act of 1843, and section 7. of the act of 1803, till the sales, the property is to be enjoyed by such persons as would have been entitled if the acts were not passed, and how otherwise the lessor could take has not been suggested. Then the words in sections 7. and 14, as to jointuring and providing for younger children, are exactly similar to those in section 33; but the sections not being intended to affect the lands to be sold under the acts of 1803 and 1843, there are express words of exception. So that not only is the language sufficient, but we have two expositions of what the meaning and effect of these words would be but for the exception. And also in one power (the power of granting mining leases) these very lands are mentioned by name. So much for the body of the act. But I apprehend that we have another key to the meaning of the words in question, a key given by the recitals contained in the 1st section: "Whereas, the said John Earl of Shrewsbury . . . is tenant in tail male in possession of the said settled manors, &c. . . . and whereas several manors, &c. . . . set forth in the second schedule . . . (being part of the said settled estates)" referring to the whole property; "and whereas it would be for the benefit of the said John . . . and those who may succeed to the said settled estates, if the said last-mentioned manors &c. were vested in trustees to sell, with a proviso for investing . . . in . . . other manors, &c. . . . to be settled to the uses and under the restrictions which may be subsisting or capable of taking effect," the very words of section 33, "in the settled estates not vested by 43 Geo. 3. c. 40. . . . in trustees to be sold; . . . and whereas it would be for the benefit of the said John . . . and those succeeding to the settled estates, if the power contained in 6 Geo. 1. c. 29. of granting leases . . . were repealed, and . . . takers of the settled estates were enabled to grant leases," for a certain term, "and also upon surrender of any subsisting leases," with an exception, "to grant leases, &c." All these considerations make it a matter of demonstration to my mind that the powers given by section 33. have been properly exercised.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case says that the lease is in conformity with the power contained in the act of 1843, save in so far as therein appears to the contrary, and I am of opinion the lease is within the power. The objection taken is that by 43 Geo. 3. c. 40. these lands were vested in trustees for the purpose of sale exempted from the uses of 6 Geo. 1. c. 29, and that therefore section 33. of the act of 1843 did not apply to them. It is quite plain that all that was necessary to effect the object of the statutes of 1803 and 1843, as to the sale of lands, was that the trustees should be able to make out a clear title to purchasers. But then what was to be done with the land in the mean time, and before they were sold? Why, by section 7. of the former and section 5. of the latter act, till sale, the land is to be enjoyed by such person as would have been entitled thereto, and have held and enjoyed them, but for the respective acts. At the time this lease was granted John Earl of Shrewsbury was the person so entitled, holding and enjoying these lands. How was he entitled, and how did he hold and enjoy, except under the statute of 6 Geo. 1. c. 29, the statute of 1720? Then comes section 33. of the statute of 1843, which says that the person entitled under such statute shall have the power of granting such a lease as this.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion, as I think that section 33. of the act of 1843, construed by the title disclosed in the act, and the different provisions contained in it, includes the lands vested in trustees for sale. Section 1. shews an intention that the lands to be sold under this act should be subject to some leasing power; therefore over those there was to be some leasing power. It is said this intention is satisfied by sections 1, 2. and 3. giving power to grant new leases; but why the words are to be so limited I do not see. Again, it is said that there is a difference in the language. I do not think so. The words in section 12, giving a power to grant leases for twenty-one years, are the same as in section 33, and section 13. merely avoids a repetition of them, and refers to the preceding section. There are four powers of leasing—first, a power to lease for twenty-one years; secondly, a power to accept surrenders and grant new leases; thirdly, the power given by section 33; and, fourthly, a power to grant mining leases. Why should the power given by section 33. especially not be applicable? The intention was, that inasmuch as there might be a long interval before the sale, and the inconvenience no doubt had been felt as to the want of leasing powers, there should be a power of leasing, care, however, being taken that the inheritance should not be deteriorated. I, therefore, am clearly of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants.

June 3. } MURCHIE v. BLACK.

Easement—Right of Support from adjoining Land—Severance of Estate—Vendor and Purchaser—Contract.

G, the owner of certain land, sold it in lots, subject to conditions, by which, inter alia, the purchaser of lot 6, was required to covenant to build according to a certain elevation. The plaintiff, who was the purchaser of the adjoining lot 7, altered, with G's consent, an old building standing on such lot, by raising its wall several feet on the side next to lot 6. The defendant, who was the purchaser of lot 6, excavated the land as required to build according to the said conditions, and in consequence of this the plaintiff's building fell:—Held, that as the excavations were authorised by the conditions of sale, and were made therefore with the licence of G, the vendor, the plaintiff could not sue for the injury he had sustained by his building being so deprived of the lateral support of the land in lot 6.

Semble, that the plaintiff, assuming he had the right to such support, lost it by raising the old wall and so increasing the superincumbent weight.

This was an action to recover compensation for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of the defendant having caused the plaintiff's house to fall down.

The cause came on to be tried, before Shee, J., at the Carlisle Spring Assizes, 1864, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, by consent, for the money claimed in the declaration, subject to terms embodied in an order of Nisi Prius, thereupon made, and subject to the following

CASE.

On the 10th of February, 1862, Francis Graham was seised in fee simple in possession, by virtue of a purchase and conveyance from Mr. Edwin Hough, of certain lands and premises situate on the south side of Devonshire Street, in the city of Carlisle, and described on the plan annexed to the case as lots 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. and 11.

On the 10th of February, 1862, the said F. Graham conveyed the said lands to E. Hough by way of mortgage in fee, to secure the repayment of 2,000*l.* advanced by the said E. Hough to the said F. Graham. Before F. Graham's said purchase, the lands so purchased by him had, with other pieces of land situate on the south side of the said street, and which were described in the said plan as lots 1, 2, 3, 4. and 5, been laid out by Mr. Hough in lots, as shewn in the said plan, for building purposes; of the lands so laid out, lots 1, 2, 3, 4. and 5. had, before F. Graham's said purchase, been sold by Mr. Hough, who, at the time of such sale, was seised thereof in fee simple in possession. Lots 2, 3. and 4, and part of lot 5, had been built upon before the 27th of March 1863.

After the said purchase by the said F. Graham, and before the 27th of March, 1863, F. Graham had sold lots 9. and 11, and the same had been conveyed to the purchaser thereof.

On the 27th of March, 1863, the lands described on the plan as lots 6, 7, 8. and 10. were put up for sale by auction in separate lots, but no sale of any lot then took place.

On the 30th of April, 1863, a verbal agreement was made between the said F. Graham and the defendant, with the consent of the said E. Hough, for the purchase by the defendant by private contract of lot 6, and on the 12th of May, 1863 an agreement in writing, embodying the terms of the said verbal agreement, and which agreement in writing had been prepared on, and dated, the 30th of April, 1863, was signed by the said F. Graham and the defendant. This agreement (a copy of which was annexed to the case) was written at the foot of the conditions of sale, on which the lands had been put up for sale by auction, and subject to such conditions, so far as they were applicable to a sale by private contract, it was stated in the said agreement that the defendant should be a purchaser. (A copy of the said conditions of sale so referred to in the agreement was also annexed to the case.)

By these conditions it was stated, as to lot 6, that "the purchaser will be required to covenant to build according to the elevation of lot 2, or such other elevation as the vendor shall approve," and that "the wall between lot 5. and this lot, and this lot and lot 7, and between lots 7. and 8, and between lots 8. and 9, and between lots 9. and 10, and between lots 10. and 11, shall, when built, be deemed party-walls, and if erected by the purchaser of one of such lots, the owner of the adjoining lot shall be bound to pay him one-half of the cost of erecting such wall, whenever the owner of the adjoining lot shall make use of the same." By the expression "elevation of lot 2," occurring in the said conditions, is meant the elevation of the building then standing on the lot described as lot 2.

On the 26th of May, 1863, an agreement was made between the said F. Graham and the plaintiff, with the consent of the said E. Hough, for the purchase by the plaintiff of lot 7, and an agreement, dated the 26th of May 1863 (a copy of which was annexed to the case, and which was similar in form to that between Graham and the defendant), was thereupon signed by the plaintiff and the said F. Graham. The plan and lots referred to in the conditions mentioned in the said agreement with the plaintiff are the same as those referred to in the said conditions of sale mentioned in the said agreement dated the 30th of April 1863, and signed on the 12th of May 1863, of which said agreement, and of the conditions referred to therein, the plaintiff had no positive knowledge at the time of his entering into the said agreement of the 26th of May 1863, but he then had reason to suppose, and did suppose, that the defendant had entered into an agreement corresponding in its terms and conditions to the agreement then entered into by the plaintiff.

On the 29th of May, 1863, the plaintiff was put into possession by F. Graham of lot 7, with Mr. Hough's consent, and continued in possession thereof till the house afterwards erected upon it fell.

Lots 6. and 7. so respectively purchased by the plaintiff and the defendant were plots of land on which respectively buildings stood at the time of such purchases respectively. The western wall of the old building standing on lot 7. was an ancient wall, having been built above twenty years. It stood on lot 7. at the time of its purchase, and remained continuously there till the fall of the plaintiff's building as hereinafter mentioned. And when the plaintiff was put into possession it stood fifteen feet above the surface of lot 7. The intended party-wall between lot 6. and lot 7, referred to in the conditions mentioned in the respective agreements of the 30th of April, 1863 and the 26th of May, 1863, would have cleared every part of the above-mentioned old wall at the front or north end for about two-thirds of the length; for the remaining third it would have taken away about two and a half inches of the old wall below the surface of the ground, but would not have interfered with it above the surface, as the intended party-wall was to be a fourteen-inch wall below the surface, and a nine-inch wall above the surface. The said old wall is a fourteen-inch wall throughout, inclusive of the foundation.

The plaintiff, on being put into possession as before mentioned, made preparation for altering and raising the old building so then standing upon lot 7, a verbal understanding having been come to between himself and F. Graham at the time of his agreeing to purchase that lot, that the building to be erected thereon should not be immediately constructed in accordance with the elevation of lot 2, but that he should be at liberty to put up a temporary building thereon in the first instance. In accordance with this understanding, the plaintiff proposed to effect the alterations of the old building on lot 7. by leaving the western wall of it standing, and raising its height. The plaintiff, with the consent of F. Graham, but without the knowledge of Mr. Hough, raised the western wall of the old building to the height of twenty-four feet from the surface, being nine feet additional to its former height. The wall so raised formed the side of the plaintiff's house next to lot 6. The alterations so made by the plaintiff were completed on the 7th of July, 1863. The raising of this wall and the building of the plaintiff's house made a considerable addition to the weight of the wall as it was before it was raised. About one-third more support was needed for the raised wall and the new house than had been required for the support of the old wall, as it stood when the plaintiff was put into possession. When the lateral support of the earth is removed, more labour and material is required, or greater risk is incurred in supporting a heavier building than is required or incurred in supporting a lighter building. Such increase of labour and material or risk was small in the case of the plaintiff's raised wall as compared with the wall before it was so raised, but such increase existed, and a builder contracting for the support of the respective buildings would take it into consideration, but would estimate it at less than 20s. The house built by the plaintiff was a lighter house than a house would have been which should have been erected according to the elevation of lot 2. On the 3rd of August, 1863, the defendant took possession of lot 6, and made preparations to pull down the old buildings standing upon it, and to build thereon a new house according to his agreement dated the 30th of April, 1863, and the conditions therein referred to; and for that purpose he proceeded to make the excavations in lot 6. for the said new house to be erected thereon. In consequence of the excavations so made, and before they were completed, the plaintiff's building on lot 7. gave way, and on the 1st of September, 1863, fell. The excavations so made were, in accordance with the defendant's said agreement of the 30th of April, 1863, and the conditions therein referred to; and were such excavations as were required for a building similar to that on lot 2; the elevation of which is referred to in the said conditions. The said excavations were of considerable depth below the surface of lot 6, which was on the same level as the surface of lot 7. They were entirely within lot 6, and at the time when the house fell had not approached within some feet of the plaintiff's wall. The earth then left unexcavated on lot 6, adjoining lot 7, was more than sufficient to support the earth on lot 7. in its natural state, without any superincumbent weight, but it was not sufficient to support the earth of lot 7, with the superincumbent weight of the plaintiff's building thereon, as that building was after the wall had been raised, and it was not such as, in the opinion of competent builders or architects, could have been relied upon to support the earth of lot 7, with the superincumbent weight of the old building before it was raised. The probabilities are, that the excavations which caused the fall of the plaintiff's house, would have caused the fall of the old wall in its unaltered state. The proper means for supporting such a building as the plaintiff's, either in its original or altered state, when the lateral support of the earth adjoining is removed, are, by underpinning or under-propping, which consists in taking away earth upon which the building stands, and inserting brick pillars or wooden posts in its place. This was not done with respect to the plaintiff's house. The only means taken for its support were the placing stays or props against the side of it, which was done on three several occasions, about the 20th, 25th and 31st of August, when shrinks or cracks shewed themselves in the house, but which means were quite insufficient.

After the building had begun to crack and until within a day or two of its fall, it might have been saved had the proper means been resorted to; but neither the plaintiff nor the defendant would incur the expense of resorting to them; neither party placed any impediment in the way of the other supporting the building by any means the other might think proper, and each expressed his readiness to assist the other, disclaiming at the same time his own obligation to support the house, and insisting that such obligation rested on the other. Thus the stays were put up by the co-operation of both, as an act of mutual concession; but the means known by both to be effectual for supporting the house were omitted.

No conveyance of lot 6. to the plaintiff, or of lot 7. to the defendant, was executed till after the plaintiff's house fell in the manner stated.

The Court was to be at liberty to draw all inferences of fact which a jury would be justified in drawing.

The question for the decision of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

E. James (T. Jones with him), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to recover. Whenever any one owner of an entire property separates it, and conveys one portion of it to one person and another portion to another person, each portion is impressed with the same rights and burdens they had when both were held by one and the same owner. Therefore, when lot 6. was sold to the defendant, the house which was standing on lot 7. had a right to the support of the land of lot 6. The rule is stated to the above effect in Gale on Easements, 3rd edit. p. 83, et seq., and at p. 98 the case of Richards v. Rose (1) is cited as an authority to shew that upon the severance of ownership of two or more houses, obviously and necessarily requiring mutual support, there is, by an implied grant or reservation, as the case may be, the right to support, and that such right equally subsists, whether the owner parts first with one and then with the other, or with two together, the last being afterwards divided. It is submitted that Graham, when he sold these lots, impliedly reserved to himself the right of support to the buildings then on the land, and that the exercise of such right has not been precluded by the additional weight which the plaintiff placed on the old wall. At all events, as by the conditions of sale the purchaser was informed of the right to erect other buildings, and, consequently, the additional weight was in the contemplation of all parties, it is manifest that the plaintiff has a right of action against the defendant for depriving him of the retaining ground which was necessary to support the plaintiff's house; and the defendant cannot say that the plaintiff has lost his right to such support by reason of the additional weight which he placed on the old building. Taplin v. Jones (2), in which the House of Lords affirmed the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, supports this view. Lord Wensleydale, in Gayford v. Nicholls (3), recognizes the right of support of soil by reason of a presumed grant where both houses were originally in the possession of the same owner; and the same principle is borne out by the case of Pyer v. Carter (4). The cases of Brown v. Robins (5), Stroyan v. Knowles (6), The Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot (7), Dugdale v. Robertson (8), and The North-Eastern Railway v. Elliott (9), are also authorities in favour of the plaintiff's right of support from the defendant's land.

Manisty (Kemplay with him), for the defendant. — The general principle contended for on behalf of the plaintiff is not disputed, but under the special circumstances of this case it is submitted that the plaintiff had no right to the support from the defendant's land, and is not entitled to maintain this action. The plaintiff cannot stand in a better position than Graham, his vendor, stood on the 30th of April 1863, when the contract was made with the defendant as to lot 6, by which that lot was sold by Graham to the defendant, on the condition that he should build thereon according to the elevation of lot 2, or such other elevation as the vendor should approve. So that, unless Graham or the plaintiff, who stood in Graham's place, approved of a different plan, the defendant was bound to erect a building according to such elevation, and it is found in the case that the excavations were in accordance with the defendant's agreement of the 30th of April, 1863, and were such as were required for a building similar to that on lot 2.

E. James, in reply. — The vendor never agreed to waive the rights which, according to the authorities, the law had given him.

ERLE, C.J. — I am of opinion that our judgment in this case should be for the defendant. The action is brought by the plaintiff against an adjoining owner for depriving the plaintiff's building of the support it had from the defendant's land. Each party had become possessed of their respective lots (the plaintiff of lot 7. and the defendant of lot 6), in the course of 1863, and previously to their becoming so possessed there had been a unity of possession in Graham. The plaintiff therefore stands exactly in the same position as if lot 7. had remained in possession of the vendor. Then if that had been so, lot 7. would have been entitled to the lateral support of the soil of lot 6, according to the authorities which have been cited by the plaintiff's counsel; but my judgment turns on the question whether there is not in the conditions under which the lot 6. was sold to the defendant, a stipulation which justifies what otherwise would have been actionable against the defendant. The vendor sold that lot to the defendant, who purchased it with a contract, under which it was obligatory on his part, or at least it was within the terms of it, that the defendant doing his duty to the vendor should do that which brought down the plaintiff's house. Therefore the licence of the vendor took away that which would otherwise have been a cause of action. That is how the case appears to me to stand on the title between these parties. There is, however, another point which it is not now necessary to go into, and that is, whether the plaintiff, though he should be entitled to the lateral support of lot 6, was entitled to such support in respect of the superincumbent weight of the plaintiff's building. It seems to me that if that point had been gone into, the plaintiff would not have had a right to such support; inasmuch as he had imposed a much greater weight than previously existed, and without which, probably, the old building would not have gone down. However, for the reasons already mentioned, I think the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming the plaintiff to have had the right to the support of the adjoining land, I think he lost it by what my Lord has adverted to. This is not like the case of ancient lights, but an additional weight placed upon an old wall, and thereby the entire building must be treated as one weight, just as if a carpenter were to make a table capable of sustaining one hundredweight, and a person were to put half a ton upon it, and the table were to break in consequence of the increased pressure, could any complaint be made against the carpenter. On the other ground stated by the Chief Justice, I am also of opinion, that the defendant is entitled to our judgment, as he did no more than he was bound to do by the contract with his vendor.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Had there been no special contract here, and no additional superincumbent weight on the plaintiff's land, the cases cited for the plaintiff might have applied, but I agree with the defendant's counsel, that the facts render the consideration of those cases unnecessary, for the plaintiff's claim is subject to the vendor's right and the vendor's obligations, and the vendor not only expressly licensed, but by the condition of sale obliged the defendant to build in a way which would require him to do what he did. There is no stipulation that he should underpin or underprop, or give notice to any one, and if notice were necessary, the case shews that the plaintiff well knew what was going on. I also think there is no proof of any actual injury caused by the defendant's works, because it is not shewn that it was not caused by the superincumbent weight of the building which the plaintiff put on his land, and therefore it might have been caused by the act of the plaintiff himself. On both grounds, I think the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

SMITH, J.—The right to the support of the adjoining land is an implied right, and does not therefore exist where, as here, there are express stipulations to the contrary. There was, I think, here, at least a licence by the vendor to the defendant to do what he did, and the vendor must be supposed to contemplate the consequences thereof. Then, was the defendant under these circumstances bound to have gone on the plaintiff's land to prop up the plaintiff's building? I think that he was not, and that he is not liable for the injury the plaintiff has sustained, for the defendant did only what he was authorized by the vendor to do, and it is not found that he did that in a negligent manner. It is unnecessary to give any opinion on the other point in the case.

WILLES, J.—I wish to add, that the present case is analogous to that of Roubotham v. Wilson (10), affirmed in error, and in the House of Lords (11).

Easement—Ancient Lights—Abandonment by Encroachment—New Windows—Right to obstruct—Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 3.

A. was the owner and occupier of a house of three stories which had an ancient window on each floor. He altered the windows in the two lower floors, leaving the window in the third floor unaltered. He also built two new stories to his house, with windows intended to be permanent. A. did not intend by making these alterations to abandon any privilege of his ancient windows. B, the owner of adjoining premises, could not obstruct the new windows in the upper floors without also obstructing the old windows, and he built on his own land a wall which had the effect of obstructing all A.'s windows. A. afterwards blocked up his new windows, and sued B. for continuing the obstruction of the wall, which the defendant refused to remove:—Held, that B. had not at any time the right to build a wall which would have the effect of obstructing the ancient lights in A.'s house, although the new windows could not otherwise have been obstructed.

The right to an ancient light since the Prescription Act depends upon the statute, and does not rest on any presumption of a grant or a fiction of a licence having been obtained from the adjoining proprietor.

Renshaw v. Bean (1) and Hutchinson v. Copestake (2) overruled.

This action was commenced in the Court of Common Pleas, on the 24th of February 1858, and was brought for an alleged obstruction of the access of light and air to certain windows in the west side of a warehouse, No. 107, Wood Street, Cheapside, in the City of London, the property of the respondent, the defendant in error and the plaintiff below.

The declaration consisted of two counts. The first count alleged a right on the part of the defendant in error to the access of light and air to certain ancient windows of a messuage and building in that count mentioned, and stated, by way of breach, that the plaintiff in error, by wrongfully building and continuing a wall near to such windows, prevented the light and air from coming to or entering the same. The second count alleged a right to the unobstructed access of light and air to the said windows, and averred as a breach that such access was obstructed by the wrongful continuance of a wall, on a close opposite and near to such windows.

The defendant pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, a traverse of the right alleged in the first count; and, thirdly, a traverse of the right alleged in the second count.

There was a replication joining issue on these pleas.

Upon these issues the cause came on to be tried, at the Sittings at the Guildhall of the city of London, on the 16th of February 1859, when a verdict was entered for the defendant in error, for the damages claimed in the declaration, subject to a special case. A special case was afterwards stated, which, so far as it is material, was to the following effect:

"The plaintiff is a wholesale dealer in silk, and now carries on his business at Nos. 107, 108 and 109, Wood Street. The plaintiff had for several years prior to 1857 carried on his business at Nos. 108 and 109, Wood Street, but he acquired possession of the premises No. 107, Wood Street, for the first time in the year 1857, having become the purchaser of them in the month of July in that year. Up to the time when the plaintiff acquired possession of the said premises No. 107, they were used and occupied as a public-house, known by the sign of the "Magpie and Pewter Platter," and were, and are, in a line with and next adjoining Nos. 108 and 109. The said premises, Nos. 107, 108 and 109, abut, on the rear or west side thereof, upon the east side of certain premises fronting in Gresham Street West, and therein numbered 1 to 8, hereinafter called the Gresham Street property. In the year 1852 the plaintiff pulled down his premises, Nos. 108 and 109, Wood Street, which were then old and dilapidated houses, and erected on their site new warehouses. In doing so, he altered the position and enlarged the dimensions of the windows previously existing, increased the height of the building, and set back the rear or back line of those warehouses.

The defendant, who is a carpet-warehouseman, on the 23rd of July 1852, was tenant of the said Gresham Street property, and now holds the same under a lease for a term of eighty-one years since granted to him. In and about the year 1856 the defendant pulled down the buildings then standing on the Gresham Street property in order to erect thereon a warehouse.

The plaintiff, in July 1857, immediately after his purchase of No. 107, Wood Street, made alterations in it by lowering the first and second floors so as to make them correspond with his adjoining new warehouses, Nos. 108 and 109, and by lowering two of the windows in such floors so as to suit the new position of the floors. One of the lowered windows was about one foot longer than before, and the other about the same size as the old one, and both occupied parts of the old apertures. A small window on the first floor was blocked up. He also built two additional stories to No. 107, in the first of which, viz. the fourth story of the premises, he put out a new window, and in the fifth or attic story he placed a window extending across the entire width of the building. These new windows and lights were so situated that it was impossible for the owners of the said Gresham Street property to obstruct or block them without also obstructing or blocking, to an equal or greater extent, that portion of the said windows and lights which occupied the site of the said ancient windows in No. 107.

The said alterations and additions in No. 107, Wood Street, so far as the windows are concerned, were completed by the plaintiff in the month of August 1857.

After the alterations and additions to No. 107, Wood Street, had been so completed, the defendant proceeded to erect his said intended warehouse and premises on the Gresham Street property, and built up the eastern wall thereof to such a height as to obstruct the whole of the windows and lights of No. 107, Wood Street.

The defendant refused to remove the said eastern wall of his warehouse and premises or any part of it.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover in respect of the obstruction of light and air complained of. If they are of opinion that he is so entitled, then the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to stand and the damages to be reduced to 40s.; if they think the plaintiff is not so entitled, then the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant."

The Judges of the Court of Common Pleas were equally divided in opinion, the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Williams being in favour of the plaintiff below, Mr. Justice Keating and Mr. Justice Byles being in favour of the defendant below. Mr. Justice Keating thereupon withdrew his opinion, and judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff below (3).

The defendant below brought error upon that judgment, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed the judgment. There was a difference of opinion among the Judges, Mr. Justice Wightman, Mr. Justice Crompton, Mr. Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Blackburn being in favour of the plaintiff below, and the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Martin being in favour of the defendant below (4).

The Attorney General and Archibald, for the appellant.—The right to an easement must rest on some presumed grant, and the extent of the grant is always to be referred to and measured by the user and the effect of it. The cases shew that whatever may be the origin of the right, such right is measured by usage. So, if the effect on the property subject to the right is varied, the party having the right cannot claim the benefit of the right as to the old part which has remained unaltered, so as to shield the user of the new part. Such an alteration sets the owner of the servient tenement free to protect himself. As to the origin of the right being presumed to be in grant before the Prescription Act—

Daniel v. North (5), Barker v. Richardson (6)—the old theory of the law still remains—Bright v. Walker (7). The effect of material alterations which if acquiesced in would increase the servitude of the servient tenement is to destroy the servitude, unless the new encroachment can be shut out without affecting the old right. The consent is to a different thing. The old right cannot be used as a shield for fresh encroachment. The continuance of what the servient tenant has done to protect himself from such encroachment cannot be prevented by the owner of the dominant tenement restoring the property to its original state. The servient tenant consented only to something of which the dominant tenant has deprived himself of the right to insist upon by altering the state of circumstances—Luttrell's case (8). The first case having direct application to the present is Cherrington v. Abney (9), and see Com. Dig. (10) and Martin v. Goble (11). The cases of Dougall v. Wilson (12), Cotterell v. Griffiths (13), Chandler v. Thompson (14) and Thomas v. Thomas (15) are not relied upon, but merely mentioned in their order of date. The later cases on which reliance is placed are—Garritt v. Sharp (16), Blanchard v. Bridge (17), Renshaw v. Bean (1), Wilson v. Townsend (18), Davies v. Marshall (19), Cooper v. Hubbuck (20) and Hutchinson v. Copestake (2). The opinion of the majority of the Judges in the present case has been approved of by Vice Chancellor Wood in Weatherly v. Ross (21). The respondent abandoned his old rights; he had no intention of resuming them when he made the alterations, and he cannot resume them now—Liggins v. Inge (22), Stoke v. Singers (23), Gale on Easements, pp. 500, 483-4, and Martin v. Hendon (24).

Sir H. Cairns and Clearby, for the respondent, were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—By the 3rd section of the act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71, intituled 'An Act for shortening the time of prescription in certain cases,' it is enacted, "that when the access and use of light to and for any dwelling-house, workshop or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing."

Upon this section it is material to observe, with reference to the present appeal, that the right to what is called "an ancient light" now depends upon positive enactment. It is matter juris positivi, and does not require, and therefore ought not to be vested on any presumption of grant or fiction of a licence having been obtained from the adjoining proprietor. Written consent or agreement may be used for the purpose of accounting for the enjoyment of the servitude, and thereby preventing the title which would otherwise arise from uninterrupted user or possession during the requisite period. This observation is material, because I think it will be found that error in some decided cases has arisen from the fact of the Courts treating the right as originating in a presumed grant or licence.

It must also be observed, that after an enjoyment of an access of light for twenty years without interruption, the right is declared by the statute to be absolute and indefeasible; and it would seem, therefore, that it cannot be lost or defeated by a subsequent temporary intermission of enjoyment not amounting to abandonment. Moreover, this absolute and indefeasible right, which is the creation of the statute, is not subjected to any condition or qualification; nor is it made liable to be affected or prejudiced by any attempt to extend the access or use of light beyond that which, having been enjoyed uninterruptedly during the required period, is declared to be not liable to be defeated.

Before dealing with the present appeal, it may be useful to point out some expressions which are found in the decided cases, and which seem to have a tendency to mislead. One of these expressions is the phrase, "right to obstruct." If my adjoining neighbour builds upon his land, and opens numerous windows which look over my gardens or my pleasure-grounds, I do not acquire from this act of my neighbour any new or other right than I before possessed. I have simply the same right that I before possessed—I have simply the same right of building or raising any erection I please on my own land, unless that right has been by some antecedent matter either lost or impaired, and I gain no new or enlarged right by the act of my neighbour.

Again, there is another form of words which is often found in the cases on this subject, namely, the phrase, "invasion of privacy, by opening windows." That is not treated by the law as a wrong for which any remedy is given. If A. be the owner of beautiful gardens and pleasure-grounds, and B. is the owner of an adjoining piece of land, B. may build upon it a manufactory with a hundred windows overlooking the pleasure-grounds, and A. has neither more nor less than the right which he previously had, of erecting on his land a building of such height and extent as will shut out the windows of the newly-erected manufactory.

If in lieu of the words, "the access and use of light to and for any dwelling-house," in the 3rd section of the statute, there be read, as there well may, "any window of any dwelling-house," the enactment (omitting immaterial words) will run thus, "when any window of a dwelling-house shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right to such window shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible."

Suppose then that the owner of a dwelling-house with such a window, that is, with an absolute and indefeasible right to a certain access of light, opens two other windows, one on each side of the old window, does the indefeasible right become thereby defeasible? By opening the new windows he does no injury or wrong in the eye of the law to his neighbour, who is at liberty to build up against them, so far as he possesses the right of building on his land; but it must be remembered that he possesses no right of building so as to obstruct the ancient window; for to that extent his right of building is gone by the indefeasible right which the statute has conferred.

Believing this to be the sound principle, I cannot accept the reasoning on which the decisions in Renshaw v. Bean(1) and Hutchinson v. Copestake(2) were founded. The facts of those two cases were not exactly the same as in the present; for in neither was any ancient window preserved unaltered, but the old windows had been enlarged and new ones added; in which state of things it was held, that inasmuch as it was not possible for the adjoining proprietor to obstruct the new windows and the access of the ancient lights, without at the same time obstructing the original apertures, the owner of the house must be considered as having lost his right to the ancient lights, at all events until he restored his house to its original condition.

According to these cases the law must be thus stated, namely, if the owner of a dwelling-house with ancient lights opens new windows in such a position as that the new windows cannot be conveniently obstructed by an adjoining proprietor without obstructing the old, he, the adjoining proprietor, is entitled so to do, at all events so long as the new windows remain. Upon examining the judgments it will be seen that the opening of the new windows is treated as a wrongful act done by the owner of the ancient lights, which occasions the loss of the old right he possessed; and the Court asks whether he can complain of the natural consequence of his own act.

I think two erroneous assumptions are involved in or underlie this reasoning: first, that the act of opening the new windows was a wrongful one; and, secondly, that such wrongful act is sufficient in law to deprive the party of his right under the statute. But, as I have already observed, the opening of the new windows is in law an innocent act, and no innocent act can destroy the existing right of the one party or give any enlarged right to the other, namely, the adjoining proprietor.

In the present case an ancient window in the plaintiff's house has been preserved and remained unaltered during all the alterations of the building, and the access of light to that window is now obstructed by the appellant's wall. A majority of the Court below have held, that the obstruction was justified whilst the new windows which the plaintiff some time since opened, remained, but was not justifiable when those new windows were closed and the house so far as regards the access of light was restored to its original state; but, on the plain and simple principles I have stated, my opinion is, that the appellant's wall so far as it obstructed the access of light to the respondent's ancient unaltered window, was an illegal obstruction from the beginning; and I have great difficulty in acceding to the reasoning that this permanent building of the appellant was a legal act when begun, and completed, but has subsequently become illegal through a change of purpose on the part of the respondent. On such a principle the person who opens new lights might allow them to remain until his neighbour, acting legally according to these judgments, has at great expense erected a dwelling-house, and then by abandoning and closing the new lights might require his neighbour's house to be pulled down. I think the judgment ought to be affirmed, but not on the ground or for the reasons given by the majority of the Judges in the Courts below. I therefore move, your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH. — My Lords, the question raised by the special case is, whether the plaintiff in error was justified in erecting, opposite and near to the house of the defendant in error, a building which prevented the access of light and air through several ancient windows through which light and air had been accustomed to pass to the house in question without interruption.

Previously to the erection by the plaintiff in error of the buildings complained of, the defendant in error made extensive alterations in his house, and in so doing opened new and enlarged several of the old windows; and it was not disputed that the plaintiff in error was justified in obstructing the new and the enlargements of the old windows. He effected this obstruction by erecting a permanent building on his own land, so near to the house of the defendant in error as to obstruct the whole of his lights, the old as well as the new. The special case finds as a fact that it was impossible for him to obstruct or block the new windows without at the same time obstructing or blocking that portion of the windows and lights which occupied the site of the ancient windows; and his counsel argued, on the authority of Renshaw v. Beas (1), that under these circumstances he had a right to erect the building in question. After it had been so erected the defendant in error caused the altered windows to be restored to their original state, and he also filled up with brickwork the spaces occupied by the new windows, and having done this, he called on the plaintiff in error to remove the building which thus blocked up the ancient, and only the ancient windows. This application was not complied with, and thereupon the defendant in error brought his action in the Court of Common Pleas against the plaintiff in error for obstructing his ancient lights.

At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff in error, subject to a special case; which was afterwards argued before the Court of Common Pleas; and the Court being equally divided in opinion, the junior Judge, following the usual practice, withdrew his opinion, and judgment was there given for the now defendant in error, according to the opinions of what was then the majority of the Court. The case was then brought to the Court of Error, where the judgment below was affirmed, four of the six learned Judges who heard the case concurring in opinion with the Court of Common Pleas in favour of the defendant in error, and two dissenting. The case was then brought by writ of error to this House, and the plaintiff in error was heard at the Bar. We did not call on the defendant in error to support his case, being of opinion that the plaintiff in error had laid no ground for disturbing the judgment below; though our opinion was not founded on the same ground as that on which the majority of the Judges below seem to have proceeded.

The case raised two questions. First, whether the plaintiff in error was justified in erecting the building whereby the access of light and air to the house of the defendant in error was obstructed? and secondly, if he was, then whether he was bound to remove it after the windows of the defendant's house had been restored to their ancient condition? The second question does not arise, and I will therefore proceed to state shortly the grounds on which my opinion rests.

The right to enjoy light through a window looking on a neighbour's land, on whatever foundation it might have rested previously to the passing of the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71, depends now on the provisions of that statute.

The special case finds that the windows of the house of the defendant in error, previously to the alterations made by him in 1857, were ancient windows; by which we must understand windows through which he had enjoyed access of light without interruption for twenty years. His right, therefore, to that light was by the express provision of the statute absolute and indefeasible. It is not disputed that when the plaintiff in error erected his wall, he obstructed the light to which the defendant in error was so entitled, and that so he prevented him from enjoying what the statute declares was his absolute and indefeasible right. The plaintiff in error, in justification of the course he took, relies on the fact that, before he raised his wall and so caused the obstruction complained of, the defendant in error had made material alterations in his house, enlarging the old windows and adding new ones. There was nothing to make it unlawful for the plaintiff in error to obstruct the access of light to these new windows, and to so much of the altered old windows as did not occupy the old site through which light had formerly passed; and as it was impossible to do this without at the same time obstructing the light which had previously passed through the old windows (so at least we must take the fact to be), the plaintiff in error contends that he had a right to obstruct the whole.

I am unable to comprehend the principle on which such a claim can rest, where a person has wrongfully obstructed another in the enjoyment of an easement, as, for instance, by building a wall across a path over which there is a right of way, public or private, any person so unlawfully obstructed may remove the obstruction; and if any damage thereby arises to him who wrongfully set it up, he has no right to complain. His own wrongful act justified what would otherwise have been a trespass. But this depends entirely on the circumstance that the act of erecting the wall was a wrongful act; whereas the opening of a window is not an unlawful act; every man may open any number of windows looking over his neighbour's land; and on the other hand, the neighbour may, by building on his own land within twenty years after the opening of the window, obstruct the light which would otherwise reach it. Some confusion seems to have arisen from speaking of the right of the neighbour in such a case, as a right to obstruct the new lights. His right is a right to use his own land by building on it as he thinks most to his interest, and if by so doing he obstructs the access of light to the new windows he is doing that which affords no ground of complaint. He has a right to build, and if thereby he obstructs the new lights he is not committing a wrong. But what ground is there for contending that, because his building so as to obstruct a new light would afford no ground of complaint, therefore, if he cannot so build without committing a trespass, he may commit a trespass? I can discover no principle to warrant any such inference.

I will put this case.—Suppose the owner in fee simple of close A. were to build a house at the edge of close A. with windows overlooking close B, held by himself, as tenant for life, or by a tenant for life, who, from feelings of kindness, would not object to the opening of the windows of the new house: at the end of twenty years he would,

according to the 3rd and 7th sections of the act, have acquired an absolute and indefeasible right to the access of light across close B. It surely cannot be contended that the remainderman, because he could not otherwise prevent the owner of the house from acquiring this right, might, before the expiration of twenty years, come on the land of the tenant for life, and there erect a building to obstruct the light of the new windows. And yet the argument of the plaintiff in error must go this length, for there is no difference in principle between a trespass on the soil and any other trespass.

In the case under discussion the new windows were opened by the same person who had a right to access of light through the old windows; but this might have been otherwise. Suppose the owner of an ancient window on a first floor not to be the owner of the second floor, and that the owner of that floor should open a window which the owner of the adjoining land could not obstruct without at the same time obstructing the ancient light; no one, I suppose, would argue that in such a case the owner of the land overlooked could obstruct the ancient light, and yet I can see no difference in principle between the two cases. It may be said that, in the case I have just put, the owner of the ancient light was in no default, and could not be affected by the act of a stranger. But neither is he in any default when he opens a new window himself. He does what he lawfully may do, and if the act done is lawful, I do not understand how the consequence can be different when it is the act of the party himself and when it is the act of a stranger. If after the owner of the second floor had opened a new window, and within twenty years the owner of the first floor had purchased the second floor, would the continuance by him of the new window authorize the neighbour in obstructing the old light if he could not otherwise obstruct the new one? This will hardly be contended. So, again, suppose the owner of the first floor to have demised the second floor to a tenant, and that he without the licence of his landlord put out the new window; this might entitle the landlord to complain of his tenant as having been guilty of waste, but it can hardly be contended that it would justify the neighbour in obstructing the ancient light enjoyed by the landlord. So, again, if the landlord had given his permission to the tenant to open the window, I cannot see any difference which this would make; the tenant would, quoad hoc, be unimpeachable of waste; but it would be lawful to the landlord to make such a demise, which could not in any respect affect the relative rights of the landlord and his neighbour.

Suppose the owner of a house has a right of way to the door of his house over his neighbour's land, a case put by Mr. Justice Blackburn in his judgment, the argument of the plaintiff in error would go to shew that if the owner of the house should put a pane of glass in his door, his right of way would or might be at an end. For it would be lawful for the neighbour to obstruct it if he could not otherwise obstruct the light.

I will not, however, multiply illustrations. The plain principle seems to me to be, that no one can interfere with the absolute and indefeasible right of another, unless where such interference is made necessary by the wrongful act of the party possessing the right.

I do not attempt to disguise from myself that, unless the facts of this case can be distinguished from those in Renshaw v. Bean (1), the conclusion at which I have arrived is directly at variance with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in that case. But I own I think that the facts there were substantially the same as those now before us, and the Court decided there that the obstruction of the ancient light was in such a case justifiable. Lord Campbell, in delivering the judgment of the Court in that case, stated that the Court did not proceed on the ground that the plaintiff, whose ancient lights were obstructed, had lost the right which he had previously enjoyed of having light and air through such portions of the new windows as had formed portions of the ancient windows; but his Lordship added, "If, by the alterations which the plaintiff made, he exceeded the limits of that right, and so put himself into such a position that the access could not be obstructed by the defendant without at the same time obstructing the former right of the plaintiff, he has only himself to blame." The observations I have already made sufficiently indicate the reasons on which I cannot assent to this reasoning; and unless that reasoning be sound, the judgment cannot be supported.

The case of Renshaw v. Bean (1) was followed by that of Hutchinson v. Copestake (2), not only in the Court of Common Pleas, where the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was considered to be binding, but also in the Exchequer Chamber, though there some of the Judges seem to have proceeded on the special facts of that case. It is, however, the duty of this House, as the ultimate Court of Appeal, to lay down the law on what they consider to be correct principles, and though we should be slow to decide contrary to the decisions of the Courts of Westminster Hall, where they have been long received and acted on, even if we see cause to question the grounds on which they were supposed to rest, yet no such principle ought to restrain us from correcting what we consider to have been an erroneous decision pronounced only thirteen years ago; more especially when we have, as in this case, the opinions of two very learned Judges expressing their very decided dissent from it, and when we think we can discover in the judgments of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and of Mr. Justice Williams great doubts, to put it no higher, of the soundness of the decision which we are overruling.

My clear opinion is that the judgment below ought to be affirmed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but on different grounds from those on which it proceeded.

The only facts of the special case which are necessary to be noticed are, That in making the alterations in his house, which originally consisted of three stories with one window in each story, the respondent altered the windows in the two lower stories, but so as to make them both occupy part of the old apertures, and retained the window in the third story unaltered, and built two additional stories, in each of which he put out a new window. That after these alterations were completed, the appellant, who had previously made preparations for erecting a warehouse on the site of some old buildings which he had pulled down, built up a wall to such a height as to obscure the whole of the lights in the respondent's buildings; it being impossible (as the special case states) for the appellant to obstruct or block up the upper windows without obstructing or blocking up the portion of the windows or lights which occupied the site of the ancient windows. The special case also states that the new upper windows could not have been obstructed in a more convenient manner (by which I understand more convenient for the appellant) than by building up a wall of sufficient height on his premises. After the appellant's wall was finished the respondent caused the altered windows in his building to be restored to their original state, and the new windows in the upper stories to be blocked up, and then called upon the appellant to pull down his wall and restore to the respondent's premises their former light and air. The appellant refused, and thereupon the action was brought.

Upon this state of facts two questions have been raised: First, whether the appellant can justify the obstruction of the ancient lights in the respondent's house on the ground that it was otherwise impossible for him to obstruct the new lights. Secondly, supposing him to have this right, whether it continued after the necessity for its exercise ceased, by the discontinuance of the new lights.

The first question brings directly into review before this House the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Renshaw v. Bean (1), which in its circumstances (as stated by Lord Campbell in his judgment) closely resembled the present case. The Court there held that "the plaintiff having by the alterations which he made exceeded the limits of his former rights and put himself into such a position that the access could not be obstructed by the defendant in the exercise of his lawful rights, on his own land, without at the same time obstructing the former right of the plaintiff, he had only himself to blame for the existence of such a state of things, and must be considered to lose the former right which he had, at all events until he should, by himself doing away with the access and restoring his windows to their former state, throw upon the defendant the necessity for so arranging his buildings as not to interfere with the admitted right."

In this statement of the grounds of decision the word "right" does not appear to be used with appropriate precision and accuracy. It is not correct to say that the plaintiff, by putting new windows into his house, or altering the dimensions of the old ones, "exceeded the limits of his right," because the owner of a house has a right at all times (apart, of course, from any agreement to the contrary) to open as many windows in his house as he pleases. By the exercise of the right he may materially interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of his neighbour, but of this species of injury the law takes no cognizance. It leaves every one to his self-defence against an annoyance of this description, and the only remedy in the power of the adjoining owner is to build on his own ground, and so to shut out the offensive windows. But as it would be hard upon the owner of a house to which the free access of light and air had been permitted for a long period to continue for ever indebted to the forbearance of his neighbour for its enjoyment, the Courts of law, upon the principle of quieting possession, formerly held that where there had been an uninterrupted use of lights for twenty years, it was to be presumed that there was some grant of them by the neighbouring owner, or, in other words, that he had by some agreement restricted himself in the otherwise lawful employment of his own land. The Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.) turned this presumption into an absolute right, founded upon user on one side and acquiescence on the other.

It was argued, on behalf of the appellant, that under this act the right to the enjoyment of lights was still made to rest on the footing of a grant. I do not see what benefit his case would derive from the establishment of this position; but it appears to me to be contrary to the express words of the statute. By the Prescription Act, after twenty years' user of lights, the owner of them acquires an absolute and indefeasible right, which so far restricts the adjoining owner in the use of his own property that he can do nothing upon his premises which may have the effect of obstructing them. The right thus acquired must necessarily be confined to the exact dimensions of the opening through which the access of light and air has been permitted. As to everything beyond, the parties possess exactly the same relative rights which they had before. The owner of the privileged window does nothing unlawful if he enlarges it, or if he makes a new window in a different situation. The adjoining owner is at liberty to build upon his own ground so as to obstruct the addition to the old window, or to shut out the new one; but he does not regain his former right of obstructing the old window, which he had lost by acquiescence, nor does the owner of the old window lose his former absolute and indefeasible right to it, which he had gained by length of user. The right continues uninterruptedly until some unequivocal act of intentional abandonment is done by the person who has acquired it, which will remit the adjoining owner to the unrestricted use of his own premises.

It will, of course, be a question in each case whether the circumstances satisfactorily establish an intention to abandon altogether the future enjoyment and exercise of the right. If such an intention is clearly manifested, the adjoining owner may build as he pleases upon his own land; and should the owner of the previously-existing window restore the former state of things, he could not compel the removal of any building which had been placed upon the ground during the interval; for a right once abandoned, is abandoned for ever. But the counsel for the appellant carried their argument far beyond this point. The part of the case which was the most difficult for them to encounter was that which relates to the unaltered window in the third floor. As to this, they contended that the alteration of the windows below and the addition of the windows above so changed the character of the previously-acquired right to light and air as entirely to destroy it. But it is not easy to comprehend how this effect can be produced by acts wholly unconnected with an ancient window, which the owner has carefully retained in its original state. And the learned counsel did not seem to expect much success from their argument in its application to the unaltered window, but directed it, with more plausibility, to the alterations of the windows on the lower floors. As to these, they contended that the owner of ancient windows is bound to keep himself within their original dimensions; and that if he changes or enlarges them in any way, although he retains the old openings, in whole or in part, he must either be taken to have relinquished his right or to have lost it. But upon what principle can it be said that a person, by endeavouring to extend a right, must be held to have abandoned it, when, so far from manifesting any such intention, he evinces his determination to retain it, and to acquire something beyond it? If under such circumstances abandonment of the right cannot be assumed, as little can it be said that it is a cause of forfeiture.

It must always be borne in mind that it is no unlawful act for the owner of a house to break out a window, or to enlarge an ancient window, although in the latter case some difficulty may be thrown upon an adjoining owner to distinguish the old part from the new, and so to ascertain which part he has a right to obstruct, and which is privileged from his obstruction. The alterations may be of such a nature (as in the present case) as to make it impossible for him to prevent the further restriction of his liberty to build on his own premises, without at the same time interfering with the right previously acquired against him. Yet it would be a very strange extension of the law of forfeiture, to hold that the owner of an ancient window doing nothing but what he may lawfully do, loses his existing right, because it stands in the way of the means of interfering with an act against which the owner of the adjoining land would otherwise have been able and would have been entitled to defend his property. Even supposing what was done by the respondent amounted to an unlawful encroachment, the question put by Mr. Baron Alderson in Thomas v. Thomas (15) appears to be unanswerable,—“How does the plaintiff, by claiming more than he lawfully may, destroy his title to that which he lawfully may claim?” But the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Renshaw v. Bean (1) held, that “because the respondent in the exercise of his lawful rights on his own land could not obstruct (what they called) the excess of the plaintiff's former right, without obstructing that former right, he had only himself to blame for the existence of such a state of things, and must be considered to lose the former right which he had.” This doctrine appears to me to be founded neither upon principle nor upon authority. It amounts to this. The plaintiff having acquired an absolute right to ancient windows against the defendant, does an act which it was lawful for him to do, subject to the right of the defendant to render it useless; but because he has contrived his measures so as to prevent the defendant hindering the attempt to obtain a new right without destroying or at least suspending the exercise of the old, therefore the old right may be lawfully interrupted, if indeed it is not altogether lost.

It may be said (and this was urged in argument at the bar), that unless such is the law, a person who has an ancient window may acquire a right to any number of additional windows by so contriving their position as to place them completely under the protection of the ancient window, and thus effectually prevent the adjoining owner's interference with them. Undoubtedly, this is a very possible case; and yet there does not appear to be anything unreasonable or unjust in denying even under such circumstances a power over the ancient lights which did not previously exist; for consider the case upon the presumption of a grant as it stood before the Prescription Act. The rights of the parties would of course be taken to be regulated by such grant, and it would have been contrary to principle to permit the grantor to derogate from his own grant, merely because he could not otherwise prevent an act which might prejudicially affect him, but which the grantee was not prohibited from doing by law. And precisely the same consequences seem to follow from the right being now acquired by user and acquiescence—while the user is ripening into a right the adjoining owner has the power completely in his own hands. If he has no objection to the particular window, but is desirous of preventing any enlargement or alteration of it, or any new window being opened, he may inform his neighbour of his determination to build up against the window unless he will enter into an agreement not to enlarge or alter it nor to open any new one without his permission.

The adjoining owner can therefore always protect himself by a little vigilance, and if he allows rights to be acquired under shelter of which he is prevented using his land for the purpose of defence against the acts of his neighbour, he must blame his own want of foresight and precaution, and not the law, which will not permit an ancient right to be invaded upon any such assumed ground of necessity.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the case of Renshaw v. Bean (1) cannot be supported, and that the appellant cannot justify the erection of his wall and the consequent obstruction of the ancient lights on the respondent's building.

The determination of the first question in the respondent's favour renders it unnecessary to consider whether the respondent had a right to insist upon the removal of the appellant's wall, after he had restored his windows to their original state. In the view which I have taken, it is impossible for me to deal with the second question in the way in which it has been treated in the Court of Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber. If I had been of opinion that the acts of the respondent conferred upon the appellant the power of interfering, for however short a time, with the right of the respondent, I should have been compelled, as a consequence, to hold that the obstruction could not be rendered temporary by any subsequent act of the respondent, because a right once lost can never be revived. But it is unnecessary to dwell upon this point, because it is obvious that after the decision of this case the question can never again be raised. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

MOCKFORD v. TAYLOR.

Pleading—Several Counts—Trove and Detinue—Striking out.

As a general rule counts in trove and detinue ought not to be allowed together, and the latter ought to be struck out; this is, however, subject to exception if the plaintiff satisfies the Judge that there is good reason for allowing both.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why one of the counts of the declaration should not be struck out.

There were two counts, one in trove and one in detinue, and the Judge at chambers had refused to make an order under the first pleading rule of Trinity Term, 1853, for striking one of them out.

Hance shewed cause.—First, the Court will not review the decision of the Judge at chambers; secondly, counts in trove and detinue cannot now be said to be founded on the same cause of action, as now under the latter there may be recovery in specie. (He was, however, in answer to a question of the Court, unable to shew any distinction in the character, &c. of the goods in respect of which the action was brought, or any special reason for pleading both counts.)

Tapping, in support of the rule, was not called on.

ERLE, C.J.—You had better go back to chambers with an intimation to the Judge that we think that, as a general rule, only one of such counts should be allowed, and that the count in trove should be the one generally allowed. This general rule, however, must be taken, subject to the exception, that both should be allowed if the plaintiff satisfies the Judge that justice will be better administered by the allowance, as, for instance, where the article is a precious article which the owner ought to be allowed to recover in specie.

The rest of the COURT (1) concurred.

Watercourse—Artificial Channel—Water brought to the Surface artificially—Easement—User as of Right—Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.

The plaintiff, who was the occupier of certain clay-works, had enjoyed for twenty years, without interruption, the use of a watercourse, called the clear-water leat, which brought water to such works. Part of this water had been collected from natural springs, from whence it had been brought over the defendant's land by an artificial channel made by the plaintiff's predecessor at the clay-works. The rest of the water had been obtained by the plaintiff from a stream brought artificially to the surface by the operation of miners who had not permanently abandoned their right to the same. The plaintiff claimed also a prescriptive right by twenty years' uninterrupted user to another watercourse, called the foul-water leat. There was evidence at the trial that the plaintiff's predecessor at the clay-works had leave from the tenant and owner of the land which had since become the defendant's, to cut such watercourse from a brook down to the clay-works, on the terms of paying a peppercorn rent, and of such tenant being at liberty to stop it whenever there was a scarcity of water for his own purposes:—Held, that as to such foul-water leat there was evidence on which a jury might find that the plaintiff's enjoyment thereof was not under a claim of right, but precarious, and that, therefore, a twenty years' user by the plaintiff under such circumstances, though without interruption, was not an enjoyment as of right within the meaning of the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.

Held, also, that as to that part of the water in the clear-water leat which had an artificial origin from mining, the plaintiff could not by twenty years' user acquire an easement therein under the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71, but that as to that part which had been collected from natural springs the plaintiff had, as against the defendant, acquired by user a right to its flow, notwithstanding that the land in which such supply was obtained was within the district of tin-bounds, and subject therefore to the contingent rights of the owners of such bounds, who have by custom a right to use all water in their district for mining operations.

Held, further, that the plaintiff as such occupier of the clay-works to which the water was brought, had a sufficient interest to enable him to maintain his claim to a prescriptive right to the flow of such water.

Action for interfering with the plaintiff's right to certain watercourses.

The first and second counts of the declaration were each for removing a launder or water-carrier, and diverting and obstructing the water of a watercourse from flowing by the aid of such launder along the plaintiff's land and premises. The third count was for preventing the water of a brook from flowing along a leat called the foul-water leat to the plaintiff's premises.

The following are the facts as proved at the trial before the Common Serjeant at the Cornwall Summer Assizes for 1864. The plaintiff was the occupier of some china clay-works, in the parish of St. Austell, in the county of Cornwall, called the Carrancarrow Clay Works, which he had occupied, under Lord Mount-Edgcumbe, the owner of the Carrancarrow estate, and had done so since the year 1835. Adjoining this estate was an estate called Goonamarth, which formerly formed part of Mr. Trevanion's property, but which had been purchased by the defendant in 1855, and had been since occupied by the defendant or his tenants.

Two streams flowed into the Carrancarrow clay-works, one called the foul-water leat, the other the clear-water leat, both of which were used by the plaintiff in the clay-works, it being essential that there should be a proper supply of water for the carrying on of such works.

With regard to the clear-water leat, it derived its water from two sources; one from water collected in the valley between the Carrancarrow and Goonamarth estates, which ran down there from natural springs, and was brought to the leat by a wooden trough, called a launder, placed over a brook or stream which flowed through such valley, and was known as the Cox-burrow brook. This launder was called the lower launder, and was put there about the year 1830, by Edward and William Hooper, who preceded the plaintiff in the occupation of the clay-works, and who by means of a channel which they made for that purpose, brought the water they found so collected there to such launder, in order to supply the clay-works with clear water, the launder being used to prevent the water from mixing with the water in the brook, which was liable to be fouled by the washing from the tin-mines in the neighbourhood. The other source was from a tin-tie stream situate higher up the brook than the lower launder, and nearly opposite some clay works called the Cawn Clay Works, on the Goonamarth estate. This stream came from an artificial adit made by the tin-miners, and it appeared that in 1842, the plaintiff, wanting an increase of water for his works, took the water which came from this tin-tie, across the brook by another launder, called the upper launder, which he placed there to receive it, and then by means of a leat, he brought the water from such upper launder to the place from whence the previous supply of the lower launder was taken, and where, uniting with that, it passed through such lower launder to the clear-water leat.

According to the custom of the county the tin-streamers have the free use of the water over the whole of the district within their tin-bounds, and they claim the right not only to use the water, but to divert it into other streams. There was evidence that between the years 1825 and 1828, one Vivian, who worked then at the Cawn Clay Works, had paid to one of the Hoopers who was then the owner of the tin-bounds, 4*l.* a year for the use of the water from the above-mentioned tin-tie, and that afterwards, Higman, the then lessee of the Goonamarth Clay Works, paid the said Hooper 10*l.* a year, which was subsequently reduced to 6*l.* 10*s.*, for the use of such water. It appeared also, that the plaintiff, in 1842, paid Hooper at the rate of 4*l.* a year, but it was a disputed question at the trial whether such payment was made by the plaintiff for the privilege of taking the water from the tin-tie, or whether only for having it pure, which it would not have been if the owner of the tin-bound had exercised his right of using the water. The upper launder rested on the land which was part of the Goonamarth estate, and which therefore had since become the defendant's. The lower launder was on the land occupied by the plaintiff, and outside the limits of the tin-bounds, but the place where the supply had been collected and conducted to the lower launder before the upper launder was placed, was within such limits.

In the year 1830, the said Edward and William Hooper, who were then in occupation of and working the Carrancarrow Clay Works, cut the foul-water leat from the brook a little above the lower launder, and by that means the water from the brook was brought down to their clay-works. With respect to the cutting of such foul-water stream the defendant produced in evidence at the trial two witnesses of the name of Geach, who said that in 1830 a meeting took place between the elder Hooper, their father, who occupied and worked some works lower down the stream at the lower Goonamarth, partly in Mr. Trevanion's and partly in Lord Mount-Edgcumbe's property, and the tollers or stewards of these two last-mentioned persons; that the question of whether Hooper should be allowed to cut the foul-water leat was discussed, and it was agreed that he should be allowed to do it on payment of a peppercorn or furze prickles per annum to Geach, and on the clear understanding that it was to be taken down whenever the water was scarce and wanted below; that the Hoopers cut the leat in consequence, and that the Geaches on one or two occasions cut down the leat. It appeared, however, that although Geach's works were continued till 1838, and the Geaches further had some interest in them till about 1847, they had left before 1835, so that this taking down was never during the plaintiff's occupation, and possibly when the Carrancarrow works were unworked for Hooper (who had occupied not only the works but also the farm on which they were, and who retained the farm when the plaintiff came in 1835), had ceased to work them for a year or two before the plaintiff took them. When the plaintiff took possession of the Carrancarrow Clay Works, in August 1835, both the foul-water leat and the lower launder were in existence; and until 1855, when the defendant became the owner of the Goonamarth estate, the plaintiff had always enjoyed the use of both the foul and clear-water leats without interruption, but after 1855 the user had been contentious, the defendant several times removing the two launders and destroying the foul-water leat, and the plaintiff as often restoring them, until the last interference of the defendant in respect of which the present action was brought.

At the trial, the plaintiff did not put in evidence any documentary title, but he proved that he was in possession of the Carrancarrow Clay Works, and that he had been so since 1835, and he stated that he had got a licence from Lord Mount-Edgumbe to dig and search for clay in the land let to Hooper, who was his Lordship's tenant of the Carrancarrow farm. This, it was objected for the defendant, was not sufficient to enable the plaintiff to maintain such an action as the present, and the point was reserved, if necessary, for the opinion of this Court.

First, was the foul-water leat cut from the brook with the consent of Geach and under the terms and conditions spoken of by the two Geaches, or was it done by Hooper of right without any agreement?

Secondly, was there a cutting off of the water from the leat on one or more occasions when water in the brook was scarce; and if so, was that done in virtue of the conditions to that effect originally imposed or done in assertion of a general right to have the water flow down the brook?

Thirdly, is the water in the part of the leat above the lower launder derived altogether from the source of supply above the upper launder, or is it partially so derived and partially derived from springs and sources of supply between the upper launder and the lower launder?

Fourthly, have the plaintiff and those through whom he claims had an uninterrupted enjoyment of the two leats, or of either of them, as of right for more than twenty years without interruption?

Fifthly, was the payment of 4*l.* a year to Hooper a payment made for a right to have the water, or was it a payment only in consideration of Hooper not fouling by using it for streaming tin?

To these questions the jury returned the following answers, viz.:

To the first question, that it was with the consent of Geach.

To the second question, that there was, for both reasons.

To the third, partially from both sources.

To the fourth, they have had uninterrupted possession of the leat marked green (which was the clear-water leat) from the upper launder downwards, but have not had uninterrupted possession of the foul-water leat too.

To the fifth, only for the purpose of preventing Hooper from fouling it.

Thereupon, under the direction of the learned Judge, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff upon the first and second counts, and for the defendant on the third count, the amount of damages being by consent left to an arbitrator to determine.

Montague Smith afterwards obtained a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the plaintiff on the third count, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial, on the ground that the licence granted by Geach, assuming it to be given, was merely a personal licence from him to Hooper, and that it did not affect the plaintiff, who was not privy to that bargain, and who enjoyed from 1835 as of right; or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, the learned Judge having in effect directed the jury that if they believed the evidence of the two Geaches the plaintiff's enjoyment of the foul-water leat was not an enjoyment as of right, and also on the ground that this evidence came upon the plaintiff by surprise.

Karslake, for the defendant, also obtained a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the defendant on the first and second counts, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial on the ground that the plaintiff was a mere licensee, and had no sufficient possession of the water to enable him to maintain the action; secondly, that the user of the water had been contentious since 1855, and that there was no proof given of enjoyment for twenty years as of right; thirdly, that the watercourses in question being altogether artificial, no right to continue to receive their flow could be acquired by the plaintiff; and, fourthly, that the plaintiff being unable to acquire a right to the water in the tin-tie as against the tin-bounder, was incapable of acquiring it at all; or for a dows was a wrongful one; and, secondly, that such wrongful act is sufficient in law to deprive the party of his right under the statute. But, as I have already observed, the opening of the new windows is in law an innocent act, and no innocent act can destroy the existing right of the one party or give any enlarged right to the other, namely, the adjoining proprietor.

In the present case an ancient window in the plaintiff's house has been preserved and remained unaltered during all the alterations of the building, and the access of light to that window is now obstructed by the appellant's wall. A majority of the Court below have held, that the obstruction was justified whilst the new windows which the plaintiff some time since opened, remained, but was not justifiable when those new windows were closed and the house so far as regards the access of light was restored to its original state; but, on the plain and simple principles I have stated, my opinion is, that the appellant's wall so far as it obstructed the access of light to the respondent's ancient unaltered window, was an illegal obstruction from the beginning; and I have great difficulty in acceding to the reasoning that this permanent building of the appellant was a legal act when begun, and completed, but has subsequently become illegal through a change of purpose on the part of the respondent. On such a principle the person who opens new lights might allow them to remain until his neighbour, acting legally according to these judgments, has at great expense erected a dwelling-house, and then by abandoning and closing the new lights might require his neighbour's house to be pulled down. I think the judgment ought to be affirmed, but not on the ground or for the reasons given by the majority of the Judges in the Courts below. I therefore move, your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH. — My Lords, the question raised by the special case is, whether the plaintiff in error was justified in erecting, opposite and near to the house of the defendant in error, a building which prevented the access of light and air through several ancient windows through which light and air had been accustomed to pass to the house in question without interruption.

Previously to the erection by the plaintiff in error of the buildings complained of, the defendant in error made extensive alterations in his house, and in so doing opened new and enlarged several of the old windows; and it was not disputed that the plaintiff in error was justified in obstructing the new and the enlargements of the old windows. He effected this obstruction by erecting a permanent building on his own land, so near to the house of the defendant in error as to obstruct the whole of his lights, the old as well as the new. The special case finds as a fact that it was impossible for him to obstruct or block the new windows without at the same time obstructing or blocking that portion of the windows and lights which occupied the site of the ancient windows; and his counsel argued, on the authority of Renshaw v. Bean (1), that under these circumstances he had a right to erect the building in question. After it had been so erected the defendant in error caused the altered windows to be restored to their original state, and he also filled up with brickwork the spaces occupied by the new windows, and having done this, he called on the plaintiff in error to remove the building which thus blocked up the ancient, and only the ancient windows. This application was not complied with, and thereupon the defendant in error brought his action in the Court of Common Pleas against the plaintiff in error for obstructing his ancient lights.

At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff in error, subject to a special case; which was afterwards argued before the Court of Common Pleas; and the Court being equally divided in opinion, the junior Judge, following the usual practice, withdrew his opinion, and judgment was there given for the now defendant in error, according to the opinions of what was then the majority of the Court. The case was then brought to the Court of Error, where the judgment below was affirmed, four of the six learned Judges who heard the case concurring in opinion with the Court of Common Pleas in favour of the defendant in error, and two dissenting. The case was then brought by writ of error to this House, and the plaintiff in unless there be an agreement in writing. Was there evidence to go to the jury here that Gaved enjoyed the watercourse in the same manner that Hooper had done? It was a watercourse cut within five years from the time that Gaved came into possession, a watercourse through Hooper's farm. Hooper was still living on the same farm, and continued to do so for the greater part of the twenty or thirty years, during which Gaved enjoyed it; it is on the face of it an artificial watercourse, and at the end of that time the person who succeeded to Geach claimed to have authority to stop it. Under this state of facts, I think there was evidence on which the jury were authorized to find, if they chose to do so, that it had not been enjoyed for twenty years preceding that time by a person claiming right thereto, but that the use had been precarious in the sense of that word as used in the Civil law. There are three ways of defeating a prescriptive right—by shewing that a man has been clandestinely using it, or has enjoyed it by violence, or in the third case, à precario, has had permission from some one else. The present case comes within the last class. We do not lay down the rule that it follows of necessity that Gaved must be affected by the licence that Hooper had, but that it is a matter which the Judge was bound to leave to the jury, and they having found their verdict on it, we think there is no ground for our interfering.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Court is asked to enter the verdict for the plaintiff, or, in the alternative, to grant a new trial, on the ground that the learned Judge misdirected the jury with respect to the agreement made between Hooper and Geach. If, as at one time I thought, the learned Judge had told the jury that the effect of the agreement between Geach and Hooper was to stamp the character of precariousness upon the enjoyment by a tenant who succeeded to Hooper—if he had laid that down as a proposition of law, his summing-up might have been objectionable. But though the answer to the first question seems to indicate that this was in the mind of the learned Judge, when we turn to the fourth question, it appears that this was not his meaning. The meaning of the first question was, no doubt, to leave to the jury the important consideration, whether the evidence of the Geaches was to be relied upon. The fourth question superadds this consideration: whether or not, if their evidence is to be relied on, the jury having taken that into consideration come to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that this enjoyment by Gaved was precarious. Therefore the two questions which are presented to us by the rule are in reality the same, and they amount to this: whether there was any evidence on which the jury might properly find that the enjoyment by Gaved was precarious. The plaintiff, in seeking to establish a right under the statute, may prove his enjoyment for the shorter period of twenty years; and in relying on his enjoyment for this period, must (with this exception, that he need not satisfy the jury of the existence of a lost grant, or that his enjoyment was from the time of legal memory) make out the same case as if he was seeking to establish a prescriptive right, or a right under a lost grant at common law. In answer to such a claim it would clearly be admissible evidence to prove that the enjoyment originated in an agreement between a former occupier of the dominant and a former occupier of the servient tenement, the effect of which was, that the enjoyment was precarious; and upon proof of the existence of such an agreement, and of circumstances such as those existing in the present case, it would be a question for the jury whether the enjoyment by the then tenant, the tenant of the dominant tenement at the time in question, was not an enjoyment pursuant to a special agreement; in other words, whether it was not a precarious enjoyment. In the present case, I apprehend there is abundant evidence upon which the jury might, if they thought proper, in answer to the fourth question, come to the conclusion that the enjoyment of Gaved was a precarious occupation, similar to that of Hooper. First of all, there is the existence of the agreement in Hooper's time; an agreement with Geach, who might well protest against the injustice of Hooper's letting in some new tenant next week, of whose existence he had no notice, and who by this enjoyment for twenty years, granted as a mere matter of neighbourly kindness to Hooper, might acquire a right against Geach under the statute. It is a reason why, if there be any evidence in the cause to prevent such an unjust conclusion being arrived at, the jury should have acted on that evidence. There is an agreement between Geach and Hooper, and by that agreement the water which flowed in a natural channel was to be diverted into an artificial channel by artificial means. I must say that, considering the jealousy which exists very naturally with regard to rights to water, it requires extraordinary credulity to suppose that a tenant coming into the enjoyment of a leat of this description should be ignorant of its character, or could arrive at any other conclusion than that it was by permission of the person who had the control over the natural stream that the leat was used. That would naturally put him on inquiry whether the permission had originated in a deed, so that the right was one he could expect to enjoy or insist upon, or whether it had originated only in licence. So far with respect to the question whether it was possible for Gaved to have known of the character of the enjoyment of the water in the foul-water leat. Then, as to Geach and the persons on his side, it was not very unnatural for the jury to come to the conclusion that they would be likely to be aware of the change of occupation from time to time. A man who had the occupation of this farm might have become acquainted with the persons who were at the china-works, and they might have a knowledge of the character, or probable character, of the leat; and that is evidence from which the jury might conclude that Gaved was content to go on enjoying it as before. If there was a knowledge of the change of occupation—that is, evidence from which the jury might conclude there was a tacit sufferance by Geach in the enjoyment of the leat being continued by the new tenant, Gaved, as it was by the old tenant, Hooper, with whom the agreement had been entered into, and subject to the conditions applying between Geach and Hooper, namely, that the enjoyment should be an enjoyment of a precarious character. Upon these grounds, it appears to me there was evidence upon which the jury might well find that the enjoyment of the foul-water leat during the twenty years before action was an enjoyment by the permission, express or implied, of the occupier of the Goonamarth estate. I may remark that in Toynbee v. Brown (2) the learned counsel, in the course of his argument, made a somewhat similar point to that we are now considering; but it was with reference to a case of light; and he said, by the express terms of the statute, a person who enjoyed lights, paying a rent for them for twenty years under a parol agreement, would be entitled to have them afterwards without paying any rent at all. Then the learned counsel put a case: "Suppose an agreement by a tenant for life that he and his successors, owners of certain property, should allow the use of light, could that agreement be set up to defeat the title of a party who had subsequently acquired a right to the use of the light by twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment?" To which Alderson, B. answered, "If the parties had gone on acting upon the agreement, that would be evidence from which the jury might negative an adverse enjoyment, which is the foundation of the right." So here, the agreement, taken with the other circumstances in the case, is evidence for the jury, upon which their verdict negating an adverse enjoyment may well stand.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Here the origin of the user of the stream is clearly shewn by the admissions on both sides. Whatever rights may have been since acquired, it is admitted to have been originally not a user as of right, but a user by permission of the tenant or owner of the stream or both. There is no doubt about that. Hooper then had no right. The plaintiff succeeds Hooper, and he did exactly what Hooper did, neither more nor less, until Martyn came. He did nothing, but enjoyed as his predecessor had done, but this enjoyment is not enough. The statute says he must be a person claiming right thereto. I quite agree with what fell from my Brother Willes; it is for the plaintiff to shew that he claimed right thereto; and until Martyn came in, there is no evidence that he did anything more than his predecessor did, who certainly did not claim right thereto. The question is left to the jury in this form—"As far as the foul-water leat is concerned, have the plaintiff and those through whom he claims had uninterrupted enjoyment of the foul-water leat as of right for more than twenty years?" Answer, "They have not had such a user as of right of the foul-water leat." It seems to me that question was rightly put to the jury, and that the verdict of the jury was also right.

Coleridge and Bullar then shewed cause against the defendant's rule.—With respect to the lower launder and the claim to the right of having the water to flow over it, there can be little doubt as to the plaintiff's right. An uninterrupted enjoyment for more than twenty years before the defendant interfered was proved to have existed. The upper launder was placed afterwards in order to increase the water in the lower launder, and there may perhaps be some difference as to the right with respect to the two launders. As to both, it is submitted that there was evidence of a user for a sufficient time to create a right. A tin-bounder has merely certain rights of user of the water for his tin operations; but he has no right to the land; and there was nothing in the fact that the water to the upper launder came from a tin-tie to prevent the landowner from interfering and stopping the water from passing over the launder and afterwards down to the plaintiff's works. No doubt the defendant interfered after 1855, when he took possession of the Goonamarth estate; but as often as he removed the launders they were restored, and the interruption was not sufficient to prevent the plaintiff's enjoyment of the water for the purpose of his clay-works. It is said that the payment to Hooper shewed that the water was got from the tin-bounder, and that the plaintiff had only a qualified right to it, that is, as against the tin-bounder; but the verdict of the jury answers that objection, as it proves that the payment was not for the water, but only that the tin-bounder should abstain from fouling it. Then it will be said, as it was at the trial, that the plaintiff was only a licensee, and could not acquire as such the right which he claims in this action. No authority was or can be cited in support of this objection; moreover, the plaintiff proved that he was the occupier of the clay-works, and it is in respect of such occupation that he has hitherto enjoyed the use of the water which he complains the defendant has interfered with.

Karslake and Pinder, in support of the defendant's rule.—The plaintiff had only an incorporeal right; he was merely a licensee to dig and search for clay, and that is not sufficient to entitle him to maintain this action—Harker v. Birkbeck (3), Doe d. Hanley v. Wood (4), Muskett v. Hill (5), Laing v. Whaley (6), and The Stockport Waterworks Company v. Potter (7). Next, with respect to the claim arising out of the upper launder. It is clear that the tin-tie was originally created by the tin-bounders, and both that and the adit were wholly within the tin-bounded district, so that the tin-bounders would have a right at any time to divert the stream flowing from such tin-tie. The custom, in Cornwall, giving the right to the bounder to divert the water within the bounded district is stated in the note, by Mr. Smirke, to Rogers v. Brenton (8). This water was only an artificial stream, and its being allowed by the tin-bounders to flow over the land could confer no right to it in anyone; therefore, the putting up this launder, and using the water as the plaintiff did, was no evidence of any user as of right. It was competent for the bounder at any time to have taken the stream away, and he stood with reference to it in the same position as the cutter of the sough in Arkwright v. Gell (9). In Greatrex v. Hayward (10), Parke, B. says, "The right of the party to an artificial watercourse as against the party creating it, must depend upon the character of the watercourse, and the circumstances under which it was created. This watercourse is clearly of a temporary nature only, and is dependent upon the mode which the defendant may adopt in draining his land. This is the precise case which was put by this Court in Wood v. Waud (11), where it is said by the Court in the judgment, which underwent much consideration, that 'The flow of water for twenty years from the eaves of a house, could not give a right to the neighbour to insist that the house should not be pulled down or altered, so as to diminish the quantity of water flowing from the roof.' The flow of water from a drain for the purposes of agricultural improvements for twenty years could not give a right to the neighbour so as to preclude the proprietor from altering the level of his drains, for the greater improvement of his land. The state of circumstances in such cases shews that one party never intended to give, nor the other to enjoy the use of the stream as a matter of right." Moreover, the payment to Hooper was a recognition by the plaintiff of the rights of the owner of the boulder, and so long as the latter might want the water in the adit for mining operations, the landowner would have no right to stop up the water from flowing. In Beeston v. Weate (12), the distinction is pointed out between the right to compel the continuance of a stream of artificial origin, and the right to have the benefit of a natural stream, by proof of a user, with the aid of artificial means—Gale on Easements, 3rd edit. p. 280. The right to the water over the lower launder is similar to the right to that which passes over the upper launder. The water taken to supply the lower launder was got from within the district of the tin-bounds, and was subject to the rights of the tin-bounders, and could never be used as of right against the landowner.

ERLE, C.J.—With respect to the claim of these parties relating to the water carried over the upper launder, I am unable to give a confident judgment at the present moment without further consideration. With respect to the claim to the lower launder, it seems to me that the verdict ought to stand. The water has been brought to the clay-works of the plaintiff, and I take it upon the evidence that the plaintiff was in the occupation of the clay-works, and that he had such an interest as would entitle him to maintain this claim to water flowing to the tenements in his occupation. I think that it was quite consistent with his occupation of the clay-works that he should have an easement to dig and search for clay all over Hooper's farm, and that he should be able to maintain a valid claim to the water by prescription. Then, does the evidence shew that, as to the lower launder, although he has had it and enjoyed the flow of the stream for twenty years without interruption, that he could not acquire a right to take the water by reason that that water was collected or found in land which was within and subject to the tin-bounds? It appears that the water flowed in a channel through land which was subject to tin-bounds, and that that channel brought down a quantity of water that flowed in a mead where it was collected and then flowed down from there to the clay-works occupied by the plaintiff. If for twenty years he had conducted water through that channel down to the clay-works under circumstances to which the statute applies, he would acquire a right to the water. But it is said that he could not have such a right, because the channel down which it flowed was within land which was within the district of tin-bounds, and that it was subject to the contingent rights of the bound-owners, if they chose to work the mine; and it is said that water subject to those contingent rights cannot become vested in any other persons absolutely as against all the world. I do not think that argument is tenable. If the rights of the tin-bounder are in operation, and he claims to exercise those rights, that which is called at common law the corporeal right of the tin-bounder may operate in respect of the water; but if the tin-bounder is not acting, in my opinion the general law of the land applies to Cornwall as much as to other places, and though the land is within the limits of tin-bounds, yet there being no tin-bounders at work or claiming to work, or setting up any right to water, the man who dug the watercourse, and conducted the water for twenty years to his clay-works, has a prior right to that water, notwithstanding the water originally flowed and was within land subject to tin-bounds. That would give the plaintiff the verdict with respect to the count founded on the lower launder.

As to the count relating to the upper launder, I must take time to consider.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. With respect to the first question, whether the plaintiff can maintain his action in respect of his possession of the clay-works, I am clearly of opinion that he can, because he was the occupier in possession of the land through or to which the water flowed; and the occupier in possession, as a rule, may maintain an action for the diversion of water which ought to flow through the land of which he is in possession. The plaintiff has the additional right of searching the land of which he is in possession and also other land, for the purpose of getting minerals there. If such an occupation ancillary to the enjoyment of mineral rights were not sufficient to maintain this action, the effect would be that there never could be a right of the kind acquired by occupiers within Lord Tenterden's Act. With respect to the second question, whether the user of the water was contentious, and therefore not as of right since the year 1855, I confess I was not impressed by the argument which has been addressed to us for the defendant. It must always be a question for the jury to determine, and which they have decided in this case, by saying that the enjoyment was of right in their judgment, notwithstanding the evidence. With respect to the third question, namely, whether the artificial origin of the watercourse prevented it from being of such a character that a right to it might be acquired by prescription, a very different question arises with respect to the upper launder, the water flowing over which was supplied altogether from an artificial opening made with a view to the tin streaming, and the lower launder the water to supply which comes in part from an adit driven not by the tin-borders, but by the plaintiff, or the person under whom he claims, for the purpose of supplying water to that launder. That water in one sense may be artificial, with an artificial opening through which it flows; but in every other sense it is natural, because it is supplied by springs running out of the land, and would flow on for ever unless interrupted. With respect, therefore, to such supply of water over the lower launder, no doubt the flow of it was originally of a permanent character, and therefore was subject to the law of prescription. That is the distinction that was pointed out in the case of Wood v. Waud (11), upon a consideration of the case of Arkwright v. Gell (9), from which it was inferred by some that artificial water was not the subject of prescription, and of the case of Magor v. Chadwick (13), in which it was laid down that the law of watercourses is the same whether natural or artificial. In Wood v. Ward (11), these two cases were considered, and the distinction was pointed out between an artificial watercourse, where from the nature of the case it is obvious that the enjoyment of it depended on temporary circumstances and one of a permanent character. In the present case, so far as the lower launder is concerned, it furnishes a good example of a stream artificially made, but in its origin supplied by a natural spring, and subject to the law of prescription. With respect to such stream the plaintiff has acquired a prescriptive right, subject to the question whether the circumstance of the water being within the tin-bounds prevents the operation of the prescription. In my opinion such circumstance no more prevents the operation of the Prescription Act to an incorporeal hereditament than it would in the case of a corporeal hereditament. The right of the tin-borders by custom is one apart from the ownership of the land, or the enjoyment of any right springing from it, with the exception of the particular right to produce tin and to take all reasonable means for that purpose, and the right of the owner of the soil, or of the incorporeal hereditament arising out of the soil, may well be determined by the ordinary law, whilst the tin-border may be considered as coming in by what I may not improperly describe as a title paramount under the custom. I do not trace in the Prescription Act any intention to allow the inhabitants of Cornwall, where the custom of tin-bounding prevails, to be in a less favourable condition in reference to acquiring rights of water by prescription than the inhabitants of other parts of England. With respect, therefore, to the lower launder, I concur in the judgment of the Chief Justice, that the rule ought to be discharged. As to the claim arising out of the upper launder, I wish time to consider it.

BYLES, J. concurred.

WILLES, J.—The effect of the payment to Hooper was not much discussed in the argument, because, in truth, upon the finding of the jury, there was no payment for the use of the water, and the right to throw dirt into the water may be considered as established by the case of Carlyon v. Lovering (14).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court on the claim relating to the upper launder was now (July 10) delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—The point remaining for decision is the right of the plaintiff to maintain his action on the count for removing the upper launder. The facts for the plaintiff are, that this launder was placed in 1842 to convey water in the leat to the plaintiff's works, and notwithstanding the evidence of contention between the parties we take the jury to have decided the question of fact rightly, that the enjoyment of this water by the plaintiff was as of right without interruption; but their verdict was taken, subject to the leave reserved to the defendant's counsel to move to reverse that verdict if the facts relied on for the defendant negatived in point of law the existence of the right claimed by the plaintiff. The result of these facts is, that the water in the stream in question was brought to the surface artificially by the operations of miners, and conveyed in the tie or open adit to the place in the brook where the upper launder was afterwards placed so as to receive it, and that the use of the stream, which might include a change of its direction, had not been abandoned by the miners. It appeared that the land where the facts relevant to the right to the stream in the upper launder took place was within the tin-bounds which at the earliest period mentioned in the evidence belonged to William Hooper, and had passed from him through mesne assignments to the defendant. The mouth of the adit, from which the stream of the tie flowed, the course of that stream from thence over the surface in the tie either to tin-streamworks, or to the Cawn clay-works, or to the brook, or to and beyond the upper launder towards the Carrancarrow clay-works of the plaintiff, were all within the limits of the tin-bounds above mentioned, and so were subject to the rights of the owner thereof. It appeared, also, that the owner of the tin-bounds had worked for tin, and had de facto exercised his right over the waters from time to time during all the time to which the evidence related. In 1826 and 1827 one Vivian had paid the bound-owner 4*l.* a year for taking the water from the tie to the Cawn clay-works. One Higman had paid annually 10*l.* to Hooper the father, and afterwards to Hooper the son, for taking the water of the tie down to 1851, and the plaintiff himself in 1852 agreed to pay to the bounder 4*l.* annually, and did pay three-quarters. It is true that these payments were made to the bounder to induce him to omit the exercise of his right to use the stream for tin, whereby the water would have been fouled; and that the water itself was not the subject of the agreement. But the point to be ascertained is, whether the miners had abandoned their right and interest in the stream brought to the surface by mining operations; and if the tin-bounder claimed and exercised the right of using the stream within the bounds when, where and how he chose, he had not abandoned his right thereto. It is not necessary here to consider further the rights of owners of tin-bounds; but it is not superfluous to add, that the right to tin-bounds is most clearly a part of the law and privilege of the Stannary, and, as such, part of the law of England (Co. Lit. 11 b); and that a Judge administering the law of England is as much bound within the Stannaries to protect rights derived from the Stannary Laws and to learn from those laws what those rights are, as in Kent he is bound to know what is the tenure of land there, and what are the rights incidental to that tenure. The antiquity and the operation of the Stannary Laws, both generally and also in relation to tin-bounds, are considered, and the authorities are collected, in the report of Vice v. Thomas, published by Mr. Smirke, vice-warden of the Stannaries in 1843. These being the facts relating to the streams, the question remains whether the plaintiff, by turning that stream from the brook over the upper launder into the leat leading to his works, and enjoying the use thereof without interruption for more than twenty years, acquired a right thereto under the Prescription Act? Although the jury have found that he did this as of right, that must be taken to be a finding of the fact of the enjoyment, subject to the point reserved for the defendant, whether such enjoyment of a stream of this character could be by law "as of right" within the meaning of the Prescription Act? And we are of opinion that the plaintiff acquired no right to this stream by this user thereof for twenty years, because the stream was an artificial stream made to flow over the defendant's land by the operations of miners, and the miners had not permanently abandoned their right of control over the water in the stream when the plaintiff diverted it by the upper launder to his works. Rights and liabilities in respect of artificial streams when first flowing on the surface are entirely distinct from rights and liabilities in respect of natural streams so flowing. The water in an artificial stream flowing in the land of the party by whom it is caused to flow is the property of that party, and is not subject to any rights or liabilities in respect of other persons. If the stream so brought to the surface is made to flow upon the land of a neighbour without his consent, it is a wrong for which the party causing it so to flow is liable. If there is a grant by the neighbour, the terms of the grant regulate the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto. If there is uninterrupted user of the land of the neighbour for receiving the flow as of right for twenty years, such user is evidence that the land from which the water is sent into the neighbour's land has become the dominant tenement, having a right to the easement of so sending the water, and that the neighbour's land has become subject to the easement of receiving that water. But such user of the easement of sending on the water of an artificial stream is of itself alone no evidence that the land from which the water is sent has become subject to the servitude of being bound to send on the water to the land of the neighbour below. The enjoyment of the easement is of itself no evidence that the party enjoying it has become subject to the servitude of being bound to exercise the easement for the benefit of the neighbour. A right of way is no evidence that the party entitled thereto is under a duty to walk, nor a right to eaves-dropping on the neighbour's land that the party is bound to send on his rain-water to that land. In like manner, we consider that a party, by the mere exercise of a right to make an artificial drain into his neighbour's land, either from mine or surface, does not raise any presumption that he is subject to any duty to continue his artificial drain by twenty years' user. Although there may be additional circumstances by which that presumption would be raised or the right proved, if it be proved that the stream was originally intended to have a permanent flow, or if the party by whom or in whose behalf the artificial stream was caused to flow is shewn to have abandoned permanently, without intention to resume the works by which the flow was caused, and given up all right to and control over the stream, such stream may become subject to the laws relating to natural streams. But the facts here do not raise either of those points. The law relating to natural streams is entirely different. The flow of a natural stream creates mutual rights and liabilities between all the riparian proprietors along the whole of its course. Subject to reasonable use by himself, each proprietor is bound to allow the water to flow on without altering the quantity or quality. These mutual rights and liabilities may be altered by grant, or by user of an easement to alter the stream, as by diverting, or fouling, or penning back, or the like. If the stream flows at its source by the operation of nature, that is, if it is a natural stream, the rights and liabilities of the party owning the land at its source are the same as those of the proprietors in the course below. If the stream flows at its source by the operation of man, that is, if it is an artificial stream, the owner of the land at its source, on the commencement of the flow, is not subject to any rights or liabilities towards any other person in respect of the water of that stream. The owner of such land may make himself liable to duties in respect of such water by grant or contract; but the party claiming a right to compel performance of those duties must give evidence of such right, beyond the mere suffering by him of the servitude of receiving such water. The rights of the plaintiff in respect of the two launders exemplify this distinction. For the lower launder the plaintiff had made a water-course on the defendant's land, and collected the water of natural springs therein, and brought it to this launder. For the upper launder the plaintiff had gone to the edge of the defendant's land, and received there into the launder the water of the tie, where it would have flowed into the natural stream and become part thereof. In respect of the lower launder, there was dominant actio and servient patientia for twenty years, and so there was good evidence of an easement for the plaintiff, the dominant tenant. In respect of the upper launder, there was no dominant actio by the plaintiff, nor servient patientia by the defendant, on the defendant's land in respect of the stream while on that land; and so there was no presumption of a grant by the defendant, no evidence of a right in the plaintiff. For the law relating to natural streams on the surface, we refer to Mason v. Hill (15); for the law relating to subterranean water, to Chasemore v. Richards (16); for the law relating to artificial streams we refer to Arkwright v. Gell (9), Magor v. Chadwick (13) and Wood v. Waud (11). And for a clear exposition of the whole law on this class of easements and servitudes, we refer to Gale on Easements, 262, 3rd edit. In Arkwright v. Gell (9) the law relating to artificial streams is expounded with clearness and vigour. The important and extensive rights and interests connected with mining are protected in their relation to the rights of surface owners. In that case the question arose between the surface owner and the mining owner; and it was held that the mining owner who had brought the water to the surface on the plaintiff's land for draining a mine might divert it when deeper draining was required, and all the mines of the district that might be unwatered by the drain were properly treated as one interest. In Magor v. Chadwick (13) no law is expounded, but doubts upon the law are created by dissent from some governing propositions laid down in Arkwright v. Gell (9). The Judge at the trial had not recognized any distinction between natural and artificial streams; and the Court refused a new trial for misdirection, on the ground that the blame of any miscarriage, if miscarriage there was, ought to be laid on the counsel who argued at the trial. The result of that case would have been pernicious to all miners and all proprietors improving land by draining; but it was followed by Wood v. Waud (11), in which the propositions laid down in Arkwright v. Gell (9), relating to the difference between artificial and natural streams, are re-affirmed. In this case the question arose between two proprietors of the surface, over whose land the artificial stream flowed, in its way to the natural stream; and it was held, that as between them the law relating to natural streams did not govern. This case was followed by Greatrex v. Hayward (10), in which it was decided that a drain on the surface made for the purpose of draining the land of the maker thereof is an artificial stream, and is not subject to the law relating to natural streams, and might be diverted after twenty years' flow into the plaintiff's land, for the purpose of improving the drainage of the defendant's land. These cases have been followed by others collected in the treatise above mentioned; and we consider that the distinction between natural and artificial streams is established in our law, and that the flow from the upper launder was not such an artificial stream that an easement could be acquired therein by twenty years' user. For these reasons, we consider that the plaintiff's case as to the upper launder failed, and that the rule for entering the verdict on the count relating thereto for the defendant must be made absolute.

The plaintiff's rule discharged; the defendant's rule made absolute to enter the verdict for the defendant on the count in the declaration relating to the upper launder, and discharged as to the remainder.

May 26. } M'CALL v. TAYLOR.

Bill of Exchange — Promissory Note, Requisites of—Inchoate Instrument.

An instrument in the form of a bill of exchange, addressed to and accepted by the defendant, but without the names of either a payee or drawer, is neither a bill of exchange nor a promissory note, but only an inchoate instrument.

The first count was against the defendant, as the acceptor of a bill of exchange for 300*l.* The second count was on the same instrument as a promissory note, of which the defendant was alleged to be the maker. There were counts also for goods sold and delivered and on accounts stated.

Pleas, to the first count—A traverse of the acceptance; to the second count, a traverse of the making; and to the residue of the declaration, never indebted.

At the trial, before Byles, J., at the London Sittings after Hilary Term last, it appeared that the instrument declared on in the first and second counts was in the following form:
“£300.

“Four months after date, pay to my order the sum of three hundred pounds for value received.

“To Captain Taylor,

There was no date to this instrument, nor the signature of any drawer; but there was written across it by the defendant these words, “Accepted, William Taylor.”

This instrument was given to the plaintiff by one Milne, the broker of the ship Jasper, on account of goods supplied to such ship by the plaintiff. The defendant was the captain of the Jasper; but the jury found that the goods had not been supplied on his credit, and that there was no debt due from the defendant.

The learned Judge was of opinion that the instrument could not be declared on either as a bill of exchange or promissory note, and a verdict was accordingly entered for the defendant; but leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict on either the first or second counts, if the instrument could be declared on as either a bill or note.

A rule nisi to that effect having been subsequently obtained by Hannen, for the plaintiff,—

Day now shewed cause.—The instrument is neither a promissory note nor bill of exchange. It contains no promise by the defendant to pay any one, and it wants a drawer and payee to make it a bill of exchange; it is altogether an incomplete and imperfect instrument, and the case is not distinguishable from that of Stoessiger v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (1). There one Cruttenden, being indebted to a Mr. Gould in more than 10*l.*, framed a document directed to himself, ordering himself three months after date to “pay to my order” the amount. The document had the stamp proper for a bill of exchange of that amount, and was in all respects like a bill of exchange, except that there was no drawer’s name. Cruttenden wrote on it his acceptance, and caused it to be forwarded in a parcel directed to Gould, by a common carrier, in order that Gould might add his name as drawer. On an action against the carrier for the loss, the Court of Queen’s Bench held that it was not a bill, order, note or security for money, within the meaning of the Carriers’ Act, 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68. s. 1.

Hannen and Lord, in support of the rule.—The document may be treated as a promissory note. The case of Cruckley v. Clarence (2) shews that where a bill of exchange is issued in blank for the name of the payee, a bond fide holder may insert his own name as the payee, and the drawer will be liable. In Miller v. Thompson (3), an instrument in the form of a bill of exchange drawn upon a joint-stock bank by the manager of one of its branch banks, by the order of the directors, was held to be properly declared upon as a promissory note. In Fielder v. Marshall (4) the instrument, which was in the form of a bill of exchange, was drawn by one A. Langstaff, and accepted by the defendant for a debt due from Langstaff to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's name was in the body of the instrument as payee, and in the corner at the foot of it the plaintiff's name and address were written; but the Court considered the instrument as not addressed to any one, and treated it as a promissory note. The case of Peto v. Reynolds (5) also furnishes an example of an instrument which was not good as a bill of exchange for want of a drawee, being considered good as a promissory note.

The case of Armfield v. Allport (6) strongly resembles the present case. There it was held that an instrument drawn in the form of a bill of exchange, payable to bearer, even if accepted in blank, and afterwards filled up by the drawer, may be declared upon by the indorsee as a promissory note made by the drawer and indorsed by the drawee.

[WILLES, J.—That case would seem to have been an application of the doctrine in Penny v. Innes (7), that a person who puts his name on the back of a bill may be treated as a new drawer; but that doctrine is inapplicable to notes by reason of the Stamp Act.]

That case of Armfield v. Allport (6) is certainly rather obscure; but the Court there seemed to have considered that they were justified in treating the instrument as a promissory note. Where a payee is a fictitious person, the bill may be declared on as payable to bearer—Byles on Bills, 8th edit. 73; Minet v. Gibson (8).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The declaration is on a bill of exchange, and also on the same instrument described as a promissory note. The instrument in question was in this form—[The learned Judge read it].—It has no date and no drawer's name; but the defendant wrote his acceptance across it; and the question is, has the holder of such an instrument a right to declare on it either as a bill of exchange or promissory note? It certainly is not a bill of exchange, nor is it a promissory note; and there has been no case cited as an authority for its being considered as either a bill or a note. It is, in fact, only an inchoate instrument, though capable of being completed. Let the party who has the authority to make it a complete instrument do so; but if he will not do this, he cannot sue on it. The case of Stoessiger v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (1) is directly in point. In the other cases which have been referred to, where effect was given to the instrument, nothing more had to be done to make the instrument complete; and so those cases are distinguishable from the present. The captain may possibly have given his acceptance for the necessaries supplied to the ship, and the plaintiff may have had authority to put his name as drawer; but that should have been shewn by his doing so. As it is, he seeks to sue on it without putting his name to it as drawer; and it may be that the reason is, because he never had authority to insert a drawer's name. It is, however, sufficient for us to say that the instrument is inchoate and imperfect; and therefore there is no ground for making this rule absolute.

WILLES, J., BYLES, J. and SMITH, J. concurred.

Rule discharged.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c.18. s. 68.)—Compensation for Injury to Right of Shooting—Equitable Interest.

A party who has a right of shooting over land by an agreement, not under seal, with the owner, has not such an interest as to entitle him to compensation from a railway company under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in respect of the shooting being diminished in value by the company constructing a railway over part of such land.

This is a SPECIAL CASE, stated for the opinion of the Court, without pleadings, pursuant to the order of Byles, J., dated the 20th of January 1865. The action was brought under the 68th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The plaintiff, claiming to be entitled to compensation under the circumstances hereinafter stated, gave the company a notice under that section, requiring the defendants to issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury. The defendants disputing the plaintiff's title to any such compensation, did not issue their warrant within the twenty-one days, and thereupon the action was brought for the amount of compensation specified in the notice. The real point in dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants, not being as to the amount of compensation, but as to the plaintiff's title to any compensation at all, it has been agreed between them that in the event of the point being decided in the plaintiff's favour, he shall waive the right to the particular sum claimed in his notice, and that the amount of compensation shall be ascertained in the mode prescribed by the said order. The opinion of the Court upon the real points in dispute is, therefore, respectfully requested on the following special case: The Eastern Counties Railway Company were, by the Eastern Counties Railway Act, 1861, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, authorized to make a railway, being (No. 4.) in section 7. of that act. By the Great Eastern Railway Act, 1862, the Eastern Counties Railway Company has been amalgamated with other companies, and has become the Great Eastern Railway Company (the defendants), on which latter company it is to be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that all the rights and liabilities of the former company have devolved.

John Elton Hervey Elwes being seised in fee of all the lands and hereditaments hereinafter mentioned, a document in writing, not under seal, was, on the 3rd of March 1862, signed by him and the plaintiff, of which the following is a copy:

"Memorandum of agreement made this 3rd day of March 1862, between John Elton Hervey Elwes, of Furze Hill, Brighton, in the county of Sussex, esquire, hereinafter called landlord, of the one part, and Robert Wilberforce Bird, of Green End House, Ware, in the county of Hertford, hereinafter called the tenant, of the other part, whereby the said landlord agrees to let all that mansion-house known as Stoke College, in the county of Suffolk, with the offices, buildings, coach-house and stables, lawn, pleasure-ground and garden, and 18 acres of meadow land or grass land thereto attached, be the same more or less, as late in the occupation of William Waling Winch, esquire, together with the fixtures, furniture, china, glass and effects, as more particularly described in an inventory to be made or signed by or for either of the said parties, on or before taking possession, *together with the sole right of shooting and fishing over the whole estate of Stoke College and the lands belonging to the said landlord, the same consisting of 3,000 acres, more or less, from the 25th day of March instant, for the full space or period of three years, at and for the clear yearly rental or sum of 275*l., payable half-yearly, on the 25th day of March and the 29th day of September, the first of such half-yearly payments to become due and to be made on the 29th day of September next. And the said tenant agrees to take the house on the terms aforesaid, and to pay the rent as the same shall become due, to use the said premises solely as a private residence, and not underlet or part with possession of the same without the consent in writing of the said landlord for that purpose first had and obtained, and not to remove or suffer to be removed therefrom, under any pretence whatever, the whole or any part of the said furniture and effects, to keep, and at the expiration of the said tenancy to quit and deliver up possession of the said residence, premises and furniture as per inventory aforesaid, in as good order, state and condition as the same now are, fair wear and tear and accidental damage by fire in the mean time excepted; and in the event of any loss, damage, or breakage other than hereinbefore provided for, to make good the same, or allow a fair compensation; the amount thereof, if in dispute, to be settled by two valuers or their umpire in the usual manner, and should either party neglect or fail to appoint a valuer within seven days after notice given by the other party, or should such valuer, when appointed, neglect or refuse to act within the time appointed, or object to the appointment of an umpire, then the valuer already appointed may proceed alone, and his decision shall be final and binding on all parties. The said tenant further agrees, at his own expense, to keep and leave the said gardens properly stocked and cropped according to the season of the year, and to keep the roofs and gutters of the premises clear from leaves and snow; not to alter the present arrangement of the garden-grounds, lawns or shrubberies, nor without the consent in writing of the said landlord to lop, cut, or remove any timber or timber-like trees, shrubs or fences, which may be growing or standing on the said premises, except the necessary pruning in garden arrangements; not to mow any of the grass land twice in any one year; to keep down the rabbits on the estate so as to prevent their becoming so numerous as to be a nuisance to or cause of fair complaint from the tenants of the farms, or failing this, after due notice from the landlord to allow the said landlord, his servants or keepers, to enter in and upon the said lands, and to kill and destroy the said rabbits. The said landlord agrees to keep the said mansion-house and premises, and the water-pipes and pumps in good and substantial repair, and to pay and discharge all rates, taxes, tithes, and other charges payable in respect of the said premises, during the said tenancy. It is hereby further agreed, that the said tenant shall have the option of giving six months' notice, viz., on or before the 29th day of September 1864, in writing, to the said landlord, prior to the expiration of the tenancy hereby granted, renewing the said tenancy for a further period of two years upon the terms and conditions of the present agreement; and should he exercise such option, he shall have a further power of extending the tenancy on the terms aforesaid for a second period of two years, making seven years in all, by giving notice to the said landlord, in writing, on or before the 29th day of September 1866; and should the said tenant during the said tenancy decorate, or cause to be decorated and painted the ball-room on the said premises, the said landlord agrees to allow the sum of 25*l.* from the half-year's rent during which such decorations are effected, provided the said tenant should produce vouchers and receipts to prove that a sum of not less than 25*l.* has been expended in such decorations and paintings. Provided always, that in case the said rent or any part thereof shall remain due or unpaid for the space of twenty-one days after the day upon which it shall have become due, or if the said tenant shall commit a breach of the conditions of this agreement, then and in such case it shall and may be lawful for the said landlord, or his duly authorized agent, to re-enter and take possession of the said premises, and thereout to remove the said tenant or any other person or persons therein, without the necessity of bringing an ejectment, or taking any legal or equitable proceedings for the recovery thereof. Lastly, it is mutually agreed that the charge for two fair copies of this agreement shall be paid by the said landlord and the said tenant, in equal moieties of 2*s.* each. The defendants being empowered by the before-mentioned acts, for the purpose of constructing the said railway, to purchase and take the land which they are herein stated to have purchased, gave to the said John Elton Hervey Elwes a notice under the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, stating therein that they required to purchase and take the said land, and demanded from the said John Elton Hervey Elwes the particulars of his estate and interest therein, and of the claims made by him in respect thereof; and the said notice stated the particulars of the land so required, and that the defendants were willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to compensation to be made by all parties for the damage that might be sustained by reason of the execution of the works. In pursuance of that notice, and by virtue of the powers of their acts of parliament, the defendants purchased of the said John Elton Hervey Elwes part of the land over which the document before set forth purported to agree to let to the plaintiff such right of shooting as aforesaid; and the said purchased land was conveyed to the defendants in fee by the said John Elton Hervey Elwes, and the defendants constructed part of the said railway thereon. The said part of the said railway is on the whole about 2 m. 1 f. 83 y. long, and contains in area 23 a. 2 r. 13½ p., and it intersects the land over which it was agreed as aforesaid that the plaintiff should have the said right of shooting so as to leave a considerable part of the said land on each side of the said railway. It is admitted that the shooting on that part of the said land which was not purchased as aforesaid was and is, in fact, prejudiced and diminished in value by the construction of the said part of the said railway. It is also admitted that the shooting on the said purchased land is, in fact, prejudiced and diminished in value by the construction of the said part of the said railway. From the time of making the said agreement with the plaintiff to the time of conveyance to the defendants, the said John Elton Hervey Elwes continued to be seised in fee of all the lands and hereditaments mentioned in the said agreement, and from the time of the conveyance to the said defendants hitherto, he has continued so seised thereof, except the part so conveyed. If the plaintiff ever was or is entitled in equity to a legal grant of the right of shooting referred to in the said document, nothing, except so far, if at all, as herein appears, has occurred to destroy his right to such grant. It is not admitted by the defendants that the plaintiff was interested in lands, or that the damage and diminution of value herein stated is an injurious affecting within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. These are questions on which the parties differ, and are matters for the consideration of the Court. The Court is to have the power of drawing such conclusions of fact as they think that a jury ought to draw.

The question for the Court is, whether, under the circumstances herein stated, the plaintiff is entitled to any compensation, and if to any, in respect of what he is so entitled.

Mellish (Mayd with him) for the plaintiff.—The question is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18)? and that raises the questions, first, whether a right of shooting is such a right, in the nature of a profit à prendre, as to entitle the landowner to receive compensation in respect of it; secondly, whether the person to whom the landowner has granted that right can claim such compensation; and, thirdly, whether it makes any difference to such person's title to compensation that the agreement giving him the right to shoot is not under seal.

Now, as to the first of these questions, it is clear that if the railway went over the land, the landowner would be entitled to compensation in respect of the injury to his shooting, as part of the value of the land. Then, if he has parted with the right of shooting, surely the person to whom he has so parted with it would be entitled to such compensation. The mere fact of its being an incorporeal hereditament would not prevent its being such an interest in land within the meaning of section 68. of the act for which compensation may be claimed. Then is it not injuriously affected by the execution of the defendants' works?

[WILLES, J.—The difficulty is this: must not the person who has granted the right of shooting, and who is trustee for the plaintiff, be the person who is to convey to the railway company? Surely the company have only to deal with the legal ownership of the land.]

Section 7. of the statute, which empowers trustees to sell and convey, is applicable only to express trusts, and not to such a case as this, which is that of an implied trust.

[WILLES, J.—If there be no trust, the plaintiff has no equitable interest.]

A Court of equity, considering that to be done which has been agreed to be done, would consider that the plaintiff in this case had got the grant—Moreland v. Richardson (1). Then assuming, therefore, that the plaintiff had a right to shoot by a grant under seal, the case of Wickham v. Hawker (2) shews that it would give the plaintiff an interest in land, for that case decides that the grant to a person, his heirs and assigns, of "free liberty, with servants or otherwise, to come into and upon lands, and there to hawk, fish and fowl," is a grant of a licence of profit and not of a mere personal licence of pleasure, and that such a liberty is therefore a profit à prendre within the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 2. The right was intended, here, to be appurtenant to land, for by the agreement there is a demise of the land with the right of shooting over other lands. Section 109. of the statute, and the following sections, to section 114, deal with the cases of compensation with respect to rights of common and mortgages, and they shew that the company have to deal with mortgagors as well as mortgagees; and by the interpretation clause (sect. 3.) the word "lands" is to extend to "hereditaments of any tenure." In Sweetman v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (3), Wood, V.C. held, that a written agreement, void at law, but equivalent in equity to a lease, was an interest greater than a yearly tenancy within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

Bidder, contra.—It is submitted, in the first place, that what the plaintiff claims to be entitled to under the agreement is not an interest in land within the meaning of section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; secondly, that it has not been injuriously affected by the defendants' works; and, thirdly, the plaintiff's claim being derived under a parol agreement, it gives him no right which will entitle him to compensation. It is submitted that what was given to the plaintiff by the agreement was a mere licence to pass over the land, and assuming such a grant to amount to a profit à prendre, it is still not such an interest in land as would come within section 68. of the statute. The definition of "lands," given by the 3rd section, is "lands, tenements and hereditaments of any tenure," but "piscary does not lie in tenure, for the soil may be to one and the piscary to another, and then the lord cannot distrain"—20 Vin. Abr. tit. 'Tenure,' B. Such a right as that of shooting, which the plaintiff claims, was certainly not a right which the legislature contemplated under this act as a right to be dealt with. The case of King v. the Commissioners of the Nene Outfall (4) was a decision on a statute which for settling differences between certain Commissioners authorized to acquire land for improving a navigation, and the several persons interested in any lands, tenements or hereditaments which should or might be taken or affected or prejudiced for any of the purposes of the act, provided a mode of assessing compensation to such persons, and in that case it was held that the Commissioners having taken, for the purpose of the navigation, tithable land, the tithe-owner was not entitled to compensation. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act having expressly provided for such cases as commonable rights, the inference to be drawn from the absence of any express provision respecting such a right as that of shooting is that the legislature did not intend to make it the subject of compensation. Secondly, the plaintiff's interest was not injuriously affected. The cases of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (5), In re Penny and the South-Eastern Railway Company (6) and The New River Company v. Johnson (7) shew that where no action would have lain, independently of the act under which the works were done, there is no right to compensation. Suppose the owner of the estate who had granted this privilege to the plaintiff had made a road or railway across his land, would he have been liable to an action at the suit of the plaintiff for doing so? Would it be more than a reasonable use of the surface of the land? The only cases in which an action has been maintained for an invasion of such a right as this have been those in which the invasion has been by a trespass, as in Alderman de Londres v. Hastings (8). The authorities are to be found collected in Holford v. Bailey (9). Thirdly, as the plaintiff had no legal grant he was not entitled to compensation. The contract was a mere licence to the plaintiff; there cannot be a demise of an incorporeal hereditament except by deed—Bird v. Higginson (10).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants. The question raised is upon the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and it is whether the plaintiff can shew that he is a person entitled to compensation in respect of any lands, or any interest therein, injuriously affected by the execution of the defendants' works. It appears that the plaintiff had taken, for a term, a mansion-house, and certain lands adjoining (as to which we are not now dealing, because they were not injuriously affected by the defendants' works), and, with these, the right of shooting and fishing over other lands of the same landlord. The defendants have taken a portion of these last-mentioned lands for their railway, and the plaintiff says that his right of shooting has been interrupted and injuriously affected by the railway. Now the right which the plaintiff has is a mere licence, by an instrument not under seal. The plaintiff's right lies only in agreement, and he has no land, or interest in any land which has been taken by the defendants. The argument on the part of the plaintiff is that he has a right, in respect of this agreement with Elwes, to maintain a suit in equity, and have it made into an instrument under seal. Whatever may be the right of the plaintiff as between him and Elwes, as to which I do not pretend to give any opinion, the right in equity is a right only between the parties to the contract. That distinction was taken by Lord Cottenham, in Tasker v. Small (11). "It was argued at the bar," says his Lordship, "that the plaintiff was in equity invested with all the rights of Mrs. Small, upon the principle that by a contract of purchase the purchaser becomes in equity the owner of the property. This rule applies only as between the parties to the contract, and cannot be extended so as to affect the interests of others. If it could, a contract for the purchase of an equitable estate would be equivalent to a conveyance of it. Before the contract is carried into effect, the purchaser cannot, against a stranger to the contract, enforce equities attaching to the property." Therefore, I say, whatever may be the rights between the plaintiff and Elwes, the defendants are strangers thereto; they have settled as to compensation with the party who was the owner of the land, and have taken such land with all the rights and incidents belonging to it, whether on the surface or in the air. That is the ground on which I rest my judgment, and it is sufficient to support it in the present case. But even if the plaintiff had a grant under seal, I think Mr. Bidder's argument strongly shews that it would not be such a right as would be available for compensation. The plaintiff takes the right of shooting, but there is no contract by Elwes to keep up the quantity of birds. It is true that if Elwes interfered with the right which he had granted an action would lie against him, but it is unnecessary now to discuss that question.

WILLES, J.—I, also, am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendants. It appears that the plaintiff contracted with the owner of the soil for the exclusive right of shooting and fishing on the land, and I assume that he did so by an effectual contract. Then, in what relation does a person who is so entitled stand with regard to the owner of the land? The latter is under no engagement that he, the owner, is not to enjoy the land in the ordinary way. Cases which have arisen on the subject of the right of sporting are to be found in the books. Mr. Bidder, in his able argument, referred to several of them; but I have, in my mind, gone back to the time of the forest laws, and to the cases to be found in Com. Dig. tit. 'Chase,' (K.) No doubt certain rights existed in all these cases, but I apprehend that the books are entirely silent on the subject of a person, who has merely the grant of a right of sporting over land, having, as an incident thereto the right to restrain the ordinary and reasonable enjoyment of the soil by the owner thereof, always supposing that the latter does nothing for the purpose of effecting the destruction of the game. I am at a loss to see how a railroad across the land can, more than an ordinary road, affect the right of shooting, or how the damage produced by it is necessarily an injury which would give a right of action. I am far from saying that it may not do what the law would call an injury, but not to a person who has merely a grant of the right of shooting without a covenant by the owner of the land, express or implied, not to do anything which would interfere with the exercise of such right. Assuming, therefore, that the difficulty suggested by my Lord did not exist, it does not follow that the plaintiff would be entitled to compensation.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I rest my judgment on the meaning of the words "any interest in any lands" in the 68th section of the act. Is, then, this right of shooting, which the plaintiff has, an interest in land? In the first place, the plaintiff has, by virtue of such right, no estate in the land, and I cannot see that he has any interest in the land at law; but it is said that he can, by going into equity, perfect his title. I am not sure that he can do so in such a matter as this, but I own to being incompetent to give an opinion on that point. It, however, lies on the plaintiff to shew that he could do so, before he can make out that he is entitled to compensation either at law or in equity. If we were to decide in favour of the plaintiff in this case, the same right to compensation might be claimed by three or more licensees. The more convenient course for us is, to say that he must shew an interest consistent with the words of the statute in order to entitle him to a remedy under that act, without our saying whether he can claim compensation by any other mode.

Section 135. of the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120.) authorizes the Metropolitan Board of Works to repair and maintain certain sewers, with full power to carry such sewers through or under any lands, "making compensation for any damage done thereby," and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is incorporated with such act. In exercise of the powers conferred on them by their act, and for the purpose of enabling them to reconstruct a sewer running under a street, the board erected a hoarding in such street, which rendered the access to the plaintiff's premises less convenient than it had been before; but no part of such premises was taken, nor did it appear that the hoarding was kept up beyond a reasonable time :—Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation under the statute for the damage he had sustained by the erection of such hoarding.

Poor-Rate—Rateable Occupation—Beneficial Occupation—Exemption on Ground of Public Purposes—Trustees of Public Works, &c., Crown Property—43 Eliz. c. 2.—6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96.

The occupation of property which is liable to be rated under the 1st section of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. is an occupation yielding or capable of yielding a net annual value, that is to say, a clear rent over and above the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the property in a state to command such rent, and it is not necessary that the occupation should be beneficial to the occupier, so that trustees, who are, in law, the tenants and occupiers of valuable property upon trust for charitable purposes, such as hospitals or lunatic asylums, are rateable, notwithstanding that the buildings are actually occupied by paupers who are sick or insane.

The only occupiers exempt from the operation of the act are the Sovereign, because he is not named in the statute, and the direct and immediate servants of the Crown, whose occupation is the occupation of the Crown itself; and the only ground of exemption from the statute is that which is furnished by the above rule. And, consequently, when property yielding a rent above what is required for its maintenance is sought to be exempted on the ground that it is occupied by bare trustees for public purposes, the public purposes must be such as are required and created by the Government of the country, and are, therefore, to be deemed part of the use and service of the country.

Interest by Statute—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42.

A letter of application for a loan until a day named therein, which does not shew an obligation to pay on the face of it, is not "an instrument by virtue of which the debt is payable at a certain time," within the meaning of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 28.

This was an action brought to recover 10*l.* for money lent, and 4*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* for interest, tried, without a jury, in the Leeds County Court. The Judge gave a verdict for the plaintiff on the interest count only for 2*l.* 5*s.*, not being satisfied that the plaintiff had lent the defendant more money than the latter had, including 1*l.* paid into court, repaid to the plaintiff.

To entitle himself to interest, the plaintiff produced the following letter in the defendant's handwriting :

"Sept. 19, 1854.

"Dear Sir,—Could you do me the favour to lend me 10*l.* until Monday the 2nd of

NEW SERIES, 34.—EXCHEQ.

October? I am afraid I shall never be out of your debt for the favours you have done me.—I am yours truly,

"Wm. Holt."

It was admitted by the plaintiff that he had previously lent the defendant various sums of money of 5*l.* and under, but not to the amount of the loan in question, which various sums had been shortly afterwards repaid to him by the defendant without interest, and that the plaintiff had neither asked nor expected interest on these loans, being on terms of intimacy with the defendant. It was also admitted by the plaintiff that neither at the time of the loan in question nor at any subsequent time until the commencement of this action, had he given the defendant either verbal or written notice of his claiming interest on the loan in question. It was also proved that the defendant paid 5*l.* on account in 1854, and that he subsequently revived the debt by payment of 4*l.* on account of the balance, which he admitted to be due. The letter set out above was admitted by the defendant, but his counsel contended that it was not an "instrument" within the 3 & 4

Will 4. c. 42. s. 28 (1), entitling the plaintiff to recover interest.

The Judge gave the plaintiff a verdict for the interest which he considered due, giving the defendant leave to move to set the verdict aside if this Court should think that the letter was not an instrument within the meaning of the act (2).

Quain having obtained a rule to set aside the verdict or for a nonsuit, on the ground that the letter of the 19th of September was not an "instrument" within the meaning of 3 & 4 Will 4. c. 42. s. 28,—

Thrupp now shewed cause.—The words in this statute, "by virtue of some written instrument," &c., refer to the words in the commencement of the section, and it is only necessary that there should be some writing in order to evidence that the money was payable at a time certain. The legislature in passing the statute had in view the words of Lord Tenterden, C.J., in Page v. Newman (3), who said that the then rule was that interest was not due on money secured by a written instrument unless it appeared on the face of the instrument that interest was intended to be paid, &c. This money was sent in reply to the letter, and must be taken to have been lent on the terms of the letter. The plaintiff could not have sued for it before the 2nd of October.

Quain, contra.—The letter was not an instrument by virtue of which the money was payable, and Page v. Newman (3) and Higgins v. Sargent (4) shew that the intention of the statute was to put other instruments, on which it is usual to declare, upon the same footing, with regard to interest, as promissory notes, &c. were before the act.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The language of the statute is "the jury may, if they shall think fit, allow interest . . . if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time." Now I do not think that this debt was payable on the 2nd of October 1854 by virtue of the letter; it was payable at that time by virtue of the letter, and of what took place afterwards. And if a question arose whether, coupling the two together, interest was due, I should say certainly not. The parties have very properly put in the case a statement of fact (2), which is in substance this: that they were in the habit of applying the one to the other for a loan, and obtaining it for a short time, and of repaying it without interest. It was admitted by the plaintiff that neither at the time of the loan in question nor at any subsequent time until the commencement of the action did he give the defendant a written notice or claim interest on the loan in question, and it is plain that neither one party nor the other ever contemplated or dreamt of interest.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the statute, where it speaks of money payable by virtue of a written instrument, means a written instrument which sets forth an obligation to pay at a certain time. This does not do so; because, though it is an application for a loan till a certain day, the plaintiff might have said, "I cannot lend it on those terms; I prefer lending it for a longer period." Then the obligation would not depend on the written instrument, but on the words and what else took place. No doubt, though the plaintiff simply lends the money for a time, he must be taken to lend it on the terms asked for; but that does not make the instrument what it was not originally: it would still be a mere engagement on the part of the defendant to return the loan, but not with interest. One way of testing the question is to see whether a stamp would be required; if it would not, it must be because the letter is not an agreement

(1) This section enacts, "that upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time or otherwise, the jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquiry of damages, may, if they shall think fit, allow interest to the creditor, at a rate not exceeding the current rate of interest, from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable, if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time, or if payable otherwise, then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing, so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the time of payment: provided that interest shall be payable in all cases in which it is now payable at law."

(2) The county court Judge not having furnished the Court with any notes of the trial, this statement of the facts, which was agreed to by the parties and certified by the Judge, was accepted by the Court in lieu of the Judge's notes.

(3) 9 B. & C. 378, 381, before the statute.

(4) 2 Ibid. 848.

upon the face of it. Another way is to suppose the defendant had given evidence to shew the money was not lent upon the terms of this instrument, but a week earlier or a week later; he would then have shewn that this instrument was never a binding one between the parties, because in truth it is not a thing which purports to shew an obligation to pay upon the face of it.

CHANNELL, B.—I also think that in this case a nonsuit ought to be entered. Looking at the document put in, the plaintiff could not have succeeded upon it alone in obtaining a verdict against the defendant. The request is to lend money; it was the plaintiff's compliance with the request that created the cause of action.

FIGOTT, B.—As the plaintiff lent the money until the 2nd of October, and the letter fixed the day on which the money was repayable, I was at first disposed to think the letter was an "instrument" sufficiently within the meaning of the statute to carry interest if the money was kept beyond that day. In the result, however, I agree with the rest of the Court that a nonsuit should be entered.

Rule absolute for a nonsuit.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 192, 197, 198.—Arrest of Debtor after executing Deed—Discharge on Registration of Deed.

A debtor, arrested on a ca. sa., after executing a good deed of arrangement under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is, according to section 198, entitled to his discharge from custody on the deed being duly registered.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 21l. 2s. upon a bill of exchange accepted by the defendant.

Judgment was signed on the 6th of October 1864, and on the same day the defendant executed a deed of arrangement with his creditors. On the 17th of October a writ of ca. sa. was issued, and the defendant was arrested on the 18th. Notice was received by the plaintiff's attorney on the 31st of October that the deed of assignment had been duly registered pursuant to the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

Section 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, enacts that from and after the registration of every such deed the debtor and creditors, &c. shall in all matters relating to the estate and effects of the debtor be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy; and section 198. enacts that "after notice of the filing and registration of such deed has been given as aforesaid (referring to the advertisement in the Gazette) no process against the debtor's person (other than such as may be had against a debtor about to leave England) shall be available to any creditor without leave of the Court; and the certificate of the filing and registration shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy."

A summons was taken out at chambers, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of the custody of the sheriff, on the ground that the deed executed on the 6th of October before the arrest, had been since duly registered pursuant to the 192nd section, and that the same was valid and binding on the plaintiff as one of the creditors. The summons was heard before Martin, B., who made no order, but gave the defendant leave to apply to the Court.

Grantham having obtained a rule,—

Philbrick (Nov. 7) shewed cause—As the execution could not have issued if the deed had been registered before the writ, so, on the other hand, the defendant cannot now get out of custody, unless there is a statute discharging him—Ex parte Chaundy (1), per Holroyd, Comm., and Edwards v. Scarbrook (2). Protection in bankruptcy is a creation of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, section 112, and to the Court of Bankruptcy, therefore, the prisoner should apply—Ex parte Windsor (3). It is entirely a question for the discretion of the Commissioner. "From and after the registration" are the important words of the 197th section, and this deed was not registered when the arrest took place; "available" in the 198th section means available for the purposes of arrest, not of detention.

Grantham, contra.—Both the 197th and the 198th sections are in the defendant's favour, and the remarks in Ex parte Chaundy (1) apply to an execution issuing before the deed was executed, the gist of the deed being its own validity and execution, not its registration—Ilderton v. Jewell (4). The law allows twenty-eight days for registration, therefore there could be no laches within that period. Where the bulk of the creditors have determined for an arrangement, and a deed has been executed, such proceedings as these are a fraud on the law. The registration is merely an advertisement of the deed, and dates back to the time of its execution. In Ex parte Brooks (5) Lord Westbury said, that the Court of Bankruptcy ought not to aid the creditor in a case like this. The plaintiff has proved his debt, and has no right to be heard here in opposition to the defendant's release—Re Eaton (6). Process is not the mere issuing of the writ, but the doing everything necessary to carry out the object of the writ; therefore detention is part of the process.

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case the defendant was arrested on a ca. sa. after he had executed a creditors' deed; and then, after he had been so arrested, and while he was in custody, the deed was registered. It was not disputed that, had the deed been registered as well as executed, the writ could not have issued. It was conceded that the deed was a good deed, and that everything had occurred to make it available to protect him from arrest, if it had been executed and registered before the issue of the writ. The 198th section of the act says that, "after notice of the filing and registration of such deed, no process against the debtor's person in respect of any debt shall be available to any creditor or claimant without leave of the Court, and that a certificate of the filing and registration shall be available for the debtor's protection." Now, if this defendant is detained in custody, process will be available against him; and as the clause in the act says process shall not be available, we think that the defendant is entitled to his discharge. The rule, therefore, will be made absolute.

Lessor and Lessee—Reversioner—Lease, Non-Execution of, by Reversioner.

Declaration for breach of covenants contained in a farming lease dated the 24th of December 1851, and made between the plaintiff of the first part, the defendant of the second part, and one Y. of the third part, whereby the plaintiff and Y. (so far only as they legally could or might, according only to their respective estates and interests) demised to the defendant a farm for a term of fourteen years from the 25th of March 1851. Plea, that at the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiff was possessed of the premises for the residue of a term of years in case the plaintiff should so long live, and the reversion of the premises after the expiration of the estate of the plaintiff then was vested in Y, and that the indenture was never executed by Y. as his deed, and that there never was any demise by the plaintiff and Y. to the defendant of the premises, and that there never was any consideration for the execution of the indenture or of the defendant's part of the same:—Held, on demurrer, that the plea was bad, as it was expressly stated in the lease that the plaintiff and Y. demised so far only as they legally could or might, according only to their respective estates and interest, and that therefore the defendant had received the consideration for which he stipulated, viz., a lease for fourteen years, if the plaintiff should so long live.

ember 1851, and expressed to be made between the plaintiff of the first part, W. A. Yeo of the second part, and the defendant of the third part; whereby it was witnessed that the plaintiff and the said W. A. Yeo (so far only as they legally could or might according only to their respective estates and interests) demised to the defendant a messuage, tenement, farm and lands therein described, for a term of fourteen years, computed from the 25th of March then last past. The covenants declared on were entered into with the plaintiff and his assigns.

Plea—that, at the time of the execution of the deed, the plaintiff was possessed of the premises for the residue of a term of years, in case the plaintiff should so long live, and was not seised or possessed of or entitled to any other estate or interest therein, and the reversion of the premises after the expiration of the estate of the plaintiff then was and has since been vested in W. A. Yeo; and that the indenture was never signed, sealed or delivered by W. A. Yeo as his deed or otherwise, or by any agent or agents of W. A. Yeo lawfully authorized, and, save as aforesaid, there never was any demise by the plaintiff and W. A. Yeo to the defendant of the premises, and that there never was any consideration or value for the signing, sealing and delivery of the indenture, or of the defendant's part of the same, and that the defendant's alleged covenants were void and of no effect.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

The plaintiff's points were, first, that it appears by the lease declared on that the demise by the plaintiff and the covenants applicable to the estate granted by him are quite distinct from the demise by Yeo and its covenants. Secondly, the defendant's covenants apply to the estate granted by the plaintiff, although it is defeasible by the plaintiff's death, and the defendant is not entitled to hold the land during that estate free from any obligation.

The defendant's points were, that the lease of the 24th of December 1851 is not and never has been a valid lease of the lands demised for the term of fourteen years from the 25th of March 1851. Secondly, that the plaintiff is only a tenant for a term of years of the said lands, that estate being defeasible in case of his death, and the reversioner, W. A. Yeo, never executed the lease. Thirdly, that there was a failure of consideration for the execution of the deed, and the defendant's covenants therein contained were void.

Mathew, in support of the demurrer.—When the facts of this case, as they appear on the record, are ascertained, it is clear that the plea is no answer to the declaration. The plaintiff executes the deed; the defendant also executes it, but the reversioner does not, and the plea is that because the reversioner has not executed the deed it is void ab initio. If this was a case in which the lessor did not execute, it might be contended that the cases of Pitman v. Woodbury (1) and Swatman v. Ambler (2) applied, but the present is distinguishable from those cases. Here the demise is according to the respective interests of the tenant for life and the reversioner, and the covenants are distinct covenants with the plaintiff. The lease is a demise of two several interests as distinct as Blackacre and Whiteacre. In respect of the plaintiff's interest, the plaintiff is entitled to sue the defendant on his covenant. It is possible that the reversioner might bring ejectment against the defendant at the expiration of the tenant for life's interest, but the plaintiff could not do so during the continuance of the term.

Wills, in support of the plea.—This case is not distinguishable from Swatman v. Ambler (2). In that case the lessors had not executed the lease, and the lessee in reality only occupied and enjoyed the premises under a licence revocable at any moment. Here, the term of fourteen years would come to an end by the death of the tenant for life, and the interest of the lessee is therefore defeasible at any moment. The reversioner not having executed the lease, the defendant is not possessed of the interest it was intended he should have; and where the term is not granted the covenants do not attach, because the term is the consideration for the defendant entering into the covenants.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The lease expressly states that the plaintiff and Yeo demise, so far only as they legally can or might according only to their respective estates and interests; that is, the plaintiff grants the lease for fourteen years only so far as he can.—CHANNELL, B.—Swatman v. Ambler (2) was a very different case. In that case there was only one lessor, and when he did not execute the lease the whole consideration failed; that is not so here, the plaintiff has entered into possession of the premises under a lease for fourteen years, which he still enjoys: how can he say there is no consideration for his covenants?—POLLOCK, C.B.—There he got nothing; here he gets not a lease for fourteen years, but a lease for fourteen years if the lessor should so long live. If it could be said that How and Yeo had agreed to grant a lease for fourteen years and had not done so, it might be different.]

The estate granted to the defendant is defeasible at any moment by the plaintiff's death: it would be otherwise if the reversioner had executed the lease.

Mathew was not called upon to reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff. I do not think I can add anything to what has been said during the argument. The plaintiff has done all he could do to give the defendant a lease for fourteen years; he enters into no bargain with the defendant as to what the reversioner should do. The result is this, that the tenant for life and reversioner specially agree to grant a lease, and the instrument is prepared, and it expressly states that the lease is to be according to their respective estates and interests. The defendant has all that he agreed for. He is fully entitled by law to everything he can claim from the plaintiff, but he has all that he is entitled to.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. It might be that the defendant might refuse to take any interest under the indenture without Yeo's signature and execution of the deed, but he has not done so.

CHANNELL, B.—The estate granted by the plaintiff is still continuing: how then can the defendant say that there is no consideration for his covenant?

Lease—How determinable.

A lease for twenty-one years, expressed to be "determinable, nevertheless, in seven or fourteen years, if the said parties hereto shall so think fit," is determinable only by consent of both the parties, although it may have been their intention to give the option to either alone.

This was an action of ejectment, tried at the Warwickshire Summer Assizes, 1864. The only question at issue was, whether the expression in a lease—"for the term of twenty-one years, determinable, nevertheless, in seven or fourteen years, if the said parties hereto shall so think fit," was equivalent to "if either of the said parties shall so think fit." The plaintiffs, the lessors, had determined the lease.

The Judge directed a nonsuit to be entered, with leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them.

Mellish having obtained a rule accordingly, on the ground that, according to the true construction of the lease, the lessors were entitled to determine it at the end of fourteen years,—

Hayes, Serj. now shewed cause.—The words are not "the said parties, or either of them," and they must therefore mean both, and not one without the consent of the other. Unless it be specified who is to have the election, the lessee is to have the election—Dann v. Spurrier (1), and Goodright v. Richardson (2), there cited. Every doubtful grant is to be construed in favour of the grantee—Doe d. Webb v. Dixon (3). The words are not doubtful here; the lessees are included. Why, then, are they to be construed in favour of the lessors?

Mellish and Wills, contra, contended that the rule in Dann v. Spurrier (1)—that where neither party was expressed to have the option, the lessee was to have it—was in the plaintiffs' favour. How would the rule have applied here if the lessee had given notice? The words must mean the consent of both or the option of either. If the defendants be right, the words mean nothing; for without them the parties might determine the lease at any moment. They evidently intended that the lease should come to an end otherwise than it would naturally. If the word "respectively" had been added, there could have been no doubt of their meaning. Though the plaintiffs' interpretation is not strictly the grammatical one, yet, if the defendants' construction be right, the words have only a scintilla of meaning, and are mere surplusage.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I think it is likely that the parties meant that the option should be with either. Certainly the language is more significant if that were their intention. But it is not without meaning, if we give to it merely the literal construction; and I think we are not at liberty, whatever we may think was the intention of the parties, as they have not expressed it, to put a different construction upon the words than what belongs to them according to their natural meaning. No doubt, it has been decided that if a lease is merely for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, giving an option to somebody, but not saying to whom, the option is with the lessee, and the lessee alone. If both parties are mentioned, not saying whether both are required to consent, but at the same time not saying that either shall have the option, it certainly may be argued that they are both mentioned, in order that the landlord may have an option as well as the tenant. But the imperfection of language makes doubtful many an expression. "As well as" may mean "along with," or it may mean "in conjunction with" the lessee. Certainly, if there had been a usage which we could trace, so to frame leases intended to give an option to both, that is, to either; or if there were any decision which tended to shew that the Courts give that interpretation to the words, I should willingly go along with the authority. But there exists neither the one nor the other; we are, therefore, not called upon to give a meaning different from the plain construction of the words, those words not being senseless in the way in which I read them.

BRAMWELL, B.—When it is once admitted that the words, in their grammatical and natural meaning, have that which the defendants contend for, an immense difficulty was thrown on the other side; and, no doubt, the golden rule is, that they must receive their natural meaning, unless there be something to shew that they are senseless or are opposed to the general scope and intent of the instrument, if naturally interpreted; or, at all events, unless there be some great reason of convenience why they should be otherwise interpreted than according to their natural meaning. I see none here. I think it is very possible the parties intended that either might give the notice. But I have great difficulty in understanding how that can be, because here there is a solemn instrument: its terms must have been discussed; it must have been prepared by an attorney; in all probability, engrossed upon parchment; and it is difficult to see how, if the intention were that which is attributed to it by the plaintiffs, it should have been expressed as it is. I have great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the parties did not mean that which the words naturally import, namely, that the joint assent of the lessors and the lessees shall be necessary for the determination of the lease. It is enough to say that the words are sensible when interpreted according to their natural meaning; and I think we ought so to interpret them, unless any reasons, such as I have mentioned, exist to the contrary; and there are none here that I am aware of.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, for the same reasons.

PIGOTT, B.—I think we have no right arbitrarily to speculate about the intention or meaning of the parties. Our plain duty is to carry out their contract where they have expressed it. If we do not give effect to the construction contended for by the defendants, we must introduce the word "respectively," and read the clause—"if the parties respectively shall think fit." They have left out that word, and we are not at liberty to insert it.

Rule discharged.

May 4. } OTHERS.*

Negligence—Leaving Piles in Navigable River.

The defendants contracted with the Lords of the Admiralty for the erection of docks and works in Plymouth harbour, and for that purpose sunk piles in the navigable part of the channel. After the completion of the works, and after a reasonable time for the removal of the piles, the defendants sold the piles to J, who undertook to remove them by a certain date, or sooner if required by the Lords of the Admiralty. The Admiralty subsequently required J. not to draw the piles, and J, acting under those orders, cut the piles off on a level with the bed of the channel. The soil was subsequently washed from around the stumps, and the plaintiff's vessel struck against them and was injured. In the position in which the piles existed at the time the defendants delivered them up to J, the damage could not have been done without the plaintiff's gross negligence:—Held, that there was no cause of action against the defendants.

Declaration,—for that the plaintiff was possessed of a vessel, and of a cargo on board of the same, and which said vessel was being lawfully navigated by the plaintiff's servant in a public navigable channel and river, such channel and river being a public highway for all persons to navigate, pass and repass with their ships and vessels, at their free will and pleasure, and the defendants had, before the happening of the damage hereinafter mentioned, placed, sunk, driven in and erected certain piles in the bed and soil of the said channel and river, the same being then, and ever since, such navigable river and highway as aforesaid, for the purpose of performing certain works by them performed, and which said works, before the happening of the damage and causes of action hereinafter mentioned had been and were fully performed and executed, and the necessity for the said piles remaining and being in the bed of the said channel had wholly ceased.

Averments, that the defendants wrongfully, carelessly, negligently and improperly omitted and neglected to remove and draw the said piles from and out of the bed of the said channel and river, and wrongfully, carelessly, negligently and improperly left parts of the said piles remaining in the said bed of the channel and in a part over which vessels would and might necessarily and lawfully pass, and the defendants wrongfully, negligently carelessly and improperly omitted to take any precautions for preventing the soil of the said river surrounding the said piles and touching the same from being washed away next to the same; and the defendants negligently, carelessly and improperly left the said parts of the said piles in such a position that the same were liable to be and become, and were by reason of the premises exposed and protruding above the level of the said river and channel; and that the said piles became and were so exposed and protruding above the level of the bed of the said river and channel in a navigable part of the same, and the said parts of the said piles were so left by the defendants and remained in the said bed of the said channel, and were obstructing the same unlawfully and without any lawful cause or excuse; and that the said parts of the said piles were under water and concealed from and out of view, in such a position and at such depth that vessels navigating the said channel and river would and might necessarily and lawfully be and were in danger of striking and grounding upon the same, and thereby of being damaged and injured, and that the defendants had notice of the premises; and that the defendants wrongfully and negligently omitted to take any proper care or precaution to prevent or guard against the said danger, or whereby the said danger might be prevented or guarded against, to vessels navigating in and along the said part of the said river, and did not put and place in the said part any proper or sufficient buoy or other proper and sufficient mark or signal to give due notice and warning of the said danger; and that after the said works had been fully performed and the necessity for the piles remaining in the bed of the said channel had ceased, a reasonable time for removing and drawing the said piles and doing all other acts which it was the defendants' duty to do or necessary to be done for removing the said piles or guarding against danger therefrom had ceased; and that whilst the said parts of the said piles were continued so sunk and driven in as aforesaid, without any lawful cause or excuse, or any proper or sufficient buoy or other proper or sufficient signal, or any other due or proper means being used to give notice or warning of the said danger as aforesaid, the plaintiff's said servants not having any knowledge or sufficient means of knowledge of the said danger, and then having lawful occasion to navigate and direct his said vessel in, along and over the said place where the said parts of the said piles so then were sunk, driven in and erected, did then accordingly navigate and direct his said vessel in and along and over the said place; and thereby and by means of the premises and of the said misconduct of the defendants in the premises aforesaid, the said vessel of the plaintiff was then driven and struck and grounded with great force and violence upon and against the said piles and was thereby then greatly injured, and the plaintiff was put to great expense in repairing the same and in removing the said cargo, and otherwise in reference to the same.

Seventh plea, that the said channel and river were a tidal channel and river, and part of the Hamoaze, in the harbour of Plymouth, and that, just before the placing, &c. of the piles, the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom, for the protection of the realm, and enlarging the naval arsenals of the kingdom, and for other public purposes, resolved to erect certain docks and other works close to the place in the declaration mentioned, and employed and contracted with the defendants to execute the same and certain necessary works relating thereto, and to do all necessary things for the execution thereof, and thereupon it became and was necessary for the defendants, in order to the execution of the said docks and works, to place, &c. the said piles as in the declaration mentioned; and that the defendants afterwards, and in order for such execution, with the consent and authority of the Commissioners, lawfully placed, &c. the said piles as in the declaration mentioned; that at and after the time when the said piles were so placed, &c., and thence until long after the defendants delivered up the same and ceased to have any possession of or right or title to the same as hereinafter mentioned, the tops or highest parts of the said piles protruded and were far, to wit, five feet above the surface of the waters of the said river and channel at all times, and clearly and plainly visible, and if the same had so remained, and the same had not been cut as hereinafter mentioned, the said damage never could or would have happened without the gross negligence of the plaintiff in the navigation of his ship; and that long before the said time when the ship was so navigated as in the declaration mentioned the defendants delivered up the said piles to one J. Joll, who became and was the owner and possessor thereof, and thereupon took possession and the sole control thereof, and the defendants ceased to have any possession of or right or title thereto, and never after such delivery interfered or dealt with the same; and that afterwards and before the time when the said ship was so navigated as aforesaid, some persons to the defendants unknown, without the privity or knowledge of the defendants, cut off and removed parts of the said piles, so that the parts remaining as in the declaration mentioned became and were under water and concealed from and out of view, as in the declaration mentioned, whereby and by reason whereof the said damage occurred, and not otherwise, and that after the said piles were so cut the defendants had not notice that they had been so cut or changed.

Eighth plea, in the same terms as the seventh plea, with the additional averments that the said piles were so cut and the said parts thereof were so left, and the same were not drawn from and out of the bed of the river in order to prevent the land and soil of the shore of the said channel or river, and a wharf thereon lawfully formed and being, from slipping and falling into and choking and blocking up the said channel and river, and interfering with the navigation thereof; and that if the piles had been drawn and the said parts of them had not been left as in the declaration mentioned, the said land and soil of the said shore and the said wharf would have fallen out and blocked up, obstructed and choked the said channel and river, and interfered with and injured the navigation thereof, and that the said parts of the said piles so left and remaining were necessary and indispensable for the support of the shore of the said river or channel, and to prevent the same from being obstructed and hindered.

Demurrer to the pleas, and joinder in demurrer.

The plaintiff also replied to the pleas, that the piles were delivered up under and by virtue of the following agreement: "Devonport, November 30th, 1853. It is mutually agreed this day, between J. Joll, of, &c., and G. Baker & Son, of, &c., that in consideration of G. Baker & Son giving up possession of the wharf now held by them from J. Joll at Christmas Day next, and giving him the row of piles in Moon Cove, and the iron attached thereto, which piles are guaranteed by G. Baker & Son to be an average length of forty feet, or an allowance to be made for any deficiency, also those piles driven for the crane stage, the traveller frame on the south side of the lower wharf and the wooden fence that separates the portion of the wharf rented by G. Baker & Son from the other portion, also the fittings in stable and the lead pipe leading from the company's main to the wharf, the chain fastenings on the wharf, and all the broken limestone, except any quoins or blocks that may be found upon the removal of the rubbish, the whole to become the property of J. Joll at Christmas Day next, in the state and position in which they stand; that J. Joll shall pay at Christmas next to G. Baker & Son 125*l.* with a receipt in full of all demands of rental and for all dilapidations or damages that may be done to the property; and J. Joll agrees to remove at his own cost the whole of the before-mentioned piles in Moon Cove and those driven for the crane stage, on or before Midsummer Day, 1854, or at an earlier period if required by the Lords of the Admiralty, and Messrs. G. Baker & Son agree to remove, on or before Lady Day, 1854, the rubble deposited from the river frontage of the wharf to the slip leading to the yard in which the blacksmith's shop is situated, so as to leave the same depth of water alongside the wharf as there was at the commencement of their tenancy."

Averment, that between the time when it had become and was no longer necessary to continue the said piles in the bed and soil of the said channel and river and the time when the piles were delivered up to J. Joll under the said agreement, a reasonable time for drawing and removing the piles and doing all other acts which it was the defendants' duty to do or necessary to be done for removing the said piles or guarding against danger therefrom had elapsed.

Further replication to the pleas, that before and at the time when the defendants delivered up the piles to the said J. Joll, the parts of the docks and works in order to the execution of which it became and was necessary to place, &c. the said piles, had been and were finished and executed, and it had become and was no longer necessary for the purposes of such execution to continue the said piles so placed, &c. in the bed and soil of the said channel and river.

Demurrer to the further replication, and joinder in demurrer.

Rejoinder to the first-mentioned replication, that after the making of the said agreement, and before the cutting of the said piles as in the declaration mentioned, it was the fact, and it was made known to and found by the said lords that the drawing of the piles from and out of the bed of the river would cause great danger to the said wharf and the adjacent lands, and the said navigation of the river; and that if the piles were so drawn the wharf and lands would slip and fall into and choke up the navigation, wherefore the said lords required that the piles should not be drawn, but the same should be cut off on a level with the then bed of the channel and river.

Averment, that the piles were not drawn, but the same were cut off on a level with the then bed of the river by the persons in the seventh plea mentioned, in order to prevent the wharf and lands from slipping and falling into and choking and blocking up the channel and river, and interfering with and destroying the navigation thereof, and to save and prevent the said persons from being guilty of and subject to an indictment for a nuisance by reason of such choking and blocking up the channel and river and interfering with and destroying the said navigation, and that the said cutting off the piles was indispensable for that purpose, and no other means of protecting the navigation could be safely adopted.

Demurrer to the rejoinder, and joinder in demurrer.

The plaintiff also surrejoined, that long before the passing of the act, 54 Geo. 3. c. 159, and during all the time in the rejoinder mentioned or referred to, and thence hitherto, the property in the bed and soil of the channel and river, and the jurisdiction, privileges and powers of conservancy in and over the said channel and river, did not belong to the said lords in the seventh and eighth pleas and the rejoinder mentioned, but to certain other persons.

Demurrer to the surrejoinder, and joinder in demurrer.

Field (F. M. White with him), for the plaintiff.—The first proposition is, that the placing wooden piles in the bed of a navigable river is a nuisance, unless a justification be made out under the Lords of the Admiralty—White v. Phillips (1). Secondly, assuming there was authority to place the piles in the Hamoaze, in the first instance, that authority had ceased. The works had been completed, and a reasonable time had elapsed for removing the piles, therefore the defendants ought to have removed them instead of selling them to a third person. The principles laid down in Rosewell v. Prior (2) apply, and this case is distinguishable from White v. Crisp (3) and Brown v. Mullett (4).

Jellicoe, his heirs, &c., shall and will well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said F. Moojen, his executors or administrators, the sum of 10*l.*, on the 4th of May, the 4th of August, the 4th of November and the 4th of February, in each and every year, until all the present debts and liabilities of the said E. Jellicoe shall have been paid and discharged; the first of such payments to be made on the 4th day of May now next ensuing; and it is hereby declared and agreed that the monies to be received by the said F. Moojen, his executors and administrators, under or by virtue of the covenant of the said E. Jellicoe hereinbefore contained, shall be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the said E. Jellicoe in like manner as if the said E. Jellicoe had been at the date hereof duly adjudged bankrupt, and such monies had constituted or formed part of his estate and effects; and this indenture further witnesseth, that, in consideration of the premises and in pursuance of the agreement hereinbefore expressed, the creditors of the said E. Jellicoe do, and each and every of them doth, discharge and release the said E. Jellicoe, his heirs, &c., from the several sums of money which the said E. Jellicoe is indebted or liable to the said creditors respectively, &c.; nevertheless saving to the said creditors and their respective executors, &c., all claims, &c. against third parties, &c., provided, &c., that if the said quarterly sums of 10*l.* each, or any or either of them, or any part of any such quarterly sum, shall not be paid to the said F. Moojen, his executors, &c., at or before the respective times hereinbefore mentioned and appointed for the payment thereof respectively, according to the covenant of the said E. Jellicoe in that behalf hereinbefore contained, or within seven days after such respective times as aforesaid, then and in such case these presents shall thereupon become absolutely void and of no effect with respect to the said creditors of the said E. Jellicoe, and the said creditors respectively, &c., shall thereupon be restored to their original rights as if these presents had not been made. In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first hereinbefore written.” [Then followed the names and addresses, amounts and signatures of ten creditors.]

The defendant deposed, that the first quarterly payment had been duly paid to his trustee, and that no further payment had become due. This action was brought before the execution of the deed, and on the 26th of January the defendant withdrew his pleas and suffered judgment by default. Notice of the execution of the deed was given to the plaintiff's attorney on the 30th of January. It was alleged that the execution was issued on the 23rd of May without leave of the Court having been obtained.

The matter had been before Mr. Baron Pigott at chambers, on an interpleader summons taken out by the sheriff who had notice of the deed; but the learned Judge held that it was not a case for interpleader, the goods not being claimed by the trustee. A summons was then taken out on the part of the trustee to set aside the writ of fi. fa. on the ground that it had been issued without leave of the Court of Bankruptcy. The matter was referred by the Judge to the full Court.

It appeared from an affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney that issue had been joined and notice of trial given before the execution of the deed, and the plaintiff deposed that he had never received notice or any information of the defendant having executed the deed, or notice that the deed had been registered.

Macnamara shewed cause.—The deed is void as against non-assenting creditors: first, on the ground that the deed was unreasonable, there being no covenant by the debtor with the creditors nor any covenant by the trustee, although the creditors release their debts; if the money agreed to be paid was not paid, the only effect was to make the deed void, leaving no remedy on the deed against the debtor or his estate. Leigh v. Penderbury (1) is an authority that execution will not be set aside unless the deed be reasonable; secondly, the deed was void in consequence of there being no schedule of all the debts. As regards the creditors executing, no doubt there would be evidence that the debtor assented to the sums opposite their names as being the debts due by him, but as regards the non-executing creditors the debtor did not admit any particular sum to any one, so that he would be at liberty to dispute the existence of the debt and refuse to place the creditor on the same footing as the others, and therefore making the deed unequal—Ex parte Cockburn (2). The form given in Schedule D. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, evidently contemplates a schedule. Thirdly, the affidavits are defective in not shewing that the three-fourths of the creditors had assented before the fi. fa. was issued.

Joyce, in support of the rule, was directed to confine his argument to the question of the validity of the deed. The objection that the deed contained no covenant by the debtor is not tenable, for if there had been a covenant with the creditors signing, it would have been objected that such a covenant excluded the non-assenting creditors—Ex parte Cockburn (2). It is better to have a trustee to act for all parties. In the event of a breach of the agreement by the debtor, the creditors are remitted to all their rights, so that it cannot be said they have no remedy. As to the objection that there is no schedule of all the creditors, no schedule at all is necessary except where the debtor seeks to avail himself of the provisions of section 200. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, but even if the statute contemplates a schedule in every case, it must mean a schedule of the creditors actually assenting.

[CHANNELL, B.—It seems to be impossible that the debtor should be required to put all his creditors in the same schedule, for section 200. contemplates that some of his creditors are unknown. The statute may mean either all the creditors executing, or all the creditors known to the debtor. MARTIN, B.—It seems as if the deed were required to be in the form provided in Schedule D, in those particular circumstances only referred to in section 200.]

Yes. This is a vexatious proceeding, and the plaintiff ought to pay the costs, for he should have ascertained the existence of the deed.

Quain appeared for the sheriff.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case the debtor covenants to pay everybody 20s. in the pound; that in reality is the effect of the deed, for the composition is not for so much in the pound, but has reference to the defendants requiring time for payment, and paying the debt without interest, and probably it is a matter of comparative indifference to many creditors whether they get 10s. in the pound at once, or get the whole debt without interest at distant intervals of payment, the delay makes it equivalent only to 10s. in the pound. At first I thought the deed was unreasonable, but when I come to examine it and consider that the times of payment are extended, instead of the debt being paid by less than 20s. in the pound, I cannot say that I think it is unreasonable. If the creditors are competent to say "we will take half-a-crown in the pound," I think they are also competent to bind the dissenting creditors, or all the non-executing creditors to the extension of time, which may be equivalent to a composition of 15s. in the pound. There being nothing unreasonable about the deed, I think the rule should be made absolute to set aside the proceedings.

(1) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172.

(2) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 17.

MARTIN, B.—I have given as much consideration to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, as I have given to anything, to try to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion; but it is my duty to acquiesce in what has been done by other Courts of concurrent jurisdiction. I assume the judgment of my Brothers Blackburn and Mellor in Dingwell v. Edwards (3) to be correct. I cannot say this deed is unreasonable. The true test of reasonableness is whether three-fourths of the creditors whose debts amount to 10s. considered it reasonable. If that be the test they have done so in this case. I therefore think the rule ought to be that the sheriff do withdraw: and if he wants protection he ought to get it. I do not think that the costs should be paid by the plaintiff. It is an extremely hard thing on a man who lends money to another that he should be deprived of getting his debt by means of a transaction entered into with others, but to which he is not privy in any way whatever.

CHANNELL, B.—This case comes before us on an application by the sheriff for an interpleader order. It seems to me that the deed, in substance, shews a compliance with the 192nd section, and that the two points that have been urged with a view to shew non-compliance have failed. One is that the deed is unreasonable. That this is not an unreasonable deed has, I think, been already determined. Then the other point is as to the schedule. The deed is in the form of various deeds that have been before the Court and which the Court have upheld. I think the fi. fa. was improperly issued, and that the rule should be absolute, that the sheriff do withdraw, the judgment debtor, who makes the application, undertaking to bring no action.

Rule absolute to set aside the writ of fi. fa. and all proceedings thereon without costs. The sheriff to withdraw, and no action to be brought against him.

MURPHY v. CARALL.

Negligence—Master and Servant.

Some bales of cotton, sent by the defendant to a warehouse and packed there carelessly by his servants under the direction of the warehouse-keeper, afterwards fell on the plaintiff, a servant of the owner of the warehouse, who was passing by in the course of his duty:—Held, that the defendant was not responsible.

Randelson v. Murray (1) impugned.

The declaration stated that the defendant so negligently, &c. placed a pile of cotton bales in a certain cotton shed or warehouse, that by and through the mere negligence, &c. of the defendant in that behalf the same fell upon the plaintiff, who was then lawfully engaged and working in the said cotton shed or warehouse, and inflicted upon him bodily injuries; and the plaintiff thereby became ill and disabled from working at his calling of a cotton porter, &c.

Second count—that the defendant was the possessor or part occupier of a certain cotton shed or warehouse and premises, with the appurtenances, and the plaintiff was lawfully engaged and working in the said cotton shed, warehouse and premises; yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, whilst he was so the possessor or part occupier of the said cotton shed, warehouse and premises, so negligently, &c., and contrary to his duty in that behalf, placed a pile of cotton bales in the said cotton shed, warehouse and premises, that by and through the mere negligence, &c. of the defendant in that behalf, the same fell upon the plaintiff, who was then lawfully engaged and working in the said cotton shed, warehouse and premises, and inflicted on him internal and bodily injuries, whereby &c.

Plea—not guilty, and (to the second count) that the defendant was not the possessor or part occupier of the said cotton shed or warehouse as alleged.

The action was tried, before Edward

James, Esq., in the Liverpool Passage Court, where it was proved that some of the defendant's cotton bales had been sent to the warehouse where the accident occurred, and had been there insecurely piled by his men under the directions of the warehouse-keeper, whose duty it was (according to his own evidence) to see that all bales were properly piled. The bales in question subsequently fell upon the plaintiff, who was a servant of the owner of the warehouse, while he was passing by in the course of his duty.

The Judge having directed that a nonsuit should be entered,—

Little obtained a rule to set it aside; and

Charles Russell now shewed cause, contending that, as the damage was done by a person not under the defendant's control, and the defendant was not the owner of the warehouse or any part of it, but only of some bales which were stowed there, the nonsuit was right.

Little, being called on by the Court to support his rule, cited the case of The Mobile (2), where it was held that the owners of a vessel in charge of a licensed pilot are not exempted by the Merchant Shipping Act from liability for damage caused by the vessel, unless the pilot was exclusively to blame, and there was no blame attributable to the master and crew; and contended that the porters who packed the cotton were the defendant's servants, and that there was negligence on their part as well as on that of the warehouse-keeper.

[BRAMWELL, B.—Is the master responsible for the negligence of his servants when they act under another person who is not his servant, but whom they are bound to obey?]

Yes. The plaintiff here never touched the bales that fell, and there was no contributory negligence on his part. Had they fallen while being piled, the defendant would clearly have been liable. The warehouse-keeper was for this particular service the servant of the owner of the cotton; and if the bales had fallen on one of the defendant's men while engaged in piling, it would have been said that he and the warehouse-keeper were fellow-servants. It was no part of the warehouse-keeper's duty to direct where the passers-by were to go. He had only to direct where the bales were to be stowed. He cited Martin v. Temperley (3) and Randelson v. Murray (4), in which latter case a warehouseman who had engaged a master-porter to move a barrel was held liable for injury arising from the negligence of the men employed, and the failing of the tackle used by the master-porter.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that, upon the evidence before him, the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judge was perfectly correct. The warehouse-keeper said, in substance, that the goods were stowed entirely under his direction—where he pleased, and how he pleased; and that he should not allow the owner of the goods to stow them as he thought fit, but should direct him how to stow them. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the defendant is no more responsible to the plaintiff than any stranger would be. The stowage was entirely with this warehouse-keeper, and he and his master are the only persons responsible. The cases cited do not support the plaintiff's case. Randelson v. Murray (4) is opposed to the general current of decisions on this subject. The rule must, therefore, be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—This nonsuit was quite right. I think that the men who were packing the bales were the servants of the defendant, so as to make him responsible for what they did. If they had negligently piled these bales, and one of them had fallen on a passer-by while the men were piling them, the defendant would have been liable: for, although the men were acting under the control of the warehouse-keeper, they were the defendant's servants, acting in the defendant's service; and it appears to me, therefore, that the question is to be treated as if he had piled the goods in the way in which they were piled. But would he therefore be liable under the circumstances of this case? I think not, and for this reason : that there would have been no danger to anybody but for a subsequent act, namely, the suffering people to come near the bales. Suppose the defendant to have been present when the bales were piled, and to have said, "It is dangerous to pile them in that way; they will fall." The warehouse-keeper might have replied, "That is my affair; I will put a barricade or prevent any one coming near them. I will take care that no subsequent event which will cause mischief to arise shall happen, for no one shall come near them, and no one can then be hurt." I think it would then be impossible to say, if any mischief had afterwards happened, owing to the warehouse-keeper letting a person go and get hurt by the falling of a bale, that the defendant would be liable. Take this case : a man delivers an article at another's door—an article that cannot be carried in at once, and the owner of the house says : "Put it down in the highway and I will move it directly, and I will take care to prevent people running against it"; and the owner puts it down there; and it is allowed to remain all night; there is no light, and some one runs against it, and is injured. Who is responsible? The owner of the house, not the man who puts the thing there, for the depositing the article was not dangerous without some subsequent wrongful and negligent act. Therefore, it seems to me this defendant is not responsible for this act, which only produced mischief by a further amount of negligence on the part of the warehouse-keeper. I can very well imagine that if the negligence had been of what may be called a covert kind, not as obvious to the warehouse-keeper as to the people who did it, the case might have been different; for mischief might be produced without any subsequent wrong on the part of the warehouse-keeper. But here the wrong, if any, was as patent to the warehouse-keeper as to any one, nay, more so; and inasmuch as it was done subject to the control of the warehouse-keeper, he is the person of whom to complain, and not the defendant, who did an act which by itself would not have caused the mischief.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that this rule should be discharged, and

I come to that conclusion upon the ground that the act complained of must be taken to have been done under the direction of the warehouse-keeper. There is no negligence to be imputed to the defendant personally. If there be any, it must be in this way,—that the persons who were doing the act were his servants. Now, it is quite clear that the warehouse-keeper had a right to control the packing of the bales in question. We must take it that he was attentive to his duties, and saw what was going on, and that what was done was done with his assent and approval. I take it, therefore, that it was done by his direction, and that being so, though the cotton porters acted for the owner of the cotton, and were his servants for certain purposes, and their duties did not cease with taking the cotton to the warehouse and leaving it there, but continued to the packing, they were, in that proceeding and in respect of the negligence that took place, not acting as the servants of the defendant, but as the servants of the warehouse-keeper, and of the owners of the warehouse who employed him.

PIGOTT, B.—I think the nonsuit was right, for the reasons just stated. I will only add, that it would have been a different thing altogether, if the warehouse-keeper, instead of controlling the mode in which the goods were packed in the warehouse, had let a space to the defendant, and had allowed the defendant, either to throw the goods on the floor, or stack them, or do what he liked with the space. Then the person who was sent by the defendant to deposit those goods would have had to deposit them carefully; and if the defendant appointed a person who did that duty negligently, there would then be some reason and justice in holding him responsible. But when he sends a man who is entirely subject to the control of the warehouse-keeper, and who is not allowed to exercise any discretion as to the manner of stowing the goods, it seems to me most unjust and unreasonable to hold the defendant responsible, for he has not been guilty of any neglect of duty.

1864. } SCOTT v. THE LONDON DOCK
Nov. 11. } COMPANY.

Negligence—Inference of Negligence from mere happening of Accident—Onus of rebutting Inference.

The plaintiff, a custom-house officer, was injured while on the defendants' premises in the course of his duty, by goods falling on him from a crane fixed over a doorway under which he was passing. No explanation was given of the cause of the goods falling:—Held, by Channell, B. and Pigott, B. (following Byrne v. Boadle) that it was for the defendants to shew that there was no negligence on their part causing the accident, and not for the plaintiff to make out that there was.

Contrà, by Martin, B. (following Hammack v. White).

The declaration alleged that the defendants were possessed of a warehouse and of a certain crane for lowering goods therefrom, and by their servants in that behalf were lowering by the said crane from the said warehouse certain bags of sugar on to the ground and stone pavement in the docks of the defendants, on and along which the plaintiff was then lawfully passing, and the defendants by their servants so negligently, &c. lowered the said bags of sugar that the same fell upon the plaintiff, whereby he was greatly injured, &c.

Plea, not guilty. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Martin, B., during the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1864, the only evidence was that of the plaintiff himself, who stated that as he was passing under a doorway on the defendants' premises, in the course of his duty as a custom-house officer, on his way from one warehouse to another, some bags of sugar fell on him from a crane which was fixed over the doorway; and that there was nothing to prevent people passing that way, nor was there any intimation of its being dangerous to do so. No explanation was given of the cause of the bags falling.

The learned Judge directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence.

The Solicitor General having subsequently obtained a rule to set this verdict aside, and for a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence for the jury of negligence by the defendants' servants,—

Murphy (with him Bovill) now shewed cause.—This rule was obtained on the authority of Byrne v. Boadle(1), which, if in point in other respects, is distinguished from the present case in this, that there the accident took place on a public highway, while the plaintiff here was in the docks as a mere licensee, his only rights being that he should not be treated as a trespasser, and that no trap should be laid for him—Bolch v. Smith (2).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—At a railway station people may not lawfully go on the rails or under cranes, &c. where there is danger.]

And that is so in the case of a dock, to which the principles on which Cornman v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (3) was decided apply, as well as to a railway. The degrees of negligence for which defendants are liable differ on public and private highways—Hounsell v. Smyth (4), per Williams, J. A passenger uses the latter at his peril, provided there be no trap for him; whereas, in using the former, he is entitled to absolute immunity from danger. There is nothing in the Dock Acts putting an officer of the Customs while in the docks on the same footing as a passenger on a public highway. Every hole is not to be fenced for him, merely because he is there in the execution of his duty. The danger here was more apparent than in Bolch v. Smith (2).

[MARTIN, B.—That case is not in point; for here all we know is that the bags fell from some cause or other.]

But it shews that it is for the plaintiff to make out that the defendants were doing something wrong. He is in the same dilemma as the plaintiff in Wilkinson v. Fairrie (5) was, and that case has been followed by this Court in Rogers v. Laing (6). Byrne v. Boadle (1) goes to this only, that there may be circumstances under which the mere happening of an accident is evidence of negligence, whereas Hammack v. White (7) shows that a mere accident is not necessarily evidence of negligence; and in Cotton v. Wood (8), Erle, C.J. said that, "to warrant a case being left to the jury, a mere scintilla of evidence is not sufficient; there must be proof of well-defined negligence."

The Solicitor General and T. Jones, contra.—The case is governed by Byrne v. Boadle (1). First, supposing the plaintiff to have been merely a passer-by, the mere happening of the accident is evidence of negligence against the defendants—Carpue v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (9).

[MARTIN, B.—No one now acts on that case.—His Lordship referred to Fawcett v. the Great Western Railway of Canada (10).]

It is not reasonable to call on the plaintiff to prove negligence. How can he tell under what circumstances the bags fell? This is a case where res ipsa loquitur, and negligence may be presumed. Byrne v. Boadle (1) shews that, where damage results from the doing of an act which does not ordinarily cause damage, the inference is that there has been negligence: The onus of rebutting this inference lies on the defendants—Christie v. Griggs (11).

There is no case in conflict with Byrne v. Boadle (1). In Hammack v. White (7) there was affirmative evidence of care on the part of the defendant, while in Cotton v. Wood (8) the question of contributory negligence was raised, with which we are not concerned here. Secondly, the plaintiff's rights were different from those of a mere passer-by. He was in the docks in pursuance of his duty, as a sentry might be. There might perhaps have been a difference in the case of a mere licensee.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The plaintiff here was like a man in a large factory, where there are safe as well as dangerous places. The defendants did not intend this place to be a way, and the plaintiff was there at his own risk, though lawfully.]

That point did not arise at the trial; the case is to be decided on the question of negligence or no negligence only.

[MARTIN, B.—There was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.]

Proof of negligence need not necessarily be positive or affirmative, but may, by inference from facts, be as clear as if it were direct. The reasonable conclusion here is, that the defendants must be called on to explain how the bags fell; and if Byrne v. Boadle (1) be law, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

MARTIN, B.—In my judgment this rule should be discharged. The true doctrine is laid down in the case of Hammack v. White (7), viz., that there must be evidence of negligence. If there were any evidence of negligence upon this point, the plaintiff would be entitled to a new trial. In my opinion the evidence came to nothing more than this,—that the plaintiff sustained damage by bags of sugar falling upon him; and if my ruling was wrong, the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Hammack v. White (7) was wrong.

CHANNELL, B.—I am unable to distinguish this case, substantially, from Byrne v. Boadle (1), which I consider to be good law. In giving my judgment, I assume that the plaintiff when he met with this accident was on the defendants' premises rightfully and in the lawful discharge of his duty.

PIGOTT, B.—I also assume that the plaintiff was rightly and lawfully in the docks, not as a mere licensee, but having a right to be there, and having a duty to discharge there. The sugar fell on him either out of a window or from a crane; how it came to fall is left in doubt. Then the question is, was there any evidence of negligence on the part of those who were dealing with the sugar? That is the way I view the case. To use the words of the Lord Chief Baron in Byrne v. Boadle (1), this is a case where res ipsa loquitur, so as to call on the defendants to explain how the thing happened. It may have been the result of inevitable accident; but, as it stands, there is evidence calling upon them for an explanation. As I understand the case of Hammack v. White (7), it only lays down the same principle: Williams, J. says there, that he thinks that "where the evidence is equally balanced, the benefit of the doubt must in such a case as this be given to the defendant." So here, if the facts were such as to leave the evidence evenly balanced, whether the injury was the result of mere accident or of negligence, I should say that it was not a case where the defendants should be called on for an answer. Looking at the case as it stands, however, and understanding the ordinary transactions of life, the event here is not one which does, in the ordinary course of business, usually and ordinarily happen. It is prima facie the result of some negligence; and for these reasons I think that it was a question for the jury, and that the defendants should be called upon to explain how the injury happened to be inflicted. In the absence of that explanation, the rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute (12).

Covenant to repair—Liability to repair Buildings erected during the Term.

A lease contained a demise of three houses and a field to B. for a term of ninety-nine years, who covenanted "well and sufficiently to repair, sustain and keep the said tenements or dwelling-houses, field or plot of ground and premises, and every part thereof, as well in houses, buildings, walls, hedges, ditches, fences and gates, as in all other needful and necessary reparations whatsoever, when and so often as occasion shall require during the said term, and at the end or other determination thereof the said premises, so well and sufficiently repaired, into the hands and possession of the said lessors peaceably to leave and yield up." B. granted an underlease of the field to one C, who granted underleases to several persons who erected houses in the field:—Held, that the covenant to repair contained in the lease to B, did not extend to the houses erected during the term in the field.

Ejectment to recover a certain dwelling-house and garden in the occupation of Thomas Andrews, also a dwelling-house, No. 8, Hampton Buildings, with the garden adjoining, also a dwelling-house adjoining thereto unoccupied, also a dwelling-house and small garden thereto in the occupation of James Boyce, also a small courtlage or yard adjoining, also a small dwelling-house with small garden adjoining, in the occupation of Abraham James, situate in the parish of St. Sidwell, in the county of the city of Exeter.

The plaintiffs were feoffees of the lands belonging to the parish of St. Sidwell, Exeter, and they sought to recover possession of the premises by reason of their being out of repair, contrary to the covenant contained in the lease hereinafter mentioned.

On the 29th of September 1803, the then feoffees of the parish lands granted a lease to one Thomas Binford, in consideration of 106*l.*, for the term of ninety-nine years, determinable on three lives (one of whom was at the time of bringing the ejectment still living), of all those three tenements or dwelling-houses and a field or plot of ground (formerly an orchard) adjoining thereto, with the appurtenances, containing one acre or thereabouts, situate in the parish of St. Sidwell (except all trees, &c., with liberty for the lessors to enter and fell the same and to view the husbandry used on the said field), under the yearly rent of 10*l.* The deed contained a covenant on the part of the lessee to let up all trees and saplings, and also "well and sufficiently to repair, sustain and keep the said tenements or dwelling-houses, field or plot of ground and premises and every part thereof, as well in houses, buildings, walls, hedges, ditches, fences and gates, as in all other needful and necessary reparations whatsoever, when and as often as occasion shall require during the said term, and at the end or other sooner determination thereof the said premises, so well and sufficiently repaired, into the hands and possession of the said lessors, peaceably to leave and yield up": provided always, that if the said Binford, his executors, administrators and assigns, shall not well and truly observe, fulfil and keep all and singular the covenants, articles, clauses and agreements hereinbefore contained on his or their parts to be paid, done and performed, it shall be lawful for the said lessors, their heirs and assigns, into the said premises and every part thereof to re-enter, and the same to have again, repossess and enjoy, as in their first and former estate.

On the 26th of October 1819, Binford granted an underlease of the field only, to one Chesterman, for seventy years—if the lives so long continued in being—subject to the payment of 6*l.* rent, and a covenant to repair hedges, fences, gates, bars, rails, stiles and posts. On the 21st of September Chesterman assigned the field to Messrs. Radford, who, in December 1821, sold the easternmost part of it to one Summons, and in June 1822 sold the westernmost part to Hopping & Steer. Eventually, fourteen houses were built on the field by different persons holding title under the sub-lease. The houses mentioned in the writ of ejectment, and which were part of the fourteen houses, were mortgaged to one Wilcocks, who transferred the mortgage to one Duchemin, who transferred it to the defendants, who entered and took possession.

At the trial, before Byles, J., at the Exeter Lammas Assizes, 1864, the above facts were proved, and it was admitted by the defendants that the houses in question were out of repair, but it was contended that the covenant to repair contained in the deed of 1803 did not extend to buildings erected after the lease was granted, and that it applied only to the three houses then standing and to the hedges, gates and fences of the field.

The learned Judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs, reserving leave to the defendants to move to set aside the verdict and enter it for them, on the ground that the covenant to repair did not apply to the newly-created houses.

Montague Smith having obtained a rule accordingly,— Karslake and Stock shewed cause (Nov. 14).—The covenant extends to all houses which shall be built after the covenant was entered into. The words are, to repair "the said tenements and dwelling-houses, field or plot of ground, as well in houses, buildings, walls, hedges, ditches, fences and gates as in all other needful and necessary reparation."

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Do you contend that if an underlease were granted and houses were built in the field, that the covenant would be enlarged?]

Yes. Because it is a general covenant to repair. In Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, p. 464, 8th edit. it is laid down that a general covenant to repair and to deliver up in repair has been held to extend to all buildings erected during the term; thus, if a man upon taking a lease of a house and land covenant to leave the demised premises in good repair at the end of the term, and erect a messuage upon part of the land besides that which was there before, he must keep and leave the last in good repair also. This statement is supported by a reference to Bac. Abr. tit 'Covenant,' F. In Doune v. Cale (1) an action was brought upon a covenant by the plaintiff, as assignee, against John Cale, executor of Richard Cale, for non-repair of certain houses. The plaintiff set forth a lease made by Lord Clare to Richard Cale of three messuages, to hold from Christmas-day then next for forty-one years, and Richard Cale covenanted with the said Earl to pull down the said three houses, and in the same place to build three as good and substantial houses in all respects as he had some short time before built for himself in Fleet Street; ac etiam that he would during the same term well and sufficiently repair all the houses so agreed to be built, ac etiam omnia et singula canal, &c. facta vel fienda in pr' et cum omnibus requisitis et necessariis reparationibus . . . ac dicta dimissa premissa ac domus et edificia superinde fore erect' et edificat' et eorum quodlibet bene et sufficienter reparat', supportat' et manutent' in fine vel citiori determinatione dicti termini pacifice et quiete relinqueret, et sursum redderet dicto comiti hered' et assign' suis prout per indentur' pced'. The sole question was, upon this covenant, whether, the defendant being obliged only to build three houses and having built one more, the covenant did not bind him to repair and build and deliver up that house well repaired as well as those which were agreed to be built? And the Court were of opinion that the covenant did extend to the other house as well as to the three which were agreed to be built; for in the last covenant, which is to deliver up well repaired, it is, dicta præmissa ac domus et ædificia superinde fore erecta, which is general; and it is the rather so to be taken because in the first covenant, for keeping in repair during the term, it is the houses agreed to be built; which words "agreed to be built" are left out in the last covenant, which the Court took to be a distinct covenant. This case is a direct authority for the plaintiff.

Montague Smith (Kingdon with him), in support of the rule.—When the lease in question was granted there were only three houses built; but since then, fourteen houses have been built in a field adjoining, which was demised together with the three houses to one Bingford. The defendant has become mortgagee of six of the houses. The houses are now out of repair, and the question is, whether the assignees of the lessors can bring ejectment against the mortgagee? In construing the covenant, it must not be lost sight of that the trees in the field are excepted in the lease, and that the lessors are at liberty to enter to fell the same and to view the husbandry used on the field. Then comes the covenant which is to be construed reddendo singula singulis. The covenant is to repair the tenements and dwelling-houses and field, as well in houses, buildings, walls, hedges, that is, so far as concerns houses to keep the houses in repair, and so far as concerns the field to keep the field in repair. In Doune v. Cale (1) the Court were of opinion that the covenant extended to all the premises, but Rokeby, J. doubted, on the construction of the covenant. That learned Judge said, it seemed to him to be all as one covenant, and so all the subsequent matter concerning leaving the houses well repaired should be restrained and understood of those agreed to be built. The case is reported in two places, but neither of the reports can be considered as satisfactory. There is not a single word in the present deed to shew that it was ever contemplated that the field was to be built upon. Doe v. Rowlands (2), as far as it goes, is an authority for the defendant.

Judgment was now (Nov. 22) delivered as follows—

POLLOCK, C.B.—In the case of Cornish v. Cleife, in which a rule was obtained by the defendants to set aside the verdict entered for the plaintiffs, and to enter it for the defendants, we are all of opinion that the covenant does not extend to the newly-erected houses; therefore that there was no breach so as to justify the claim of forfeiture. The verdict ought to be entered for the defendants.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I should be very glad, if possible, to lay down some general rule by which cases of this sort may be governed; but I do not see how it is possible to do so, because each particular case must depend on the terms of the particular covenant into which the parties have entered. I cannot see in this case that the covenant to repair applies to the newly-erected houses. I emphasize the word "houses," because I think that if an addition had been made to an old house, by putting up a lean-to, a barn or a stable, it would have been a part of the house within the meaning of the covenant; but I cannot see that the covenant applies to that which is a separate, new and independent dwelling-house. The words are these: "will well and sufficiently repair, sustain and keep the said tenement or dwelling-house." The word "tenement" there is obviously equivalent to "dwelling-house"; so that one may read it thus: "will well and sufficiently repair, sustain and keep the said dwelling-house, field, plot of ground and premises and every part thereof." There it only speaks of the existing houses and field, plot of ground and premises. It goes on, "as well"; but that does not extend it at all. It might shew what has gone before applies to something more than one would suppose it to do, without these following words. But the natural object of the words "as well" is to merely explain what had gone before. "As well in houses, buildings, walls, hedges, ditches, fences and gates, as in all other needful and necessary reparation whatsoever," when "and so often as the same shall be necessary." These words do not extend the covenant at all. It means simply this : "to repair as well the houses and buildings, walls, hedges, ditches, fences and gates." It seems to me, therefore, it gives no extension of the former words.

I wish to add, that a doubt occurred to me in this way: it struck me it would be difficult to say that a new building would not be the subject of the covenant. I think so still, in the sense I have explained, namely, if it was a building made part of one of the houses; if a stable or lean-to was added, then I think the covenant would extend to it. But I should not think it would extend to an entirely new barn, for instance, erected in the field separate from the house, and having nothing to do with the house; because, in my judgment, the covenant to repair buildings means the house and that which, in popular parlance, might be said to be a part of it. It seems to me, therefore, that on the merits of this case we ought to decide it in favour of the defendants.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the rule obtained for entering the verdict for the defendants should be made absolute. I agree in thinking it is necessary in every case to attend to the language of a singular covenant, and one can hardly expect cases to be directly in point so as to relieve the Court from the necessity of considering what is the effect of the particular language used. My Brother Bramwell has read the covenant, and I need not repeat it. I agree with the authorities that are cited in the text-books, because they establish the fact that where there is a general covenant to repair and keep and leave in repair, the proper inference from that is, that the party undertakes to repair newly-erected buildings; on the other hand, where there is a particular covenant to repair demised buildings, then no such liability arises. The present case does not appear to me to fall exactly within either of the rules to be gathered from the cases to which I have referred. As far as I can see, it appears to me to fall more within the last rule applicable to a particular covenant; and referring to the particular language of the covenant, and for the reasons given by my Brother Bramwell, I am of opinion the rule should be made absolute.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I was at one time disposed to think the latter words were an extension of the former words of the covenant; but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion expressed by my Brother Bramwell.

Rule absolute.

Action—Trove—Conversion.

Wine, the property of the plaintiff, being in the warehouse of the defendant, a wharfinger, notice from the Lord Mayor's Court was served on the defendant, attaching in his hands all the goods of H, from whom the plaintiff had purchased the wine, and at the same time the defendant was informed that the attachment had reference to the wine. The plaintiff demanded the wine from the defendant's clerk, producing the delivery warrant which had been issued by the defendant to B, a former owner, and indorsed by him to H, and by H. to the plaintiff. The defendant's clerk said that there was a difficulty in consequence of the attachment, and referred the plaintiff to the defendant, whom he could not find. The plaintiff's attorney thereupon wrote, demanding the wine before eleven o'clock the next morning. The defendant's attorney replied, asking for time for inquiry; but a writ was issued before that answer was received:—Held, that there was some evidence of a conversion; that the conduct and position of the defendant was evidence from which the jury might infer whether or not he had been guilty of a conversion of the wine, and that before arriving at a conclusion it was proper for the jury to consider whether the defendant had a bonâ fide doubt as to the plaintiff's title to the wine, and whether a reasonable time for clearing up that doubt had elapsed before the action was commenced.

* Decided in the Sittings after Trinity Term, coram Williams, J., Crompton, J., Wiles, J., Byles, J., Blackburn, J. and Shée, J.

This was an appeal by the defendant to review the judgment of the Court of Exchequer discharging a rule to enter a verdict for him (1).

The action was trover for some cases of champagne. The wine had been deposited in the possession of the defendant, who was a wharfinger, and had been bought by the plaintiff of Henry & Co. The plaintiff had received a warrant for the wine signed by the defendant's warehouse-keeper deliverable to B, indorsed by B. to Henry & Co., and indorsed generally by Henry & Co. On the 7th of July the plaintiff sent the warrant to the defendant's warehouse with a sample order, and on the production of these documents, obtained samples of the wine. On the 24th of July, the plaintiff went with his attorney to the defendant's warehouse, presented the warrant to the defendant's warehouseman G, and demanded the wine. G. said that there was a difficulty; that the goods had been stopped by an attachment from the Lord Mayor's Court; and he referred the plaintiff to the defendant, who, however, could not be found.

The same day the plaintiff's attorney wrote demanding the wine, threatening immediate proceedings unless a satisfactory answer was given by eleven o'clock A.M. next day.

The next day (July 25) the defendant's attorneys wrote in answer, saying that they had been instructed by the defendant to communicate with the plaintiff's attorneys, and said that the matter appeared complicated, that they were not fully acquainted with the circumstances, and begged for time for inquiry. The writ was issued on the 25th of July, at 12 at noon, and before the receipt of this letter.

For the defendant it was proved that he had on the 22nd of July been served with a notice of attachment from the Lord Mayor's Court on all goods belonging to Henry & Co. which might be in his power or which might hereafter come to his hand, and the attorney for the plaintiff in the action against Henry & Co. in the Lord Mayor's Court came with the serjeant-of-mace, who served the notice of attachment and indorsed on the notice the particulars of the goods, being the wine in question.

On these facts it was contended by the defendant, on the authority of Verrall v. Robinson (2), that there was no evidence of a conversion.

A verdict was taken for the plaintiff with liberty to the defendant to move to set it aside and enter a verdict for himself.

On the motion the Court of Exchequer (Bramwell, B. dissentiente) held that there was evidence of a conversion, and discharged the rule.

Montague Smith (H. Matthews with him) for the defendant, urged, on the authority of Verrall v. Robinson (2), that after the attachment from the Lord Mayor's Court the goods were in custodia legis, and that the holding them by the defendant after such attachment had been served was no evidence of a conversion, and he distinguished Catterall v. Kenyon (3) on the ground that there the bailiff took goods which he had no right to seize; and he further contended that, as no reasonable time had been allowed to the defendant to inquire into the circumstances, and as he had not absolutely refused to deliver them up, there was no conversion; and he cited Clark v. Chamberlain (4), Gunston v. Nurse (5), Alexander v. Southey (6) and Vaughan v. Watt (7).

Prentice, for the plaintiff, the respondent, was not called upon.

WILLIAMS, J.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer must be affirmed. The point for our consideration arises in the following way: In the case before us, it is stated that on the trial the counsel for the defendant objected that the goods were in custodia legis, and that there was no evidence of a conversion. The first point is, whether the fact of an attachment having issued was of itself sufficient to prevent there being a conversion; secondly, if not, whether, it being a fact in the case, there was, on the whole, any evidence of a conversion; not a mere scintilla of evidence, but evidence upon which a jury might reasonably act. We think that there was some evidence for the consideration of the jury. As to the first point, we are pressed by the case of Verrall v. Robinson (2). In that case, goods having been seized by the officer of the sheriff of London, the Court considered that such goods were in custodia legis, and that this prevented the refusal of the defendant to give them up from being a conversion. But when that case was adverted to in Catterall v. Kenyon (3), not only do the expressions of the Court throw some doubt whether they agree in opinion with the Court in Verrall v. Robinson (2), but Lord Denman, C.J. says: "The learned Judges who decided that case thought that the chattel was in the custody of the law, and that the defendant was not at liberty to give it up, the particular article having been attached by process." There is therefore a plain distinction between the case of Verrall v. Robinson (2) and the case now before us. There the Court considered that the officer of the Court had got the goods in his possession, and that the defendant had no power to give them up; at all events, not without the risk of coming into collision with the officer, and so giving rise to a breach of the peace. But here there was no seizure by the officer of the Court; there was nothing to prevent the defendant from giving up the wine. All that appears is, that there was a general notice that the goods belonging to Henry & Co. in the hands of the defendant were attached. Verrall v. Robinson (2) therefore does not, to my mind, govern this case. The fact of the attachment having been thus put in seems to me to be but one of the circumstances to be considered by the jury in forming their conclusion whether there has been a conversion. Then, looking to all the facts, is there any evidence of a conversion? I think that the law is correctly laid down by

Parke, B. in Vaughan v. Watt (9), where he says: "It ought therefore to have been left to the jury whether the defendant had a bond fide doubt as to the title to the goods, and, if so, whether a reasonable time for clearing up that doubt had elapsed." Assuming that the defendant here had a bond fide doubt existing as to the title, still the question remains whether a reasonable time for clearing up the doubt had elapsed. This view of the law was also taken by the Court of Common Pleas in Towne v. Lewis (10). The marginal abstract to that case is rather calculated to mislead. It appears from the report that Wilde, C.J. there left it to the jury to say whether the defendant meant to dispute the plaintiff's title to the bill, or whether he meant to send it to the plaintiff when he could obtain it. It appears, when the case came before the Court, that Wilde, C.J. said: "No doubt, the conduct of the defendant was evidence whence the jury might infer whether or not the defendant had been guilty of a conversion." The law, therefore, having been, in my opinion, properly established by the authorities which I have cited, it remains to apply it to the present case. Here the defendant is not in the position of an ordinary person. He is a wharfinger, and is bound to act with promptitude in his business, otherwise he may do great injury to the property of those who deposit their goods with him. Certainly, a very short time had elapsed between the coming in of the attachment and the commencement of the action; but a considerable time had passed since the defendant had known that Henry & Co. had parted with all their property in the wine. The jury were bound to take all these facts into their consideration.

Without giving any opinion whether the verdict could have been satisfactory if it had been found for the defendant, it is sufficient for us to say that there was evidence of a conversion proper to be submitted to the jury.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

1864. } EVANS AND OTHERS v. JONES
Nov. 16. } AND OTHERS.

Debtor and Creditor—Assignment for Benefit of Creditors—Void and Fraudulent Deed—13 Eliz. c. 5.

W. B., on the 3rd of December 1862, in pursuance of a resolution passed, on the 25th of November 1862, at a meeting of his creditors, executed an assignment of the whole of his property to the plaintiffs, as trustees, to pay and discharge rateably all the debts due and owing from W. B. to his creditors (being such persons as would have been entitled to rank as creditors in bankruptcy if the said W. B. had been adjudged bankrupt upon a petition for that purpose filed on the 25th of November 1862):—Held, that the deed was not void and fraudulent as against creditors within 13 Eliz. c. 5.

This was a SPECIAL CASE, without pleadings, stated by order of Bramwell, B. under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1862—

On the 19th of November 1862 a writ of summons was issued, under the Bills of Exchange Act, at the suit of the defendants, against one William Buss, as the holder of a bill of exchange, accepted by the said Buss for 78*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*

On the same day another writ of summons under the same act was issued against Buss, at the suit of one of the defendants, as the holder of a bill of exchange for 22*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, accepted by Buss.

Judgment was signed in both actions on the morning of the 3rd of December 1862 at 11:30 o'clock.

On the same morning at 10 o'clock Buss, in pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of his creditors, held on the 25th of November 1862, made an assignment by deed, for the considerations therein mentioned, to the plaintiffs as trustees for the benefit of creditors.

The deed was executed by Buss and the trustees and one Humphreys (party to the said deed of the third part) at the hour of 10 in the morning of the 3rd of December; but it had previously been assented to, and was afterwards executed, by a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of Buss whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, but not by the plaintiffs (the present defendants) in either of the above actions, and all the requirements of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, with respect to trust-deeds for the benefit of creditors have been fulfilled with respect to the said deed within the time limited by the statute, the deed being registered on the 24th of December 1862.

One Charles Hilton had been, on the 25th of November, sent to take possession of the stock-in-trade, articles and effects of Buss, by and on behalf of the proposed trustees under the assignment, in contemplation of the said assignment being executed. Hilton accordingly took possession of the said stock-in-trade, articles and effects on behalf of the trustees; and on the morning of the 3rd of December, after the execution of the assignment by the several parties thereto, and before the judgment was signed, was instructed to hold possession on behalf of the trustees.

On the same morning of the 3rd of December execution was issued in both actions against Buss, and at 12 o'clock at noon on that day writs of fi. fa. were delivered to the sheriff to be executed, and immediately afterwards the sheriff's officer went to the warehouse of Buss and produced his warrant to him. Hilton then informed the sheriff's officer that he was in possession of the goods and effects of Buss on behalf of the trustees, but he did not produce any authority or any deed or copy of deed when asked to produce the same.

The sheriff's officer then left a man on the premises on his behalf under these executions and went away. Hilton told the sheriff that if he removed the goods he would do so at his peril, but later in the same day the sheriff removed the goods to other premises for sale.

Written notice of the assignment was, after the seizure and in the course of the same day, sent on behalf of the trustees, by post, to the attornies of the plaintiffs in both the actions, and was received by them the next day, the 4th of December, and a like notice was also, after the seizure and removal, sent to the sheriff, who was required to withdraw from possession of the said goods, but he refused to do so, and insisted on retaining possession. Previously to this, neither the defendants nor their attorneys had any notice of any deed having been executed by Buss.

The goods were afterwards, on the morning of the 4th of December, returned to Buss's premises in pursuance of an arrangement that this should be done, and that the trustees should deposit the amount of the levies with bankers in the joint names of the trustees and of the attorneys for the plaintiffs in both the above actions to abide the event of this case. This arrangement was carried out.

Some of the creditors of Buss held bills of exchange, as securities for their debts, at the time of the execution of the deed by Buss, which became due between the 25th of November and the 3rd of December 1862. The amounts of the debts for which such bills of exchange were held were taken into account in estimating the three-fourths of the creditors of Buss, as hereinbefore mentioned.

The Court was to have the power of drawing inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the execution creditors were entitled as against the trustees to the proceeds of the goods so seized by the sheriff, and which are comprised in the deed of assignment hereinbefore mentioned. If the Court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment was to be entered up for the plaintiffs, with costs of suit, and the sum of 125*l.* was to be given up to the plaintiffs, less the dividend due to the defendants as creditors under the deed. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment of non pros., with costs of defence, was to be entered up for the defendants, and the sum of 125*l.* was to be given up to the defendants. If the Court should be of opinion that the execution creditors were entitled, as against the trustees, to part of the proceeds of the goods so seized by the sheriff, then judgment of non pros., with costs of defence, was to be entered up for the defendants, and a corresponding part of the sum of 125*l.* was to be given up to the defendants, the residue thereof being given up to the plaintiffs.

The deed mentioned in the case was an indenture, made on the 3rd of December 1862, between William Buss, of 109, Upper Thames Street, in the city of London, provision-merchant, of the first part, and George William Evans, of Lower Thames Street, broker, Thomas William Keogh, of Upper Thames Street, provision-merchant, and Edmund Phillips, of London Street, provision-merchant, of the second part; Nathaniel Humphreys of the third part; and the several persons, companies and partnership firms whose names and seals are set and affixed in the schedule hereto (being respectively creditors of the said William Buss), and all other the creditors of the said William Buss of the fourth part. And it recited that, "whereas the said William Buss has for some time past carried on the business of a provision-merchant at 109, Upper Thames Street, under the style or firm of Buss & Leadham; and whereas the said William Buss being indebted to divers persons in divers sums of money, he, on the 25th of November 1862, called a meeting of his creditors, at which meeting it was resolved by all the creditors of the said William Buss who were present or represented at such meeting, that the said William Buss should execute an assignment of all his estate and effects, to be wound up and administered in like manner (as far as the difference in circumstances would admit) as the same would be wound up and administered in bankruptcy if a petition for adjudication were filed against him on the day of the date of the resolution now in recital, and that the said G. W. Evans, T. W. Keogh and E. Phillips should be the trustees of such assignment, and Messrs. Honey, Son & Humphreys the managers; and that the said assignment should contain a release to the said W. Buss, and should give the trustees (to be used at their discretion absolutely) all such rights, powers and authorities as under the bankrupt laws they or the creditors could or might, with the authority, approbation or consent of the Court or otherwise, obtain or exercise in bankruptcy, or such of them as would be obtained or exercised under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, including power to grant or make such allowances to the said William Buss as might be made in bankruptcy, and that the said assignment should be registered in bankruptcy, and that in the mean time the resolution now in recital should be deemed to be an instrument within the meaning of section 192.

of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and should be registered under the same if considered expedient by the trustees, and that the signatures of the creditors to the said resolution, or to the deed to be prepared in pursuance thereof, should be without prejudice to their rights against third parties, or to any securities they might hold or be entitled to the benefit of." And it granted and assigned the whole of W. Buss's property, except his wearing apparel, to the above-named trustees, upon trust to collect and convert the same into money, and then upon trust thereout in the first place to pay all costs and expenses of such collection, &c. and all expenses incidental to any meeting of creditors held as preliminary to the deed; and in the second place to pay all costs and expenses incidental to the execution of the trusts and provisions of the deed; and in the third place to pay and discharge rateably and without any preference or priority all the debts due and owing from the said W. Buss to the said creditors (being such persons as would have been entitled to rank as creditors in bankruptcy if the said W. Buss had been adjudicated bankrupt upon a petition for that purpose filed on the 25th of November 1862); and it was thereby agreed and declared that if, after making the several payments aforesaid, there should remain any surplus of the said estate and effects, monies and premises, the said trustees or trustee should stand possessed of such surplus upon trust for the said W. Buss, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns absolutely. And it contained a release and discharge to W. Buss from all demands, claims and debts of all his creditors.

Hannen (Lord with him), for the plaintiffs.—The question is, whether or not the execution creditor is entitled to hold the goods seized under the writ of fi. fa. against the trustees of the deed. Judgment was signed at 11:30 A.M. on the 3rd of December 1862. On the same 3rd of December, at 10 o'clock, the execution debtor executed the deed in pursuance of a resolution of the 25th of November 1862. Now the deed contains an absolute assignment of all the debtor's property; therefore at common law such property under the deed passes to the trustees; it lies on the other side to displace the common-law operation of the deed. It may perhaps be argued that inasmuch as judgment was signed on the same day that the deed was executed, the judgment will take priority over the deed, on the authority of the cases of The Queen v. Edwards (1) and Wright v. Mills (2). The first was the case of an extent at the suit of the Crown, and no doubt in such cases the goods are bound from the date of the judgment; but the same rule does not hold with regard to writs of fi. fa., for, by the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97.) the goods are not bound until actual seizure. Again, if the property passed to the trustees under the deed, the sheriff had no right to seize. The only restraint upon the property passing is that imposed by the act which requires that bills of sale shall be registered—the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. Then either the act must be complied with or the case does not fall within the act. It does not come within the act, for by the 7th section "assignments for the benefit of the creditors of the person making or giving the same" are excluded from the operation of the act. The Court then called on—

Hayes, Serj. (Thrupp with him), for the defendants.—The deed is fraudulent under 13 Eliz. c. 5. The defendants are judgment creditors, and as such are defeated and delayed in obtaining the costs of their judgment. If the defendants can come in under this deed and claim an equal benefit with other creditors, then the deed would not be void within the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5; for Pickstock v. Lyster (3) is an authority to shew that the deed would not be void under that statute, though made to delay the defendants of their execution. Owen v. Body (4) and James v. Whitbread (5) shew that if a deed excludes any creditor it is void under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. It must be a deed for the benefit of all creditors. Now, to entitle the defendants to the costs of their judgment, it is essential that the judgment should be obtained before the bankruptcy of Buss. The 181st section of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, is express on this point: it enacts "that if any plaintiff in any action at law or suit in equity, or petitioner in bankruptcy or lunacy, shall have obtained any judgment, decree or order against any person who shall thereafter become bankrupt for any debt or demand, in respect of which such plaintiff or petitioner shall prove under the bankruptcy, such plaintiff or petitioner shall also be entitled to prove for the costs which he shall have incurred in obtaining the same, although such costs shall not have been taxed at the time of the bankruptcy." Here the judgment was signed on the 3rd of December. The same day the deed was executed; but the signing of the judgment, being a judicial act, relates to the first moment of the day when it was signed; and, if there was nothing in the deed to prevent it, the defendants would be entitled to prove for the costs, because the judgment was obtained before the bankruptcy. But the trust contained in the deed is limited only to those persons who would have been entitled to rank as creditors in bankruptcy if the said William Buss had been adjudged bankrupt on the 25th of November 1862. By this clause of the deed the defendants are precluded from proving for the costs of their judgment, because, if the debtor is to be treated as having been adjudged bankrupt on the 25th of November, the adjudication would be prior to the judgment.

Hannen, in reply.—In order to avoid a deed under the statute of Elizabeth there must be fraud, and fraud is a question for the jury—Twyne's case (6). A mere mistake in the deed will not avoid it. There is no suggestion here that there is fraud, or any fraudulent intention of excluding any creditor; nor is it a voluntary deed, because the assignment is made for a valuable consideration: it is made in consideration of the creditors releasing their rights. Then, does the deed exclude any creditor? It recites that Buss, the debtor, on the 25th of November 1862, called a meeting of his creditors, at which it was resolved that he should execute an assignment of all his estate and effects, to be wound up and administered in like manner as the same would be wound up and administered in bankruptcy, if a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy were filed against him on the day of the date of the resolution; and then the deed conveys the property to trustees for such as would have been entitled to rank as creditors in bankruptcy: not, as has been suggested; as if Buss had been adjudged bankrupt on the 25th of November 1862, but as if he had been adjudged bankrupt on a petition filed on the 25th of November 1862. The defendants were creditors on the 3rd of December; then, by virtue of the 181st section of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, they may be entitled to the costs de sacramento; but whatever the defendants' rights may be under that section, they are in no way deprived of them by the deed.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The question is, whether the execution creditor is entitled to retain the fruits of his judgment and execution, or whether the trustees under the deed are entitled to the proceeds of the goods. We are all of opinion that the execution creditor is not entitled to retain the goods as against the trustees. It is perfectly clear that the deed is not void under the statute of Elizabeth. All the requirements of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, having been complied with, I think that this is a good deed within the meaning of that act. There is no foundation for the argument that there is any intention, as gathered from the deed, to exclude any creditor from executing it.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The deed is effectual to pass the property to the trustees, unless it be void under the statute of Elizabeth. Now, in order that a deed should be a void deed under that statute, there must be some real fraud; for instance, something amounting to an absolute untruth. This deed is perfectly honest; and, to my mind, not a void deed under the statute of Elizabeth.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the deed is not void under the statute of Elizabeth. It is argued that the judgment creditor could not prove for his costs: the deed does not take away any right the creditor had. Whatever rights he may have as to proving for his costs, he still retains them.

PIGOTT, B.—It is quite clear that the effect of the deed with regard to the execution creditor proving his debt is the same as if the defendant had been made a bankrupt and the execution creditor had then proved. This deed does not at all remove him from that position.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

1864. { THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v.
Nov. 21. { THE COUNT AND COUNTESS
BLUCHER DE WAHLSTATT.

Legacy and Succession Duties—Domicil.

Testatrix, an unmarried Englishwoman, in 1849 went to reside abroad at the house of her married sister at B, in Germany. She resided there, contributing towards the expenses of housekeeping, until 1863, in which year she died. Her property consisted of money invested in English securities, but she also possessed a valuable library, which she caused to be transported to B. She occasionally came over to England with her married sister to visit her friends, and while in England in May 1854 she made her will, describing herself as now on a visit to my sister C, bequeathing her property to trustees to pay the annual income to her sister for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and with a power of appointment to her sister by deed or will. The female defendant, as sole executrix, proved the will in the Probate Court. The testatrix told her sister that if she survived her she should continue to live in Germany, and that nothing would induce her to return to England, except on an occasional visit. She also named the churchyard where she wished to be buried, and where she was afterwards buried:—Held, that her acts and declarations did not shew a sufficient intention to change her domicil; and, assuming she intended to give up her English domicil, that until she acquired a new domicil, her English domicil continued; and that the Crown was entitled to legacy duty.

Held, also, on the authority of Re Capdevielle (1) and Wallop's Trusts (2), that the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51.) applies to all persons wherever domiciled.

This was an information by the Attorney General, to obtain from the defendant Madeline Countess Blucher, who is the sole executrix of the will of Justina Davidson Dallas, spinster, deceased (hereinafter referred to as the testatrix), payment of the legacy duty which had become due to Her Majesty, in respect of the personal estate of the testatrix in case she were at the time of her death domiciled in England, or payment of the succession duty which had become due in respect of the same estate, or some part thereof, in case the domicil of the testatrix at the time of her death were not English.

The questions for the decision of the Court are, whether the testatrix was at the time of her death domiciled in England, and if not, whether succession duty is payable in respect of such part of her personal estate as was at the time of her death situate in this country.

The testatrix was the sister of the defendant Madeline Countess Blucher, and died at Count Blucher's house, in Baden-Baden, some time in or shortly before the month of September 1863. She was the daughter of English parents (her father, Sir Robert Dallas, having formerly been Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas) and was born in the year 1804, at Brighton, in the county of Sussex, and she continued to reside in some part of the United Kingdom till 1849; when, in consequence of the death of her mother and sole surviving parent Lady Dallas, she left England and went to reside with her sister, the defendant Madeline Countess Blucher and the Count her husband, and continued to reside with them, sometimes at Baden-Baden and at other times at Berlin (paying occasional visits to this country), down to the time of her death as before mentioned.

On the occasion of one of these visits, which took place in the year 1854, and whilst she was staying at the house of her sister, the wife of Lieut.-Col. Passy, No. 1, Cumberland Terrace, Regent's Park, London, the testatrix made and executed in the manner and with the formalities required by the laws of this country with respect to wills, her last will and testament in writing, which, so far as it is material here to state the same, was in the following terms: "I Justina Davidson Dallas, now on a visit to my sister Catherine, the wife of Lieut.-Col. Passy, at her residence, No. 1, Cumberland Terrace, Regent's Park, in the county of Middlesex, spinster, do hereby make my last will, and I appoint and request my cousin Henry Davidson, of Lime Street Square, in the city of London, and my nephew Robert William Dallas, of Manor House, Kington, in the county of Warwick, Esquires, to be trustees in carrying the same into execution; and I do hereby give to them, their heirs, executors and administrators, all estates which may be vested in me as trustee or mortgagee, subject nevertheless to the trusts and equities affecting the same; and I also give to them all my real and personal estate which may belong to me or be subject to my disposal at my death, and I direct that the annual income thereof shall be paid to my sister Madeline Countess Blucher for her life, for her own sole and separate use without power of anticipation, and that after her death as well the capital as the income of all my said property, shall be paid and applied in such manner as she shall by any deed or writing or by her last will duly executed appoint." And the testatrix appointed her said sister Madeline Countess Blucher to be sole executrix of her will, as by production of the said will or the probate, or an office copy thereof will appear.

The defendant Madeline Countess Blucher, with the assent of the count her husband, duly proved the said will in the principal registry of Her Majesty's Court of Probate on the 26th of September 1863, and thereby became and is now the sole personal legal representative of the said testatrix, and she has possessed herself of all the personal estate of the said testatrix, which was of very large amount, and much more than enough for payment of her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, all of which have in fact been some time since paid. The personal property in this country belonging to the testatrix at the time of her death consisted (as is alleged by or on behalf of her said executrix) of a cash balance of 298*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* in the hands of her bankers, a sum of 908*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* due to her for principal and interest from Messrs. Davidson & Co., and also a sum of 400*l.* stock in the Bank of England, a sum of 600*l.* East India Stock, a sum of 8,765*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.* consolidated 3*l.* per cent. Bank annuities, a sum of 1,356*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. Bank annuities, and a sum of 9,473*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* new 3*l.* per cent. Bank annuities, all respectively standing in her name in the proper books kept for that purpose. The testatrix was also owner of other personal estate which was situate abroad, but the Attorney General is ignorant as to the particulars thereof.

The defendant Madeline Countess Blucher has not paid any legacy or succession duty in respect of any part of the personal estate of the said testatrix, notwithstanding that application has been made to her requiring her to do so, and she declines to pay any duty whatever in respect thereof, alleging that she is advised that the testatrix was not at the time of her death domiciled in England, but was domiciled in Baden-Baden, and that consequently no duty whatever is payable in this country in respect of her personal estate.

The Attorney General insists, on the contrary, that the testatrix retained her original English domicile down to and at the time of her death, and that therefore all her personal property wherever situate is liable to payment of legacy duty. And that even if it should appear that the testatrix has acquired a foreign domicile, succession duty is payable to the Crown in respect of all the part at least of her personal property which was at the time of her death actually situate in this country, and that in either case the defendant Madeline Countess Blucher, as such executrix as aforesaid, is liable to pay such legacy or succession duty as may be found to be payable accordingly.

The answer to the information, so far as is material to the present case, was as follows:

Justina Davidson Dallas, spinster, in the said information mentioned, was the sister of me Madeline Countess Blucher de Wahlstatt.

The said J. D. Dallas was the daughter of English parents. Her father, Sir Robert Dallas, was formerly Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

The said J. D. Dallas was born in the year 1804, at Brighton, in the county of Sussex, and she continued to reside with her parents in some part of the United Kingdom until the year 1849, where her mother, who had survived her father, died.

Shortly after the death of the said Lady Dallas, the said J. D. Dallas left England and came to reside with us at Baden-Baden aforesaid, and from the time of her so leaving England as aforesaid, until her death, the said J. D. Dallas always resided with us, and during that period she had no other home or place of residence.

On leaving England the said J. D. Dallas discharged her English maid and took a German maid into her service, and she caused a large and valuable library of books (which was the only movable property belonging to her in the United Kingdom, with the exception of her money invested there) to be sent, and the same were accordingly sent, to her abroad, and she thenceforward kept the same in our house. She had no real estate of any kind, nor any other property whatever, except her clothes, trinkets, and the like, and the said invested money. She never returned to this country or left Baden-Baden, except for a few occasional visits, which she always made in my company, and which took place in the years 1850, 1854, 1857 and 1859, and since which last-named year she never left Baden-Baden to the time of her death.

From the year 1849, she always contributed her share towards the expenses of our housekeeping. She often told me, the said Countess Blucher de Wahlstatt, that if she were to survive me she should still continue to live in Germany, thereby meaning, as I believe, in Baden-Baden or the neighbourhood, and that nothing would induce her to return to England, except on an occasional visit to one of her sisters.

In the year 1854, she named to me the churchyard at Lichtenthal, near Baden-Baden, as the place where she wished to be buried. We believe she never altered that wish, and in compliance therewith we have buried her there.

About two years before her death an additional room was built, solely for her accommodation, to the house in which we were then living and still live at Baden-Baden, and which house is the property of me, the said Gustave Count Blucher de Wahlstatt.

On the 1st day of March 1854 the said J. D. Dallas made a holograph will at Baden-Baden, by which she bequeathed all her property to me Countess Blucher, independent of my husband, and requested her cousin H. Davidson and her nephew R. Dallas to become trustees for the execution of the same, and she appointed me Countess Blucher sole executrix of her now stating will. And the now stating will was, we believe, duly executed so as to be a proper formal will in Baden-Baden aforesaid.

Shortly after making the last-stated will, J. D. Dallas came to England on a visit to her sister Catherine, wife of Lieut.-Col. Passy, who resided at 1, Cumberland Terrace, Regent's Park, and whilst there she made a will, dated the 6th of May 1854, which was, we believe, her last will and testament, and which is, we believe, accurately stated in the information.

We believe that such last-mentioned will was duly executed and attested, so as to be a proper, formal and effectual testamentary instrument both in Baden-Baden and in this country.

On the 15th of June 1863 J. D. Dallas died at our house at Baden-Baden, and, as we believe, without having revoked or altered the last-stated will. No legacy or succession duty has been paid in this country in respect of any part of the property, and I, Countess Blucher, submit that none is payable.

We submit that J. D. Dallas was for some years prior to the time of her death domiciled at Baden-Baden, and that her personal property can only be affected by the law of her domicile, and that the revenue laws and fiscal regulations of any country in which such personal property or any part thereof happened to be locally situate at the time of her death ought not to apply and do not apply to such personal property, otherwise it would follow that the same might be doubly taxed, viz., both by the country in which the deceased was domiciled, and also by that in which such property was locally situate; and that the personal property of a natural-born subject of England domiciled here might, if locally situate in another country, be subject to a like double tax.

The Attorney General, The Solicitor General, Locke, and Hanson (of the Chancery bar), for the Crown.—The questions for the Court are, whether the Crown is entitled to legacy duty, and if not, whether it is entitled to succession duty. If the testatrix was domiciled in England, it is clear that legacy duty attaches; if, however, the Court should be of opinion that she is not domiciled in England, then the Crown will claim succession duty, on the authority of the cases Re Capdevielle (1) and Re Wallop's Trusts (2). Was the testatrix then domiciled in England? Her domicile of origin was clearly English. She lived in England until 1849, and then, on the death of her surviving parent, went to live with her sister abroad. If the facts and her conduct be looked at, instead of her declarations, they all tend to shew an English domicile. Her property is in England. She from time to time revisits England, and makes her will in England—which is an English will, admitted to probate in England, and has to be administered according to the peculiar principles and doctrines of the English Court of Chancery. She never had a house of her own abroad, but lived with her sister, and contributed to the expenses of the housekeeping. Then what is her declaration? It is that if she survived her sister, she would continue to reside in Germany—she does not say Baden-Baden, but Germany generally. There is no evidence of the testatrix having any settled preference for Baden-Baden. If then she has changed her domicile, in what part of Germany is her new domicile? There is also a declaration that she wished to be buried in a particular churchyard, but that could only mean if she died at Baden-Baden. Suppose she had died while on a visit to her sister in London, surely it could not have been her intention that in such case she should have been buried at Lichtenthal. Neither of these declarations are sufficiently definite. The definition of domicile, laid down by Mr. Justice Story, c. 3. s. 56, and to be found in the old authorities—Aikman v. Aikman (3)—is narrowed by the definition given, by Lord Cranworth, in Whicker v. Hume (4) and Moorhouse v. Lord (5). In the last case he says, "In order to acquire a new domicile a man must intend quatenus in illo exere patriam. It was not enough that a man merely meant to take another house or to go to some other place, and that on account of his health or for some other reason he thought it tolerably certain that he had better remain there all the days of his life. A man did not lose his domicile of origin or his presumed domicile merely because he went to some other place that suited his health better, unless he meant, either on account of his health or from some other motive, to cease to be a Scotchman and become an Englishman, a Frenchman, or a German." That definition, though thought to be too extensive, was substantially adopted by this Court in Re Capdevielle (1), and is applicable to the present case. The sole reason the testatrix went to Baden-Baden was because her sister resided there. It is not contended that it is necessary, to obtain a foreign domicile, that the testatrix should take an oath of allegiance to a foreign prince, nor that she should obtain a municipal domicile; but there must be on her part an intention to renounce the character of an Englishwoman as far as she can. She has not done so. Her acts negative any such intention, and her declarations when examined are not inconsistent with her acts. With regard to the question whether succession duty is payable, that point has been decided in favour of the Crown in Re Capdevielle (1), following the case of Wallop's Trusts (2). Turner, L.J. in that case says, "Not only is the act, in the 2nd section, which defines what shall be deemed a succession, wide and general in its terms, but the definition there given extends to and embraces not only testamentary dispositions, but dispositions of every description, by way of settlement or otherwise, and dispositions not only of personal but of real property also. The act, therefore, was clearly intended to extend to cases which can in no way be affected by the rule that mobilia sequuntur personam."

They also cited Thomson v. the Advocate General (6).

J. D. Coleridge and E. E. Kay, for the defendant.—First, as to the legacy duty. Did the testatrix acquire a foreign domicile? Taking the law with respect to a change of domicile to be as decided in Re Capdevielle (1), and the definition of domicile in Moorhouse v. Lord (5) to be correct, and that a person to acquire a new domicile must intend quatenus in illo exuere patriam, what more could the testatrix do, short of naturalization—which, it is admitted, is not necessary—than she has done to shew such an intention? At her mother's death she goes to Baden-Baden, to her sister. She discharges her English maid and engages a foreign maid; lives with her sister, not as a visitor, but paying her share of the expenses of the establishment. She takes with her a valuable library of books, which is all the movable property she has; she therefore takes everything with her that she can take, and she never returns to this country, except with her sister, and then only to visit her friends. Apart from the fact that the Countess Blucher is married, the testatrix is in the same position. Then, there is her declaration that after her sister's death she should continue to live in Germany, by which it is believed she meant Baden-Baden, and that nothing could induce her to return to England, except on an occasional visit; and that declaration is uncontradicted. There is also her declaration as to the place where she wished to be buried; and in her will she describes herself as on a visit to her sister.

[POLLOCK, C.B. — She does not style herself of Baden-Baden. Is not the will just as if she had said, by this act I retain my English domicile?]

No, because she makes a will at Baden-Baden, and for fear that there should be a doubt as to the validity of that will, she makes another one in England, about which there can be no doubt. What more could an unmarried lady do to acquire a new domicile than to go abroad, live and die abroad, and express her intention never again to return to live in England? As to whether she intended to acquire a Prussian domicil or one at Baden-Baden, it is sufficient for the defendant to shew that the testatrix intended to acquire a foreign domicile. It is immaterial what other she did acquire. It is incumbent on the defendant, in order to shew that the testatrix intended to acquire a foreign domicile, to make out two things: first, the factum of residence abroad; secondly, the animus manendi. The first is clear and indisputable; and it is submitted that there is sufficient evidence on the other point to constitute a foreign domicile. With regard to the second point, as to whether succession duty is chargeable against the defendant, it is admitted that the cases of Re Capdevielle (1) and Wallop's Trusts (2) are decisive on the point, and cannot be questioned in this court.

The Attorney General was not called upon to reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—There can be no doubt, adhering to the doctrine laid down in the recent case of Capdevielle (1), that the judgment of this Court must be for the Crown, on the ground that, at any rate, succession duty will be payable. I believe we are all prepared to give judgment upon the other point, namely, that there is no sufficient evidence that this lady had changed her domicile. Probably if you had asked the lady herself she would have said, I know nothing about domicile; I know nothing about the law of domicile; I had no intention of becoming a German instead of an English lady. It is very true that as long as my sister lives, I certainly mean to live with her; but I cannot exactly say whether, if I should survive her, and should have some surviving relatives in England, I may possibly not go back to my own country; but I shall go back with very great reluctance, for I prefer living in the same country with my sister. But that is a totally different thing from a change of domicile; and when Mr. Coleridge asked the question, "in what way is an English lady to change her domicile?" the answer is, that this does not change her domicile. It is very difficult to say how a change in the domicile of an English lady, who has property in England, and who has no occupation anywhere, can be effected. With respect to some of the matters which have been alluded to, such as dismissing her English maid, and taking into her service a German maid, and desiring to be buried in a particular churchyard—which can only mean, I think, if she was then or about that time to die—I cannot agree with the argument that, to an unprejudiced mind, that would be considered satisfactory evidence of change of domicile; and it is not calculated, in my opinion, to produce the least impression upon an unprejudiced mind, especially with reference to an English lady who retains all her property in this country. If she was likely to stay for some time in Germany—and she probably intended to stay some time there—that she may have taken her books with her is an exceedingly likely matter. She, however, left all her English property to English trustees, and, as the Attorney General has very justly observed, subject to the English law. Under these circumstances, I am distinctly of opinion that there is no sufficient evidence to justify the Court in coming to the conclusion that she did, in point of fact, mean to change, or had, in point of fact, changed her domicile. The judgment, therefore, is for the Crown upon both the points raised by the Attorney General.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think that there is no distinct evidence of change of domicile, and there cannot be a change of domicile unless a new domicile is acquired—the original domicile remains until a new one is acquired. There seems to have been some doubt entertained by my Brother Martin in Capdevielle's case (1); whether the law as to what is necessary to shew a change of domicile has been altered; whether the rule is to be taken to the extent of the language used, that is to say, that a man must give up his country as far as it is in his power; whatever may be the law as to that part of the case, and assuming for a moment that there was evidence that this lady intended to give up her domicile in England, if she has not done so, she cannot acquire a new domicile somewhere else,—and there is not sufficient evidence of that. Without making any captious criticism upon the word “Germany,” supposing that she did not intend to live in England any longer, and that the only place where she did intend to live was wherever her sister might live for the time being, after her death there would be, I think, some new abode to be looked for, possibly somewhere in Germany; but as she was, to adopt an expression used during the argument, personally attached to her sister and not locally attached to any place, I think that there was no acquisition of a new domicile, and, consequently, no loss of the domicile of origin.

CHANNELL, B.—Considering the arguments which have been addressed to the Court in this case, I am of opinion that the decision in Re Wallop's Trusts (2), for the reasons given by my Brother Martin, and which the other members of the Court adopted in the case of Re Capdevielle (1) was a right decision, and, assuming that to be so, the judgment of the Court should be for the Crown. But inasmuch as it is not improbable if we decide this case upon that ground only, that our decision might be reviewed elsewhere, it is manifestly convenient that each member of the Court should express his opinion upon the other question—the question of domicile. I agree with the views expressed by Lord Cranworth, Lord Chelmsford and Lord Kingsdown, in the case of Moorhouse v. Lord (5), adopted as they were by two members of this Court in the case of Re Capdevielle (1). Upon the question of domicile, I think that our decision should be that the testatrix was domiciled in England. I consider it unnecessary to go through the facts, or to repeat the explanation of those facts which has been given by the Lord Chief Baron; I adopt the views which have been already expressed by my Lord and by my learned Brother, because I do not see my way in this case sufficiently clearly to come to the conclusion that she had acquired a new domicile, so as to have divested herself of her domicile of origin. Upon these grounds I concur in thinking that the judgment must be for the Crown.

PIGOTT, B.—I agree with my learned Brethren. I entirely adopt Lord Wensleydale's definition of domicile as given in Aikman v. Aikman (3). The proof lies upon the party who asserts the change of domicile. Then comes the question, whether we are satisfied with the proof given to us by the defendant. There is no doubt that some of the facts would go to shew that there was an intention to change the domicile, for instance, the removal of the books; but then, again, that is an equivocal act, because a person might do so after balancing the question of expense to be incurred in taking them over to Germany for a time, or by depositing them in some warehouse in this country. Again, we have to consider whether the use of the books might not have been another consideration for taking them with her. And, again, the expression that she wished to be buried in a particular churchyard. At that time she may have been ill, and expected soon to die. We know nothing about that but what may be derived from those bare words which are attributed to her. Then there is a third matter, which has been pressed upon us by Mr. Coleridge, viz., the declaration that if she survived her sister she would continue to live in Germany, and that nothing would induce her to return to England. We know nothing of that conversation but that part of it; and it may be that if we knew the whole of what was being discussed between these two sisters, as to whether she would, supposing the countess died, return and live with her sister in England; she may have said, "Nothing will induce me to go to England, I shall live in Germany." Any little addition to that conversation might give a very different complexion to the language used, and to the construction to be put on the points which have been urged. On the other side, the circumstance of her coming to England and taking the pains to make an English will, describing herself as a visitor to her sister in Cumberland Terrace, and not at all going on to say whether permanently resident or having a domicile abroad, tended rather to shew me that she looked upon herself as subject to the English law, and that she found it requisite to make an English will in order to pass her property. I rather draw an inference unfavourable to Mr. Coleridge from the description given of herself in that will. It is enough, however, to say, that I am by no means satisfied that she had an intention to change her domicile.

1864. } PRICE AND ANOTHER v. KIRK-
Nov. 11. } HAM AND ANOTHER.

Surety—Equitable Plea—Rules of Loan Society.

P. borrowed a sum of money from a loan society of which he was a member, and the defendants, who were not members of the society, joined him in a bond and promissory note for the amount. By the terms of the loan P. was to repay the money by weekly instalments. One of the society's rules directed the managing committee to inform the sureties when the instalments were four weeks in arrear, and empowered them to commence legal proceedings against the sureties. P. died in 1859, after having repaid a portion of the loan, but being at the time of his death more than four weeks in arrear. The defendants were not informed of this till an action was brought in 1862 on the bond and note:—Held, that the rules of the society formed no part of the defendants' contract so as to afford them any ground of equitable defence to the action.

Declaration on a bond conditioned for the payment of 50*l.* on the 1st of January 1857, and on a promissory note for the same sum payable on demand.

Second plea to the first count (on equitable grounds), that the bond was made and entered into by the defendants solely as sureties of and for one William Poole, now deceased, to secure the due payment by the said W. Poole to a certain loan society, whereof the plaintiffs were then respectively the treasurer and secretary, of a certain sum of money, to wit, 50*l.*, by instalments of 5*s.* per week, and the bond was made and entered into by the defendants upon the terms and conditions that the defendants should only be liable upon or in respect of such bond to the extent of any deficiency in the amount of the payments to be so made by the said W. Poole, and that in the event of the said W. Poole becoming more than four weeks' payments in arrear, the committee (whereof the plaintiffs were then and during all the time herein mentioned members) should immediately inform the defendants of the same; and it was always material and important to the defendants that the said terms and conditions should be observed and performed by the plaintiffs, of all which the plaintiffs at the time of the making of the bond had always had notice; and the said W. Poole afterwards became and remained more than four weeks' payments in arrear, yet the committee did not, nor did the plaintiffs, nor did any person or persons whosoever, inform the defendant of the same immediately nor until after the expiration of a very great and unreasonable time, nor until after the death of the said W. Poole, and after the death of one William Appleby, a co-surety with the defendants to the plaintiffs in respect of the matters aforesaid; and the defendants during all that time remained and were wholly uninformed and ignorant of the said W. Poole having become in arrear, whereby not only was the risk of the defendants as such sureties materially, unduly and improperly increased, but also thereby the defendants were precluded from enforcing or procuring the payment of the said respective moneys by the said W. Poole, and were and are otherwise damnified.

Third plea (on equitable grounds), that the defendants made the bond solely as sureties for the said W. Poole and for the purpose of securing the payment by him of the money in the second plea mentioned, in the manner therein mentioned, and upon the terms and conditions that the defendants should only be liable to the extent therein mentioned, whereof the plaintiffs always had notice; and the plaintiffs afterwards and without the consent of the defendants, for a good and sufficient consideration in that behalf, agreed to and did forbear and give time to the said W. Poole for payment of the said respective instalments for divers long spaces of time, beyond the time when the same respectively became due, to wit, until the death of the said W. Poole; and by means of the premises the defendants have been greatly prejudiced and damnified.

There were also similar pleas to the count on the promissory note. Issue on all the pleas.

At the trial, before Martin, B., during the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1864, it appeared that the plaintiffs, who were respectively treasurer and secretary of a loan society at Derby, sought to recover the sum of 22*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, being the balance of a loan of 50*l.* advanced by the society to one of its members, W. Poole, on the security of the joint bond and promissory note of Poole, the defendants and one Appleby.

According to the conditions on which the money was lent, Poole was to repay the money by weekly instalments of 5*s.* each. He died in September 1859, after having repaid 27*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*; but at the time of his death he was more than four weeks' instalments in arrear. The defendants were not informed of his being in arrear till the writ was served on them in May 1862, their co-surety Appleby being then dead. They were not members of the society, but they sought to avail themselves of one of the society's rules, which contained, inter alia, the following direction for the committee of management: "If any member who has had his loan advanced become more than four weeks' payments in arrear, the committee are immediately to inform the sureties of the same, and have power to institute legal proceedings against them."

Martin, B. directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, on the ground that the evidence did not disclose any equitable defence; with leave to move to enter the verdict for the defendants; and

Field, having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Hayes, Serj. (J. W. Mellor with him) shewed cause, contending that the sureties had nothing to do with the rules of the society, which formed only a private agreement of the members inter se, and that there was nothing in the rules to prevent the society from suing the sureties at once if the principal were to run away. The rule defining the duties of the committee, and directing them to give notice to the sureties, afforded the sureties no ground of complaint for that not being done which was a mere voluntary direction by the society to its own officers. The case is distinguished from Watts v. Shuttleworth (1), which was cited at the trial; for in that case there was a breach of a contract that the plaintiff should insure, and the discharge of the surety was effected by reason of his position being deteriorated by the default of the creditor, whereas there was no breach of contract here, unless it were open to the defendants to qualify their bond by the rules of the society, with which the sureties had nothing to do—Brown v. Langley (2). Watts v. Shuttleworth (1) shews that if sureties are to be discharged at all, it must be because they have been prejudiced in some way by the acts of the creditor and the principal debtor; and there was no prejudice here, for it was through the indulgence of the plaintiffs that the defendants had not been called on to pay the whole amount of the loan.

L. Kelly (Field with him), contra.—The rule is for the protection of the sureties, and it was proved that they contracted on the faith of it. It formed part of their contract, and they are entitled to every portion of that contract which is for their benefit. That the defendants have an equitable answer appears from Pooley v. Harradine (3) (which was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber by Greenough v. McClelland) (4), where it was held that a defendant, who is apparently a principal, may shew, by way of equitable defence, that he is only a surety. If the defendants had been sued on the bond instanter, an equitable plea might have been pleaded, that the principal had, up to that time, performed his part of the contract. They have been greatly prejudiced by not receiving the notice to which they were entitled, their principal and their co-surety having died in the mean time.

Pollock, C.B.—I believe that we are all of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The general rule of law in respect to matters of this sort, where there is a surety, is this: the creditor may be entitled to make his demand for a certain period and to enforce it in a certain way,—but provided he does not tie his own hands up so as to prevent himself from acting, he is not at all bound to use them. He may abstain from using any right that he possesses; whether that be advantageous to the surety or not is not the question: the thing to be considered is, is the creditor bound to enforce his rights? if he be not bound, the surety cannot compel him to enforce them. No case has been cited in any degree countervailing this doctrine, and therefore the rule ought to be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—It was said, on the part of the defendants, that there was a written contract here that the plaintiffs would not proceed against the sureties for the four weeks. That is the only question raised, and the only one that could be raised. I do not think that anything more could have been said in favour of the defendants than has been said for them. The rule—which is merely a statement of the duties of the committee, the officers who are to inform the surety if default is made in the payment of the money—is not binding as between the society and the surety.

CHANNELL, B.—I do not dispute the doctrine in Pooley v. Harradine (3), that the defendant, though apparently the principal debtor, may shew himself to be only a surety, and may thereby set up an equitable defence. Here, for an equitable defence, the defendants say that the obligees have done something which altered the contract, for instance, that they have given time to the principal debtor. The only contract which the defendants attempt to set up is a contract that entitled them to say they were only to be sued in the event of notice given at the expiration of the four weeks. I do not think there was any contract that they were to be sureties only in that case.

Interrogatories—Discretion of Judge in allowing or rejecting them—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 51.

When interrogatories appear to a Judge to be framed carelessly, and with too much latitude, so as in reality to throw upon him the trouble of settling them, he is not bound to select the one or two, which he may think proper, and to reject the others only, but in sending the whole of them back to be re-formed, he exercises a reasonable discretion with which the Court will not interfere.

This action was brought, by assignees of assignees of a lessor against the lessee, for breaches of covenant, and the declaration charged waste in not repairing the premises, and in removing fixtures therefrom. The plaintiffs applied at chambers for leave to examine the defendant on interrogatories, which Martin, B. refused to allow.

The first three interrogatories referred to the defendant's occupation of the premises, and the nature of the business carried on there. Then followed thirteen interrogatories as to the fixtures, similar in form to the following: "Were there not then (i. e. at the time of the lease being granted) or at any and what other time shelves and a hand-rail in the closet in the front room east second floor?" The 17th interrogatory was as follows: "Have you not removed, or caused to be removed, any and which of the said several fixtures, &c., or any and what other fixtures, &c. from the said premises? The 18th was similar to the 17th, inquiring as to sale of the fixtures; and lastly there was an interrogatory as to documents.

T. H. Baylis moved for a rule to shew cause why the interrogatories should not be administered, contending that the plaintiffs, who were only assignees of assignees of the lessor, were entitled to have such questions answered as the defendant would be bound to answer at the trial, in order to establish the alleged breaches of covenant.—[He cited Zychlinski v. Maltby (1).]

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, C.B. delivered the judgment of the Court (2).—The practice of interrogating either the plaintiff or the defendant is, no doubt, an extremely useful one, and it was a very important addition to the means of obtaining truth and of administering justice when the legislature granted the power. But no suitor has a right to expect that a Judge will take on himself the office of settling interrogatories; and the Court, in my opinion, is a still more unfit instrument to accomplish the object.

It appears to us that my Brother Martin was well warranted in this case in not allowing these interrogatories; and that he was not bound, just because there happened to be one or two interrogatories which might be put, to pick them out and reject the others. The Judge is to exercise a reasonable discretion. If there be one or two interrogatories with reference to a matter that may be questionable, the Judge may well say that the interrogatories, as a whole, ought to be administered, or striking out this or that one, he may allow the others. On the other hand, if he perceive that they have been drawn with a careless and hasty hand, and that all manner of questions are put, taking the chance of their being allowed, which is, in reality, throwing upon the Judge the trouble of settling the interrogatories, and he may properly say, "Take them away; re-form them, and bring them back."

Now, on looking at these interrogatories, I observe that they are extremely objectionable, and that there are several that ought not to be presented at all. The action is brought with reference to certain fixtures, which it was supposed the defendant had improperly removed at the termination of the lease. It is supposed that they were on the premises at the time the lease was granted. Here is one question: "Were there not then (namely, at the date of the lease), or at any and what other time, shelves and a hand-rail in the closet in the front room east second floor?" Now, this is utterly unimportant, except the articles were there at the time the lease was granted, as otherwise the plaintiff had no right to claim any of them. And then again, "Was there not then, or at any other and what time, a wardrobe in the back room west second floor?" It is quite plain that these interrogatories were framed without attention to the time at which the articles ought to have been on the premises for the purpose of giving the landlord a right to inquire about them. Our judgment is, that the rule be refused, with a notice to the parties to apply at chambers with re-formed interrogatories.

Rule refused accordingly.

1864. { M'CANCE v. THE LONDON AND June 20. { NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY

Railway Company—Carrier—Declaration of Value of Thing carried—Effect as an Estoppel.

*The first count of a declaration alleged, that the plaintiff employed the defendants, a railway company, to provide trucks for the carriage of horses of the plaintiff for reward, in consideration whereof the defendants promised that the trucks should be reasonably fit and proper for the carriage of the plaintiff's horses; breach by the defendants in not providing proper trucks, whereby the plaintiff's horses were injured. Second count—that the defendants, as carriers on the railway, having received from the plaintiff certain horses to be conveyed by them on their railway for hire, the said horses were injured in consequence of the defective state of the trucks provided by the defendants, and their negligence and want of care. The defendants paid 25*l.* into court, and the plaintiff claimed damages ultra. At the trial, it appeared, that before the defendants would furnish the trucks, the plaintiff was requested by them to sign, and did sign, a declaration, that the value of each horse did not exceed 10*l.*, and, in consideration of the rate charged for conveyance, that he agreed that they were to be carried entirely at the owner's risk. Evidence was given for the plaintiff that the horses were worth more than 10*l.* each, and it was admitted that, if taken at their real value, 40*l.* was the amount of compensation the plaintiff would be entitled to, but if at 10*l.* each, then 25*l.* was the right amount:—Held, that the declaration of the value of the horses was not part of the contract between the plaintiff and the company, but a* *statement of a fact by the plaintiff assumed and agreed to by the company as the basis upon which the contemplated contract was to be framed; and that consequently the plaintiff was not at liberty afterwards to deny the truth of this conventional state of the facts, nor to shew that the real value of the horses exceeded 10*l.* each.*

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from the decision of the Court of Exchequer.

The facts and documents are set out with great fullness in the report below (1). The following summary is sufficient:

The action was for damage to the plaintiff's horses.

The first count stated that the plaintiff employed the defendants to furnish trucks to carry his horses by their railway for hire; and that the defendants promised that the trucks should be reasonably fit and proper for such purpose; and alleged as a breach that the trucks were not reasonably fit and proper for the carriage of the horses, whereby the horses were injured.

The second count was against the defendants as carriers on their railway, and alleged that by reason of the defective state of the trucks and the negligence of the defendants, the horses, which were delivered to the defendants to carry for hire, were injured.

The defendants paid 25*l.* into court.

Replication—Damages ultra.

At the trial, it appeared that the plaintiff's agent delivered seven horses at the railway station of the defendants to be carried along the line, and that at the time of their delivery to the company he signed a declaration that the value of each horse did not exceed 10*l.*, and that in consideration of the rate charged for the carriage the horses were to be carried at the owner's risk. The company charged a higher rate for the carriage of horses above 10*l.* value. It was agreed that if the jury were entitled to estimate the damage to the horses at their true value, 40*l.* would be the proper amount of the damage, but if the horses were to be assumed to be only of 10*l.* value then the sum paid into court was sufficient.

The Court below held that the defendants were entitled to the verdict.

(1) 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 65.

Brett (C. A. Russell with him), for the plaintiff, the appellant. — The defendants by paying money into court, and pleading no plea traversing the contract alleged, have admitted, that the contract declared on was the true contract on which the horses were carried. The statement therefore signed by the plaintiff that the horses were under the value of 10*l.* each was not admissible in evidence, for the purpose of varying the contract declared upon. No doubt it was admissible for the purpose of affecting the damages, but it was not admissible as an estoppel by agreement. It was not pleaded as an estoppel. It was part of a void stipulation, for the stipulation that the horses were to be at the owner's risk is unreasonable, and therefore void. The statement does not fall under the rule respecting a statement made by one party and believed in by the other, and consequently acted on by the other; for the railway company did not believe that these horses were under the value of 10*l.*, nor did they care what was the true value, if the plaintiff agreed to put no higher value than 10*l.* If the statement was part of the original agreement for the carriage of the horses, it ought to have been stated in the declaration, and if not, the omission should have been pointed out by a proper plea. If it was not part of the agreement the representation is not an estoppel, unless it be made wilfully and with the intent of its being acted on and believed in by the party affected — Best on Evidence, p. 619.

[CROMPTON, J.—Is it necessary that the party should believe this statement if he relies on it and acts on it? Is not this very like the case of Aspitel v. Bryan (2), decided a few days ago in the Exchequer Chamber, on appeal from the Queen's Bench, where by agreement a bill of exchange was drawn and indorsed in the name of a dead man, and the acceptor, a party to the agreement, was held estopped from denying the indorsement?]

The statement is, no doubt, some evidence that the value of each horse was under 10*l.*, but the jury have found as a fact that their value was considerably more. The Court cannot overrule the finding of the jury.

(2) 38 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 328.

Manisty, for the defendants, the respondents, was not called upon.

WILLIAMS, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment below must be affirmed. It is perfectly clear that the question is wholly untouched by any consideration of the point of pleading which has been urged upon us—Clarke v. Gray (3). The declaration need not state anything more than is stated here. It sets out as much as is material for the maintenance of the action. That which merely goes in reduction of damages cannot be pleaded. The next question is, in what light the declaration made by the plaintiff, that the horses were of no greater value than 10*l.*, is to be regarded. It is clear, for the purposes of the question which we are now considering, that it was a mere declaration upon which the contract which the parties contemplated making was to be based, and by which it was to be regulated and governed. It is just the same thing as if at the railway station there had been one department in which contracts were to be made respecting the carriage of horses under the value of 10*l.* and another, or first-class department, for the carriage of horses above that value. If parties intending to make a bargain respecting the carriage of horses were to go to the particular department first mentioned, they would make their bargain upon the footing and understanding that the value of each horse was under the sum of 10*l.* Here it appears in evidence that the contract declared upon was to be regulated and governed by a state of facts understood between the parties, namely, that the horses were under the value of 10*l.* each. It is laid down in my Brother Blackburn's Book on Sales, 163, that where parties have agreed to act upon an assumed state of facts, their rights between themselves are justly made to depend on the conventional state of facts, and not upon the truth. We think that both parties here are bound by the conventional state of facts agreed upon between them.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Arbitration—Making Submission a Rule of Court—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125.) s. 17.

Where two persons agree by deed to refer all matters in dispute which shall arise between them to two arbitrators, one to be chosen by each for that purpose; and on such disputes arising, in pursuance of such agreement the arbitrators are appointed by parol, the submission to arbitration is a parol submission, and therefore cannot be made a rule of Court under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 17.

This was an application for a rule to make a submission to arbitration a rule of Court.

It appeared from the affidavits that one F. T. Maitland, by lease, under seal, in September 1860, demised to J. J. Glaysher a farm and lands, at a certain rent, to hold for the term of eleven years, from the 29th of September 1860, but determinable at the end of the first four years of the said term by six months' notice in writing.

The lease contained a covenant as follows: That J. J. Glaysher, his executors and administrators, shall be paid and allowed by the said F. T. Maitland, his heirs or assigns, at the end or expiration or other sooner determination of this lease, for all the fixtures in and upon the said farm-house and buildings, which have been valued to him on taking possession, and also for the dung made during the last year of his tenancy; for all fallows, provided the same do not exceed one-fourth part of the arable land, and shall not have been ploughed more than four times, and have been landed up during the last time of such ploughing; for all dressings and mixings on the farm, manures, half-dressings of lime or other bought manure only, and underwood down to the stem according to the custom of the country, as well as for all hay, straw, fodder and litter, at a feeding price: such valuation to be made by two indifferent persons to be chosen for that purpose, one by the said F. T. Maitland, his heirs and assigns, and the other by the said J. J. Glaysher, his executors and administrators; and in case of their disagreement in the amount thereof, then by a third person, to be chosen by the two former previous to their entering upon such valuation, whose decision shall be final and conclusive.

The tenancy was duly terminated on the 29th of September 1864, and F. T. Maitland thereupon appointed E. Drawbridge valuer, and J. J. Glaysher appointed C. Marchaut valuer, to make the valuation according to the covenant, and they did, previously to their entering upon the said valuation, choose J. Nash to make the valuation in case of their disagreement. E. Drawbridge and C. Marchant disagreed in the amount of the valuation, and thereupon the said valuation was referred to J. Nash, who made his award in favour of J. J. Glaysher, but omitted certain items of the valuation.

Beresford (Nov. 24), in support of his motion, contended that the covenant in the lease amounted to a submission, which could be made a rule of Court, under the 17th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125.) which provides that "every agreement or submission to arbitration by consent, whether by deed or instrument in writing not under seal, may be made a rule of any one of the superior Courts of law or equity at Westminster, on the application of any party thereto, unless such agreement or submission contain words purporting that the parties intend it should not be made a rule of Court." Parkes v. Smith (1) is in point.

[CHANNELL, B.—In that case the arbitrator was named in the covenant, and it might be the submission was complete; here the arbitrators are not named in the deed, but afterwards the parties meet, and each appoints an arbitrator by word of mouth. The submission in this case seems to me to be a parol submission.]

tion. I apprehend that there is an obvious, clear and positive distinction between a general agreement to refer any matter of dispute and an actual reference of a subject which has become a matter of dispute. If there be a general agreement to refer, and in pursuance of that there be a parol reference, the reference is by parol, although the agreement may be by deed, and this Court cannot make that parol reference a rule of Court. We were pressed to give judgment to-day because this is the last day for moving to set aside the award, as I understand the object of this application was to set aside the award. The judgment of the Court is, that they cannot interfere to make a parol submission a rule of Court, although that parol submission is made in pursuance of a previous written agreement to refer. Mr. Beresford therefore can take no rule.

Lessor and Lessee—Right to Possession of Lease—Executor de son Tort.

To detain, by an administrator, for a title-deed whereby the defendant demised land and premises to the intestate for an unexpired term of fourteen years, the defendant pleaded that the deed was a farming lease, at a yearly rent, with various farming covenants, and that after the death of the intestate, and upon grant of administration the defendant, pursuant to the terms of the lease, re-entered, for breach of covenants, and thereupon the title-deed became the defendant's title-deed, and the lessee ceased to have any interest in it:—Held, that the plea was no answer to the action, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the deed.

To trover and trespass for taking goods of the plaintiff as administrator, the defendant pleaded that the claims arose by reason only of the defendant being executor de son tort of the intestate before grant of administration to the plaintiff, and that before such grant the defendant fully administered all the estate which had come to his hands:—Held, that the plea was bad.

Declaration by the plaintiff, as administrator, with the will annexed, of Henry Hewett, for that the defendants detained from the plaintiff a title-deed of the plaintiff, as administrator, that is to say, a certain indenture of lease made by and between the defendant Edward Sandford of the one part, and the said H. Hewett of the other part, whereby the said defendant demised to the said H. Hewett certain land and premises to hold to the said H. Hewett for the term of fourteen years thence next following, which said term is still unexpired, whereby the plaintiff, as administrator, had been prevented from disposing of the residue of the said term, and of letting the said farm at an increased rent, as he otherwise might and would have done. Second count, for that the defendants converted to their own use, or wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of the goods of the plaintiff, as administrator, that is to say, corn, hay, &c. Third count, for that the defendants seized and took certain growing crops and fixtures of the plaintiff as administrator, and carried away and converted the same to their own use.

Third plea to the first count, that by the indenture of lease the defendant Sandford demised to the said H. Hewett, deceased, all that farm called Holbrook Farm, with the several closes of land thereto belonging, to hold to the lessee, his executors and administrators, from the 25th of March 1856, for the term of fourteen years, yielding and paying the yearly rent of 75*l.*, by equal quarterly payments, and in like manner yielding and paying the further yearly rent of 20*l.* for every acre of meadow or pasture land broken up or converted into tillage without the written licence of the defendant, his heirs and assigns.—[The plea then set out various covenants by the lessee with the lessor, for payment of the rent, taxes and tithes, and 10*s.* towards insurance of the buildings from fire, to provide reed for thatching, and keep the iron-work and glass windows in repair, and provide materials for and pay a moiety of all other expenses attendant upon repair; and also that the lessee should not let or assign the said premises, nor assign the Ninth plea, for a defence on equitable grounds, to the second and following counts, that the claims in those counts mentioned proceeded, arose and occurred by reason only of the defendants being and acting as executors of their own wrong, of the personal estate and effects of the said H. Hewett, deceased, before any grant of any letters of administration to the plaintiff, and before the plaintiff, except by relation, was administrator as aforesaid; and that before the plaintiff, save as aforesaid, was administrator as aforesaid, they fully administered all the personal estate and effects which were of the said H. Hewett, deceased, and which had ever come to the hands of the defendants, as such executors as aforesaid, to be administered, and the defendants had not, at the commencement of this suit, nor had they since had, nor had they any personal estate or effects which were of the said H. Hewett, deceased, in the hands of the defendants as such executors as aforesaid, to be administered.

Beresford, for the plaintiff.—The pleas do not afford any answer to the action. The facts alleged in the third plea do not justify the detention of the lease. Hall v. Ball (1) is in point. As to the ninth plea, the authorities are clear that the matters there stated cannot be pleaded. An executor de son tort can give in evidence the payments he has made, but the plaintiff is still entitled to a verdict for nominal damages—1 Williams on Executors, 5th edit. p. 236. There is no distinction between law and equity in this respect; and an application in this case made to the Court of Chancery for an injunction was refused, with costs.

Bullar, for the defendants.—As to the third plea, this case is distinguishable from Hall v. Ball (1). That was the case of a counterpart. It may be gathered from the plea that in this case only one lease was executed by both parties, and that there was no counterpart, for in the case of a counterpart it is usual for the lessor to execute one part and the lessee the other, and the averment here is that the deed was executed by both. But, at all events, each party has such an interest in the deed as to prevent the one maintaining detinue or trover against the other. This case is further distinguishable from Hall v. Ball (1) by the fact that this is a farming lease containing covenants only by the lessee, including a covenant not to assign, and some of these covenants have been broken.

(1) 3 Man. & G. 242; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 285.

In Philips v. Robinson (2) Best, C.J. says, "It is a clear principle of law that the muniments of an estate belong to the person who has the legal interest in it; so that if the plaintiff was originally entitled to receive the deed on request, he was not so at the time of action, for he could only be so entitled so long as the right to the property continued in him." Upon the determination of the lessee's interest by the covenants broken and the re-entry thereon, the lease became the lessor's muniment of title. With respect to the 9th plea, the point raised by it has never been determined, when the question was on the record. It is a good plea at law—Anonymous (3), but, if not, as an equitable plea it may be supported on the ground that it is inequitable to allow an action to proceed to recover a farthing damages.

Beresford was not called on to reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The plaintiff is entitled to judgment. This case scarcely admits of argument, for it is concluded by authority.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment of Tindal, C.J. in Hall v. Ball (1) disposes of the distinctions sought to be drawn between that case and the present. This deed is not a muniment of title. I may observe that it is a common application at chambers on the part of lessors for a copy of the lease in the possession of the lessee, and the order is frequently made on the ground that the lessee is a trustee for the lessor.

BRAMWELL, B.—Independently of Hall v. Ball (1), I think the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. As to the ninth plea, it is consistent with it that the defendants may have applied the assets in payment of their own debt. If such a plea were held good, every creditor would make a scramble for the effects of a deceased debtor. Both pleas are clearly bad.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

1864. } THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v.
June 8.* } LORD LILFORD.

Succession Duty—Succession Duty Act, 1853, (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51.) s. 21.—Effect of Tenant in Tail in Possession acquiring the Fee and dying before Payment of the Instalments.

A tenant in tail, liable to duty on his succession, barred the entail and acquired the fee simple by his own act, and died before the instalments of duty payable on his succession became due:—Held (Pollock, C.B. dissenting), that the instalments were a continuing charge on the property under section 21. of the Succession Duty Act, 1853.

Information to obtain payment of duty in respect of the succession of the defendant's late father Thomas Atherton, Lord Lilford, deceased, in the real property comprised in the will and settlement herein-after stated, the defendant being tenant for life in possession under his father's will. The question was whether, upon the death of the late Lord Lilford, the duty upon his succession ceased to be payable, or whether it was a continuing charge upon the real property in respect of which it was claimed.

Peter Legh (hereinafter referred to as the testator) by will, dated the 9th of October 1787, devised all his manors, lands, &c. in Bratherton and Tarlton, in the county of Lancaster, to Legh Master, the Rev. Legh Hoskin and Richard Orford, for the term of 500 years, upon the trusts therein mentioned, and, subject thereto, to the testator's grandson G. A. Keck for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of G. A. Keck in tail male, with remainder to the testator's grandson P. A. Keck, with remainder to the first and other sons of the said P. A. Keck in tail male, with remainder to the testator's granddaughter E. A. Keck, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the testator's grandson A. L. Atherton for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the said A. L. Atherton in tail male, with remainder to the testator's granddaughter H. Atherton for life, with remainder to her first son in tail male, with remainders over.

(3) 12 Mod. 441; cited in 1 Williams on Executors, 286.

By a codicil the testator revoked this devise, and thereby devised all the said hereditaments unto his sister Ann Legh in fee.

The testator died on the 20th of May 1792. By a settlement dated the 14th of June 1792, Ann Legh conveyed the said hereditaments to Legh Master and Legh Hoskin and their heirs, for and upon the like uses, trusts, and subject to the like term of years, as were mentioned in the will.

G. A. Keck, the first tenant for life, died on the 4th of September 1860, without issue; P. A. Keck, the next tenant for life, died in March 1797, a bachelor; E. A. Keck, the next tenant for life, had issue one son, who died without issue on the 16th of January 1854; A. L. Atherton, the next tenant for life, died in the testator's lifetime, a bachelor. The testator's granddaughter H. Atherton married the Honourable J. Powys, who afterwards became Lord Lilford, and she died on the 11th of August 1820, and the defendant's late father Thomas Atherton Lord Lilford was the first son of that marriage.

Upon the death of G. A. Keck in September 1860 (being after the time appointed for the commencement of "the Succession Duty Act, 1853"), the said Thomas Atherton Lord Lilford, by reason of the dispositions made by the said will and settlement, became beneficially entitled to the property as tenant in tail male in possession, and he became chargeable with succession duty.

By indenture, dated the 5th of November 1860, duly enrolled, in order to defeat the estate in tail male of the said Thomas Atherton Lord Lilford, the said Thomas Atherton granted and confirmed the said property to a trustee for the use of the said Thomas Atherton Lord Lilford, his heirs and assigns for ever.

Thomas Atherton Lord Lilford died on the 15th of March 1861, being competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in the property, and having in fact by will, dated the 24th of February 1841, devised all the hereditaments to which he was entitled to the use of his eldest son, the defendant, and his assigns for life, with limitations over.

The said Thomas Atherton Lord Lilford died before any one of the eight half-yearly instalments of duty payable in respect of his succession had become due; and in answer to applications made to his son and successor, the defendant, for payment, he declined to pay, alleging that upon the death of his father all of the said instalments ceased to be payable; whereas the Attorney General insists, on the contrary, that all the said instalments were a continuing charge on the property in respect of which the same were claimed, and that such instalments were payable by the defendant as the owner for the time being of such property, according to the provisions of the Succession Duty Act.

The Attorney General, The Solicitor General, Locke and Hanson, for the Crown (1).

—The only material points in the narrative of facts are, that the late Lord Lilford, after the passing of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, became entitled as successor under the act to the estate tail, and before his death he barred the entail and became owner in fee simple, and was owner in fee simple at the time of his death; and the question is, whether instalments of duty which became due by reason of the succession taken under a settlement falling into possession after the passing of the Succession Duty Act, continued payable out of the fee simple which belonged to the late Lord and passed by his will. This question arises under sections 21. and 42. of the act; section 42. enacts that "the duty imposed by this act shall be a first charge on the interest of the successor and of all persons claiming in his right in all the real property in respect whereof such duty shall be assessed, and such duty shall also be a first charge on the interest of the successor, or of any trustees for him." If this section stood alone with the 10th section, which imposes the duty, there could be no question that the defendant is liable; but the words of the proviso of section 21. are relied upon by him. That section, after enacting that the interest of every successor, except as therein provided, in real property shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity for his life equal to the annual value of such property, and providing for the payment of the duty by eight half-yearly instalments, contains this proviso: "Provided, that if the successor shall die before all such instalments shall have become due, then any instalments not due at his decease shall cease to be payable, except in the case of a successor who shall have been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in such property, in which case the instalments unpaid at his death shall be a continuing charge on such interest in exoneration of his other property, and shall be payable by the owner for the time being of such interest." The principle to be collected from these provisions is, that the duty is to be charged upon the whole interest of the successor, and upon the whole interest of the property originally charged of every one claiming under him or in his right; but the duty is not made a charge on other people who do not claim through or under him, and for that reason if he shall have died before the instalments have become payable, and has left no continuing interest which anybody can take from him, or under him, or through him, the instalments cease to be payable; but they do not cease to be payable "in the case of a successor who shall have been competent to dispose by will"—of course that means at the time of his death—"of a continuing interest." What is the meaning of "continuing interest"? The interest that will be derived from him after his death. In the case of the tenant for life there is no continuing interest, for upon his death there is an end of it, and the next tenant in tail does not take through him; and therefore the next successor, taking by an independent title, is not operated with the unpaid duty; but there can be no reason why the clause of remission should apply to the case of a man who dies the owner in fee simple where the interest passing at his death is a continuing interest, liable to be charged with all his other debts, contracts, and engagements. Why not, therefore, with this? If a tenant in tail mortgages, and then acquires the fee, the mortgage binds. But if the succession has passed away to some one entitled by a paramount title before the instalments are paid, then the legislature puts the tenant in tail on the same footing with a tenant for life. The Attorney General v. Hallett (2) decides that the words "competent to dispose by will" refer to competency in respect of estate, and not to personal competency.

Mellish and J. Brown, for the defendant.—The only question is, whether the words "who shall have been competent to dispose by will" mean "competent to dispose by will at the time of his own death," or "competent to dispose by will of the succession at the time he came into succession;" because it is admitted, that if he had never barred the entail, the instalments would have ceased. If the words mean "competent to dispose by will at the time of his own death," it follows that if a man, tenant for life, or even for years, acquired the reversion, either by purchase or some subsequent gift from a third person, the instalments would not cease; and, on the other hand, if a man acquires by succession a fee simple, and afterwards re-settles the estate so as to become tenant for life only, and at his death to have no continuing interest, it would follow, from this construction, that the arrears of duty, payable when he acquired the succession, would cease on his death,—absurdities that could not have been contemplated. The only way of avoiding such difficulties is by reading the words as "competent to dispose by will of the succession at the time he came into succession;" and according to ordinary principles of imposing a tax, the state of things at the time of coming into succession must be looked at for the purpose of determining what duty is payable. The words "continuing interest in such property" in the proviso, must be read in connexion with "the interest of every successor," in the commencement of section 21, where they necessarily mean the interest derived by succession.

The Attorney General replied.

MARTIN, B. now delivered the judgment of himself and of CHANNELL, B.—In September 1860, the late Lord Lilford became entitled, as tenant in tail in possession, to certain real property, and became chargeable to succession duty. In November of the same year he executed a disentailing deed, and limited the property to himself in fee. He died in March 1861, having, by his will, devised the property to the defendant for life, who is now in possession of it. At the time of his death, none of the eight half-yearly instalments of duty, payable in respect of his succession duty, had become payable; the defendant has refused to pay them, and this information has been brought to compel payment; the Attorney General insisting that they were a continuing charge on the testator's interest at the time of his death, and are payable by the defendant as owner for the time being of such interest. We think the Attorney General is entitled to judgment. The question depends on the true construction of the 21st section of the Succession Duty Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. By the 42nd section the duty is declared to be a first charge on the interest of the successor, and of all persons claiming in his right; and by the 21st section the interest of the successor in real property shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property, to be valued according to the tables in the Schedule, and the duty chargeable thereon (that is, on the interest of the successor) shall be paid by eight half-yearly instalments. But there is a proviso, that if the successor shall die before the instalments shall become due, the instalments not due at his decease shall cease to be payable, except in the case of a successor who shall have been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in such property. The word "property" in the section means the thing, that is, the land or hereditaments in respect of which the duty is charged. This is clear, as well from the 21st section itself, as from the interpretation clause; and not only was the late Lord Lilford competent to dispose by will of the continuing interest in the property, but he actually did so, and the defendant was the object of his bounty; so that the instalments unpaid at his death were, and are, a continuing charge upon his interest, and are payable by the defendant, who, for the time being, is the owner of such interest. It was argued, that the defendant was by such construction compelled to pay two succession duties, one his own, the other the testator's. This is a fallacy. He is liable, of course, to pay his own succession duty, properly so called; but what he is now required to pay is a charge or debt of the testator, who was the owner in fee simple of the land devised to him; and we think that, not merely does the 21st section of the statute impose the liability, but that reason and good sense and the spirit of the act concur. The testator was liable to the duty. Had he been merely tenant for life, and died within the four years, the instalments unpaid would have ceased to be payable; but he was owner in fee, and why should not his fee simple interest be liable to his debts? Cases were put of a tenant for life and a tenant for years, purchasing the reversion in fee. We do not think there would be any very great difficulty in arriving at a correct conclusion in such cases, but for the present it is sufficient to say, that the case is a devise by will, by an owner of a fee simple acquired by his own acts.

BRAMWELL, B.—In this case it is clear that but for the latter part of section 21. the duty claimed would be due,—due from the deceased Lord Lilford,—and payable, at least, out of his assets. The question then is, if that part of the section causes it not to be due, or if due not a charge on the present defendant, or the estate he has taken. Now it is not easy to understand the reason of the enactment in question. The statute has imposed a duty on successions, or on real property, on successions to it. It has therefore very fairly and reasonably taken each successor's interest to be taxed as not greater than a life interest; because on his death there is another taxable succession. If land is devised to A. for life, on his death it is subject to a fresh succession duty; so it is if it is devised to him in fee. Then, to estimate what shall be paid, the value of his interest is taken to be the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of the property for his life. It is then assessed, and found for better or worse; but, for his convenience, it is made payable by instalments. This being the principle on which the legislature has proceeded, it is difficult to see why the successor to a life estate is relieved from unpaid instalments if he dies before they are due; but not so the successor to a fee. Nor is it easy to see why, if the successor lives four years and a half, he pays all the instalments without return, and no more if he lives fifty years, but has an abatement if he lives under four years and a half. Further, the language of the exception to the proviso is remarkable. It means, I suppose, to say, first, that the instalments shall be payable; secondly, that they shall be a continuing charge on the successor's interest; thirdly, that his other property is to be exonerated; fourthly, that the owner of the land shall pay the duty. The first is enacted by implication only. Whether the last provision exonerates the first successor's executors may be a question, or if it makes the next successor liable beyond his interest; so what would be comprehended by the words "continuing interest" may be doubtful. However, there is the enactment, and it seems to me clear, that whatever the proviso may free, the exception to the proviso makes the owner of the property in respect of which the succession duty was due liable for it, at least to the extent of his interest, when the first successor "shall have been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in such property." The question then is, was the defendant's father so competent? I agree with the Attorney General that this particular case must be decided, and that difficult cases may be suggested, which must be met as they arise. Now, I think Lord Lilford was so competent; in fact, he did it; he did dispose by will of the "continuing interest." No doubt a preliminary step, the disentailing deed, was necessary; but that step was also in his competency, depending solely on his pleasure, whether or not it should be taken. In Saltoun v. the Lord Advocate (3), Lord Campbell, L.C., said, and justly, that this statute being applicable to the whole kingdom, the technicalities of the law of England and Scotland when they differ must be disregarded, and the language of the legislature must be taken in a popular sense: and can it be doubted that in popular language Lord Lilford was competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in this property? Again, in Lord Braybrooke's case (4), the House of Lords held that an estate tail, though technically ended upon the re-settlement of the estates, in reality, for the purposes of the succession duty, continues. See per Lord Kingsdown, and The Attorney General v. Floyer (5). For these reasons, and on these authorities, I think the Crown is entitled to judgment.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I regret that I am unable to come to the same conclusion as my learned Brethren, and the rather because the claim of the Crown seems to me very reasonable, inasmuch as the difference between an estate tail and an estate in fee seems to be (for the purpose of this question) scarcely more than technical; and not only is the claim of the Crown reasonable, but the language of the 21st section (on the true construction of which our judgment, I think, ought to depend) certainly without doing any violence to it, may be fairly read so as to support the claim. But in construing the 21st section of the act, we are bound to look, not merely at the case before us, but at other cases which may arise, and, assuming the construction to be doubtful, to put such a construction as will be uniform and consistent, with reference to all the cases that may come before us for decision.

The claim of the Crown is in amount and in time of payment precisely the same for a succession to an estate in fee simple as to an estate tail or an estate for life; and provided they all exist according to the expectation of life,—that is, unless the tenant in tail or tenant for life prematurely dies,—they all pay exactly the same succession duty, the only difference between them being, that in the event of the death of the tenant in fee before all the instalments are paid, (the claim upon whom seems to have been considered as a debt due to the Crown, whether he lived or died), the unpaid instalments continue to be a charge upon the estate,—not on his property generally, but on his interest in the estate which gave rise to the claim for succession duty. The difference between a tenant in tail and a tenant in fee is not, however, purely technical; the tenant in tail may, by executing a disentailing deed, acquire the fee absolutely, but then he must be of full age, or he cannot execute such a deed at all, and he must be in possession long enough for the preparation and execution of the deed. Supposing him to have executed such a deed, and to have thereby acquired the fee, and become competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in the property, is he, within the expression of the 21st section, a successor "who shall have been competent, &c.," because he has undoubtedly become so? Now, if in the case of a tenant in tail acquiring the fee by executing a disentailing deed, we read the words of the 21st section as if they had been "shall have been competent, or shall become competent"; in other words, if we construe the 21st section so as to include the successor, who after the succession becomes competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest, we must construe it in the same way in all cases, and we must construe it in the same way if the successor were merely tenant for life, the remainder going to some other person, and the tenant for life acquiring the remainder by purchase or under the will of the person entitled to it. Referring to these and similar cases which might be put, I think the reasonable and true construction of the whole act, and especially of this clause in it, is that with respect to a particular succession, the liability of the successor and the claim of the Crown are fixed and settled by the state of things existing at the time the succession takes place, and cannot be altered by the subsequent acts of the successor himself, or of any other person. I do not know what would have been the opinion of my learned Brethren in the case of a tenant for life acquiring the fee by purchasing the remainder, or by its being devised to him, or by its descending to him in consequence of the death of the intermediate heirs—in the latter case there would be some apparent ground for contending that the charge should be continuing, otherwise he would succeed to a remainder, for which he would pay no succession duty. But the explanation of this is, that by the 21st section the interest is to be valued according to certain tables and by certain rules, which make the value of a remainder, after the man's own life, worth nothing at all. Now, I think it is clear that the words of the 21st section, namely, "a successor who shall have been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest," may mean, as no time is mentioned, either at the time he became successor, or at any subsequent time. The latter mode of construing the words gives to them the same effect as if the language had been, "who shall have been competent, or who shall have (subsequently to the succession) become competent"; and if these words had been used, there could have been no doubt our judgment must have been for the Crown. The former mode gives to the language the same effect as if it had been "except in the case of a successor who shall have been (at the time of his becoming a successor) competent, &c.," and had these words been used, there would have been no doubt the other way, and our judgment must have been for the defendant. If the inquiry had been, which of those interpolations is the least violent, I should decide in favour of the latter. But I think a successor is spoken of with reference to the precise time when he became successor, and not to the subsequent period after he has actually succeeded, and in one sense may be said to have ceased to be a successor; and I think a uniform, consistent and just construction of the words of the 21st section would lead to a judgment for the defendant; but as the majority of the Court is of a different opinion, the judgment must be for the Crown.

Trespass for Mesne Profits—Judgment of County Court—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. ss. 50, 51.—Evidence—Practice.

A county court order for giving up possession of premises, made against a person holding under the tenant, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 50, is not conclusive evidence of title in a subsequent action against him for mesne profits.

The Court refused to go into the question of improper rejection of a document, on the ground that it did not appear by the Judge's notes that the document had been formally tendered in evidence at the trial.

Declaration in the usual form of trespass for mesne profits.

Plea, not guilty, and issue thereon.

The action was tried, at the Middlesex Sittings during Michaelmas Term, 1864, before Martin, B., when the following facts appeared in evidence: Harriet Ellis underlet to the defendant part of certain premises which she held as tenant to the plaintiff. On the 25th of May 1864, the plaintiff took proceedings in the Westminster County Court against Ellis, the defendant, and another sub-tenant, to recover possession, having, on the 26th of April, given them a week's notice to quit, which expired on the 4th of May. On the 20th of June an order was made by consent in the county court requiring the defendant to give up possession on the 27th of June, with which order the defendant complied; the plaintiff, however, who had received no rent since Christmas 1863, now sought to recover mesne profits from the 4th of May to the 27th of June.

To shew that Ellis was a quarterly tenant, and that therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to possession, the defendant relied on (amongst other evidence) certain receipts, shewing that Ellis's rent was paid quarterly. These, which were put in during the plaintiff's case, were admitted in evidence by the Judge; but he refused to admit an unstamped document produced by the plaintiff for the purpose of shewing the terms of the tenancy; it did not appear on the Judge's notes however that the plaintiff's counsel had made any formal tender of the document.

The jury being asked to determine what was the nature of the tenancy, and whether the defendant had committed a trespass, found a verdict for the defendant.

Morgan Lloyd obtained a rule for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection, in leaving the question of tenancy to the jury, and directing them that the judgment of the county court was not conclusive as to title, and in not directing the jury as to what was in issue under "not guilty," improper rejection of the unstamped document, and improper admission of the receipts.

Pearce shewed cause. — The only important point is, whether there was misdirection in leaving the question of tenancy to the jury, and in not directing them as to the issue under "not guilty." The plaintiff had the option of issuing a writ against either Ellis or the defendant.

[CHANNELL, B.—Section 50. of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. enables a landlord to go against either the tenant or the sub-tenant to recover possession; section 51. enables him to add a claim for mesne profits only in the case of the tenant.]

The documentary evidence produced by the defendant shewed a recognition by the plaintiff of a yearly or quarterly tenancy.

[MARTIN, B.—The defendant's strong point is, that the county court Judge directed something to be done with which the defendant complied.]

The defendant has a clear answer either way: first, as to the trespass, notice to quit on the 26th of April, followed by the summons in the county court, with whose order the defendant has strictly complied; secondly, as to the mesne profits, they cannot be claimed from a sub-tenant—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 51.

Morgan Lloyd, contra.—As to the first ground of the rule, that the plea of not guilty does not leave open the question of title for the jury. In an ordinary action of trespass, the plaintiff has to shew possession; but in the action for mesne profits, where the right to possession has been determined in another action, the judgment in that action is conclusive, and relates back to the day named or found by the jury; therefore, possession need not be proved in an action for mesne profits. Under "not guilty," the simple question is, was there an entry by the defendant?

[CHANNELL, B.—Proceedings under the County Court Act are not analogous to an action of ejectment.]

The record is simply an allegation on the part of the plaintiff, "You entered"; and on the part of the defendant, "I did not." The question of title is not open to the defendant on the record. But even assuming the proper plea of "not possessed" to have been on the record, the judgment of the county court was conclusive. The Judge has power to try questions of ejectment, where the relation of landlord and tenant exists, against either tenant or sub-tenant.

[CHANNELL, B.—Where the tenancy has expired or has been determined.]

He is to decide whether the tenancy has been determined or not, and the effect of his judgment here is, that at the date of the summons the defendant was not entitled to possession. The order of possession is proof of judgment, and the judgment is conclusive between the parties—Vooght v. Winch (1), Aslin v. Parkin (2) and Doe v. Wright (3). The document tendered by the plaintiff at the trial contained no words of demise, and was not signed by the plaintiff. Clayton v. Burtenshaw (4) shews that it did not require a stamp.

CHANNELL, B.—There were three points upon which we were pressed to make the rule absolute for a new trial: one is, that there was an improper rejection of evidence, inasmuch as an agreement purporting to be signed by Ellis ought to have been received in evidence. I decline to go into the argument addressed to us on this question, as I do not see upon the Judge's notes that any complaint was made of the rejection so as to entitle the plaintiff to move for a new trial. There may have been a discussion upon the point, but it was the duty of counsel, after the expression of the Judge's opinion, formally to tender the document and require a note to be taken of the tender; but as that was not done, the point does not avail.

Upon the second ground upon which we were asked for a new trial, viz., that certain receipts were given in evidence, it appears that the receipts were put in as the defendant's evidence in the course of the plaintiff's case, and therefore I take them as the defendant's evidence, received by consent and not objected to.

The third ground may admit of some little doubt, but after listening carefully to the arguments, I do not feel any. It is said that the judgment of the county court was conclusive, and there is mixed up with that this other argument, that the pleadings on the record did not put in issue any thing more than the fact of trespass, for that "not guilty" being the only plea, the plain-tiff's title was admitted; but it is still clear that in order to recover in this action of trespass the plaintiff was bound to prove the trespass. The plaintiff's counsel has endeavoured to shew that the proceedings in the county court are in all respects analogous to the action of ejectment. But I am inclined to think that the county court Judge is placed rather in a situation analogous to that of a magistrate under the old law, who might order possession of premises to be given in certain cases. If the county court order had not been put in, there would have been no case on the part of the plaintiff. If any efficacy is to be attributed to the order, it is by reference to the authority of the statute under which the order was made. It seems strange in point of common sense to hold that when a man has been taken before a county court Judge, and an order has been made which in letter and spirit he has obeyed, giving up possession when he had no longer any authority to retain it, he is then to be treated as a trespasser.

Our attention has been called to the difference between the 50th and 51st sections of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 128, and to a class of cases where the plaintiff requiring possession is at liberty to proceed in the county court against the person in possession of the premises. By the 51st section, when he proceeds against his own immediate tenant, he is at liberty to add a demand either for rent or mesne profits. I think both processes were probably introduced with a view to remove any subtle distinction before the county court Judge; but the plaintiff has no right to insert any claim either for rent or mesne profits when he is proceeding against, not his own tenant, but the person in possession; and as the language of the 51st section is clearly distinguished from that of the 50th, I think it would be going a great way to hold that, when the defendant is liable to go out on a county court Judge's order, this order can be given in evidence against him in an action of trespass for mesne profits, to which there may have been no right in the county court at all. On these three grounds, I think the rule should be discharged.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

MARTIN, B.—It is plain to my mind that this action has been misconceived. It was supposed that in an action for mesne profits you can elect whom to sue; it is not so. When a man has been in possession under a tenant, and then steps are taken in the county court, and the Judge directs possession on a certain day, the tenant in possession is then a trespasser in continuing after the day named in the county court order. The defendant had paid the rent to his landlady up to the time he remained in possession, and that he should pay damages with respect to this continuing in possession is wholly contrary to my views of right and justice. I think the rule should be discharged.

MOUNSKY v. ISMAY.

Custom — Easement — Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.) s. 2.

A claim, by custom, for all the freemen and citizens of a neighbouring city to run horse-races over certain land on Ascension Day in every year, is not a claim to an easement within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Prescription Act.

Trespass for breaking and entering a certain close of the plaintiff abutting &c., and breaking down and prostrating and destroying the fences of the plaintiff and belonging to the said close, and divers posts and rails then standing and being in and upon the said close and affixed thereto, and also prostrating, levelling and destroying a bank then erected and being upon and being parcel of the said close, and pulling up and destroying the thorns there growing.

Fifth plea—That for the full period of twenty years next before this suit, on a certain day in each and every year (to wit), on Ascension Day, commonly called Holy Thursday, horse-races have been and of right ought to have been and still ought to be holden on a certain piece of land in the extra-parochial hamlet of Kingmoor in the said city (being in the neighbourhood of the city of Carlisle); and for the full period of twenty years next before this suit the freemen of the said city of Carlisle on the day aforesaid in each and every year, have during all the time aforesaid of right and without interruption enjoyed and claimed to enjoy as a custom a certain reasonable and laudable right and privilege, that is to say, the freemen of the said city of Carlisle on the day aforesaid in each and every year should enter into and upon the said piece of land in the said hamlet for the purpose of holding horse-races thereon, and the said freemen of the said city of Carlisle on the day aforesaid in each and every year without interruption have during all the time aforesaid been used and accustomed to enter, and of right have entered and ought to have entered, and still of right ought to enter, into and upon the said piece of land in the said hamlet for the purpose of holding horse-races thereon; and the defendant says that the close &c. at the time when &c. was parcel of the said piece of land in the said hamlet, wherefore the defendant, being one of the freemen of the said city of Carlisle, committed the acts of trespass in the declaration mentioned.

The sixth plea contained all the allegations in the fifth plea, substituting a period of forty years for that of twenty years.

The seventh plea repeated all the allegations in the fifth plea contained, except so much of the plea as alleged that "the freemen of Carlisle" enjoyed and exercised the right and privilege as a custom, and alleged that all "the citizens of Carlisle," instead of "the freemen of Carlisle," enjoyed and exercised the said right and privilege as a custom, and that the defendant, being one of the citizens, committed the acts in the declaration.

The eighth plea repeated all the allegations in the seventh plea contained, and all the allegations in the fifth plea which were incorporated therein, substituting a period of forty years for that of twenty years.

Ninth plea—That for the full period of twenty years next before this suit, on a certain day in each and every year (to wit), on Ascension Day, commonly called Holy Thursday, horse-races have been and of right ought to have been, and still of right ought to be holden on a certain piece of land in the extra-parochial hamlet of Kingmoor in the said city, being in the neighbourhood of the city of Carlisle, and for the full period of twenty years next before this suit the freemen of the said city of

And the defendant says, that the said close in which &c. at the said time when &c. was parcel of the said piece of land in the said hamlet; wherefore the defendant, being one of the freemen of the said city of Carlisle, committed the acts of trespass in the declaration mentioned.

MOUNSEY v. ISMAY.

Custom—Easement—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.) s. 2.

The twelfth plea repeated all the allegations in the eleventh plea contained, and all the allegations in the ninth plea, which are incorporated therein, substituting a period of forty years for that of twenty years.

Demurrers to all the pleas, and joinder in the demurrers.

By way of further replication to all the above pleas, the plaintiff replied that there was not before or at the commencement of the said period of years before this suit in each of these several pleas respectively mentioned, and during which the said right is alleged to have been enjoyed as therein mentioned, any valid or legal custom such as is therein mentioned.

Demurrer to the replication, and joinder in demurrer.

C. Hutton (Jan. 18), in support of the plaintiff's demurrers.—It has been decided that this is a good custom at common law—see Mounsey v. Ismay (1). The question here is, is it valid under the Prescription Act? The words in the 1st and 2nd sections are, "no claim which may be lawfully made at the common law, by custom, prescription, or grant." The defendant cannot claim this right by prescription, because the freemen of a ville are a fluctuating body, and a grant to them as such would be void. They can then only claim it by custom. What is its meaning in this act? It is clear that in the 1st section, the word "custom" is applied only to the case of copyholders claiming a profit à prendre against their lord—Constable v. Nicholson (2). The same meaning must be given to the word "custom" in the 2nd section that it bears in the first; if it had any other meaning in the 1st section, it would be subversive of the rule of common law, which allows a profit à prendre to be claimed only by prescription, and not by custom. Copyholders do not claim against their lord by prescription, as they are only tenants at will; therefore, where a right to take a profit à prendre exists within a manor, it can only be claimed by custom. There is a distinction between a custom and a prescription—Co. Lit. 113 b., Gateward's case (3) and Blewett v. Tregonning (4). The 2nd section only applies to easements that are claimed by a que estate—Bailey v. Stevens (5). Willes, J., in that case, says, "There is no doubt that easements in gross could not be claimed by an occupier, as such, under the Prescription Act; and there is also no doubt that no right of that kind could be acquired by him under that act, by a user of twenty, thirty, or sixty years, either as an easement, or as a profit à prendre, except it is capable of being annexed to land within the rule I have already mentioned." The 5th section refers to the mode of pleading, as well by the plaintiff as by the defendant. With regard to the former, the difficulty does not occur, but with regard to defendants, if the 5th section applies to prescription, to a right in gross, why is the section limited to "the enjoyment" by the occupiers of the tenement, in respect whereof the right is claimed?

[CHANNELL, B.—The legislature, in passing the statute has two objects in view: first, to shorten the time of prescription in certain cases, not in all cases; secondly, to abolish the prescription in the que estate.]

Next, this is not an easement, but a mere licence.

Crompton, in support of the pleas.—[He was requested by the Court to confine his argument to whether the alleged right was an easement.] In Gale on Easements, p. 5, an easement is defined to be a privilege without profit, which the owner of one neighbouring tenement hath of another, existing in respect of their several tenements, by which the servient owner is obliged to suffer, or not to do something on his own land, for the advantage of the dominant owner. But the late editor, at p. 10, note (d), and p. 12, note (d), contends an easement in gross may exist. It is quite clear that a plea of prescription at common law for a profit à prendre is valid—Welcome v. Upton (6); and if such a claim be good, why should not an easement in gross be equally valid? A grant of a right of way to a man and his heirs may exist irrespective of any estate in land.

[MARTIN, B.—Is a right to go for mere pleasure into a field to hold horse-races the subject of a grant? Can a man grant to A. and his heirs the right to walk in his park? Would it pass it to his heirs? Is it not a mere licence? PIGOTT, B. referred to Dyce v. Lady James Hay (7).]

C. Hutton was heard in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

MARTIN, B. (Jan. 25) delivered the judgment of the Court (8).—This is a demurrer to pleas. The declaration is trespass for breaking and entering a close, and breaking down the fences, &c. There are several pleas, which are demurred to: they are all grounded upon the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. The first alleged that for the full period of twenty years next before the suit, on a certain day in every year, namely, Ascension Day, or Holy Thursday, horse-races had been of right &c. holden on a certain piece of land, whereof the close in which &c. was parcel, and for the same full period of twenty years the freemen of the city of Carlisle had of right, and without interruption, enjoyed a custom that they should enter upon the said piece of land for the purpose of holding horse-races thereon, and the said freemen had, during all that time used &c. The pleas proceeded to justify the trespass by virtue of the custom, in the usual manner. The next plea was the same, alleging the user of the custom for forty years. The next plea was similar to the first above demurred to, save that the right was alleged to be in the citizens of Carlisle. The next was similar to the last, save that the user was alleged to be for forty years. The four pleas following were substantially the same as the preceding; and one objection only was made to all of them, viz., that the custom alleged was not within the Prescription Act. Some short time ago this custom was the subject-matter of discussion before us. It was then pleaded as a custom at common law, and we were of opinion that it was a good custom (9). The present pleas have been added since. It is perfectly clear that such a right as is here set up can only exist by custom; a grant of such right to the freemen of Carlisle or the citizens of Carlisle would be void. Such indeterminate bodies as the freemen of a city or the citizens of a city, not being themselves a corporation, are incapable of being grantees; and there is probably another objection to it, as not being a legal subject of grant, but only a licence. The question, therefore, really comes to this: assuming that the owner of this close had forty-one years before the commencement of this suit, by parol, granted to or conferred upon the freemen of Carlisle or the citizens of Carlisle this right, and that they had during the forty years preceding the suit, in fact, exercised it as a right and without interruption, would the operation of the 2nd section of the statute render it absolute and indefeasible, notwithstanding that the origin of it could be clearly and satisfactorily proved, and that it began shortly before the commencement of the period of forty years? The occasion of the enactment of the Prescription Act is well known. It had been long established that the enjoyment of an easement as of right for twenty years was practically conclusive of a right from the reign of Richard the First, or in other words of a right by prescription, except proof was given of an impossibility of the existence of a right from that period; and a very common mode of defeating such a right was proof of a unity of possession since the time of legal memory. To meet this the grant by lost deed was invented, but in progress of time a difficulty arose in requiring a jury to find upon their oaths that a deed had been executed which every one knew never existed; hence the Prescription Act. The 1st section of the act relates to profits à prendre, and the respective periods therein mentioned are thirty and sixty years. The present case is not alleged to be within it. The pleas are all grounded on the 2nd, which enacts that no claim which may be lawfully made at common law by custom, prescription, or grant, to any way or other easement, or to any watercourse, or to the use of any water to be enjoyed upon any land &c., when such way or other matter shall have been actually enjoyed by any person claiming right thereto without interruption for twenty years, shall be defeated or destroyed by shewing only that such way or other matter was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of twenty years; and when such way or other matter should have been so enjoyed for the period of forty years, the right thereto should be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall appear that it was enjoyed by a consent or agreement by deed or writing. The question which has been argued before us, and which is the true one, is whether a custom for the freemen or citizens of Carlisle, upon Ascension Day, to enter upon another man's land for the purpose of holding horse-races there, is an easement within the 2nd section. To be so, it must be within the words custom, prescription, or grant, to a way or other easement, or to a watercourse, or to the use of any water to be enjoyed upon land of another; and we think it is not. In the first place, we do not think that this custom is an easement at all. One of the earliest definitions of an easement with which we are acquainted is in the Termes de la Ley, and it is "a privilege that one neighbour hath of another by writing or prescription, without profit; as a way or sink through his land." In this definition custom is not mentioned; prescription is, and it therefore seems to point to a privilege belonging to an individual, not a custom which appertains to many as a class. Again, in Mr. Gale's book, p. 5, an easement is defined; a very great number of authorities are collected, and it is stated in the most explicit terms that to constitute an easement there must be two tenements, a dominant one to which the right belongs, and a servient one upon which the obligation is imposed. We further think that the 2nd section itself points to a right belonging to an individual in respect of his land, not to a class, such as freemen or citizens claiming a right in gross wholly irrespective of land; for to obtain the benefit conferred by the 2nd section, it must be enjoyed by a person claiming right thereto for the full period of twenty years or forty years. We are not aware of any case or expression of opinion by any Judge contrary to this, but the 5th section of the act has been relied on as establishing it. This section relates to pleadings, and enacts that in all pleadings to actions of trespass and other pleadings wherein before the passing of the act it would have been necessary to allege the right to have existed from time immemorial, it should be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof as of right by the occupier of a tenement in respect whereof the same is claimed, &c. It has been said that this shews that an easement within the protection of the statute must be an easement belonging to a dominant tenement; we think it affords an argument in illustration as to what the legislature contemplated; but after what fell from this Court in Welcome v. Upton,—5 Mec. & W. 398, and the same case 6 Mec. & W. 536,—and a note of the late Mr. Henry Willes, in p. 152 of the edition of Gale on Easements, edited by him, we are not prepared to say the statute may not extend to easements in gross; although it is to be observed that all which Lord Wensleydale says in the last report of the case (6 Mec. & W. pp. 542-3) is, "we might be disposed to think that the present case (an alleged easement in gross) is within the equity of the statute"; and he goes on to add, that the question was then immaterial. But, however this may be, we are of opinion that to bring the right within the term "easement" in the 2nd section, it must be one analogous to that of a right of way which precedes it and a right of watercourse which follows it, and must be a right of utility and benefit, and not one of mere recreation and amusement. In our opinion, therefore, the present alleged right is not within the language or meaning of the Prescription Act, and we are satisfied that it was never in the contemplation of Lord Tenterden, who framed it, (see per Lord Wensleydale, 5 Mec. & W. 404,) to include within the act such customary rights as entering land to enjoy rural sports, as in Millechamp v. Johnson (10), or to dance upon a green, as in Abbot v. Weekly (11), by analogy to which we held this alleged customary right to run horse-races a lawful one at common law (1); what we think he contemplated were incorporeal rights incident to and annexed to property for its more beneficial and profitable enjoyment, and not customs for mere pleasure. In our opinion, therefore, the pleas demurred to are bad, and our judgment is for the plaintiff.

Jan. 13. } BAKER v. LANE.

Interrogatories — Libel — Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 51.

Interrogatories will not be allowed in an action of libel if they tend to charge the defendant with an indictable offence.

This was a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to deliver to the defendant interrogatories in writing, pursuant to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and why the defendant should not within ten days answer the same in writing by affidavit to be filed at the Rule Office of this court.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was the editor and proprietor of a newspaper, called the Stockton Herald, South Durham and Cleveland Advertiser, and the defendant falsely and maliciously printed and published of the plaintiff, in the form of a letter in a newspaper called the Universe, as well in relation to his conduct as such editor as of him in other respects, the words following; setting out the libel.

Plea, not guilty, on which issue was joined.

The following were the interrogatories sought to be delivered :

1. Did you, on the 14th of November 1863, or at any other and what time, carry on, by yourself or your agents, any and what trade or business, at 43, Lamb's Conduit Street, London ?

2. Have you ever, in any capacity, whether as editor, proprietor, publisher or printer, or how otherwise, been concerned in the publication of a newspaper or newspapers, and if yea, state the name or title of such newspaper or newspapers, and the period during which you were so concerned with the same ?

3. Have you ever in any way been engaged in, or connected with, the ownership, editing, writing, printing, publishing or sale of a newspaper called the Universe ; or, Catholic Standard, and if yea, in what capacity or capacities ; and state during what period of time you were so engaged in, or connected with, the same ?

4. Were you the proprietor, printer or publisher of the said newspaper on Saturday the 14th of November 1863, and did you print or publish it on that day ?

5. Have you ever received monies or made any payments arising from or on account of, or in any way connected with the said newspaper ; and if yea, state the period during which, and in what capacity, you received or made the same ?

6. Did you ever authorize the affixing of the printed name "D. Lane" or "Denis Lane" to the published copies of the said newspaper ? If not, did you know of its being so affixed, and what steps, if any, did you take with respect thereto ?

7. Did you write, or were you in any way connected with the composition, printing or publication of a letter containing the libel complained of in the declaration in the said cause, and signed "A Stocktonian," which appeared in the number of the said newspaper published on the 14th of November 1863 ?

8. Do you know, and if yea, state who was the proprietor, or who were the proprietors, and who were the publisher or publishers of the said newspaper called the Universe, on the 13th, 14th and 15th days of November 1863 respectively ?

The application was accompanied by an affidavit of the attorney of the plaintiff, which stated that he had searched at the proper office in Somerset House where newspapers are filed, and although there were several numbers of the said newspaper filed there, bearing dates prior and subsequent to the said 14th of November 1863, and all signed "D. Lane," yet he had been unable to find any copy of the said newspaper, dated the said 14th of November 1863 ; and he was informed by a clerk in the said office having the care and custody of newspapers filed there, that notwithstanding he has made numerous applications to the said defendant, at the publishing office of the said newspaper in the Strand, for such copy, and that promises had been from time to time made to the clerk that a copy of the newspaper, dated the 14th of November 1863, should be filed, no such copy had ever yet been filed at Somerset House ; that he had also

And if any such person shall knowingly and wilfully sign and make any such declaration in which shall be inserted or set forth the name, addition, or place of abode of any person as a proprietor, publisher, printer, or conductor of the actual printing of any newspaper to which such declaration shall relate, who shall not be a proprietor, printer, or publisher thereof, or from which shall be omitted the name, addition, or place of abode of any proprietor, publisher, printer, or conductor of the actual printing of such newspaper, contrary to the true meaning of this act, or in which any matter or thing by this act required to be set forth shall be set forth otherwise than according to the truth, or from which any matter or thing required by this act to be truly set forth shall be entirely omitted, every such offender being convicted thereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Section 7. That if any person shall knowingly and wilfully print or publish, or shall cause to be printed or published, or either as a proprietor or otherwise sell or deliver out any newspaper relating to which such declaration as aforesaid, containing such matters and things as are required by this act to be therein contained, shall not have been duly signed and made and delivered when and so often as by this act is required, or any other matter or thing required by this act to be done or performed shall not have been accordingly done and performed, every person in such case offending shall forfeit for every such act done the sum of 50*l.* for every day on which any such newspaper shall be printed or published, sold or delivered out, before or until such declaration shall be signed and made and delivered, or before or until such other matter or thing shall be done or performed as by this act is directed.

papers, and found that no declaration of ownership of the said Universe newspaper had been registered there.

Bullen shewed cause (Nov. 8, 1864).—The ground on which the defendant asks to have this rule discharged is, that the answers to the questions would tend to criminate him, because he might be subjected to an indictment for libel, and he might also be subjected to an indictment for a misdemeanor under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 76. ss. 6, 7. No doubt, the case of Bartlett v. Lewis (2) will be relied on for the plaintiff, but that case is at variance with Tuppington v. Ward (3) in this court. Here the defendant is directly asked if he has been guilty of an indictable offence.

[BRAMWELL, B.—How do we know that the defendant is guilty of an indictable offence? It might be that the alleged libel is true, and that it was necessary or conducive to the public interests to publish it. Are we to assume that the defendant has been guilty of an indictable offence?]

At any rate if he answers the questions he is subject, under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 76, to penalties, and perhaps to an indictment. There is a distinction between the case of a witness who is examined in court and the case where interrogatories are administered to a witness. In the first case the witness must be sworn, for he does not know what question he may be asked, but where interrogatories are administered the witness sees and knows what the question is. The dictum of Alderson, B., that proceedings on interrogatories were analogous to that of an examination of a witness at a trial, has been questioned by Lord Campbell in Whateley v. Crowter (4).

[BRAMWELL, B.—But how can we tell whether the answer will tend to criminate him?]

He is prejudiced if he declines to answer. In the case of Stern v. Sevastapulo (5), the Court of Common Pleas refused to allow interrogatories to be administered in an action of slander. In M'Mahon v. Ellis (6), upon a motion to attach the plaintiff for refusing to answer interrogatories, it was insisted on behalf of the plaintiff that the answers might tend to expose him to criminal proceedings for having acted in the office of weigh-master, under the 4 Ann. c. 14. (Ireland), without having taken the qualifying oaths; the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland held that to be a valid reason for declining to answer, and in that case the plaintiff was not required to state upon his oath that he would criminate himself by answering the questions. Monaghan, C.J., in his judgment says, "But it has also been insisted by plaintiff's counsel, though no such point is suggested by affidavit, that the plaintiff is not bound to give the required information, as being such as could be used against him on a criminal charge. As it is on this latter view of the case that we are about disposing of the present motion, it will be advisable that I should state distinctly the grounds on which we proceed. The defendants having relied on the not taking the oaths and subscribing the declaration required by the 9th section of the act as a defence to plaintiff's action, we must at all events, for the purpose of this motion, assume that the defence so pleaded is a valid one, from which it follows that if the plaintiff had acted as weigh-master without having taken the prescribed oaths and signed the prescribed declaration, he has violated the 9th section of the act, and if he has, which is of course the case sought to be proved by the defendant, it occurs to us that he has committed a misdemeanor, and is therefore not bound to answer any questions or give any information tending to establish as against him such misdemeanor."

Holl, in support of the rule.—First, by the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 6, if the proprietor of a newspaper wilfully makes a false return, he is guilty of a misdemeanor; but by the 7th section the non-delivery of a declaration is not made a misdemeanor; the proprietor of a newspaper in such case is only liable for penalties. It is a well-known rule of law, that where a particular section of an act creates an offence and gives a remedy, that remedy alone can be pursued. Under the 7th section the defendant could not be indicted for a misdemeanor. Next, the questions on the face of the interrogatories do not shew that the answer would tend to criminate the defendant, and the defendant must refuse on oath to answer and must state that the effect of the answer would be to criminate him. Boyle v. Wiseman (7) is a direct authority that the plaintiff has a right to insist on a witness stating on his oath whether the question put to him would or would not tend to criminate him. Bartlett v. Lewis (2) is to the same effect. Erle, C.J. in his judgment says, "It is clear that these are questions which might be put to the defendant if he were in the witness-box, and there he would be bound, if he desired to protect himself against answering them, to pledge his oath that they tended to criminate him. In Osborn v. the London Dock Company (8), it was contended by counsel in his argument that the 51st section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. was confined to cases where a discovery might have been obtained in a Court of equity, and that a bill of discovery could not be filed in a case where the questions sought to be put would criminate the party sought to be interrogated; but Lord Wensleydale observes that the language of the 51st section is much more extensive in its signification and has no such limitation as that contended for. Chester v. Wortley (9) was decided on the authority of Osborn v. the London Dock Company (8), and there it was objected that the interrogatories tended to disclose a forfeiture of the estate of the party interrogated; but the Court held, that the interrogatories might be delivered, and the defendant when sworn must claim the ordinary privilege of a witness to take objection to any particular question. In M'Mahon v. Ellis (6), the Court seem to hold that, whether there is the oath of the party sought to be interrogated or not, if the answer to the question would criminate the defendant, the interrogatories ought not to be allowed; but that case is opposed to all the cases decided in Westminster Hall. With regard to Tupping v. Ward (3), this Court ruled that under the circumstances of that case they would not allow the interrogatories to be put. This is quite a case for interrogatories, for the legislature has provided a mode in which to ascertain the information sought, and the defendant in violation of the act of parliament does not furnish it.

On the 13th of January 1865,—

POLLOCK, C.B. delivered the judgment of the Court (10).—In the case of Baker v. Lane,—which was argued last term, and in which the question raised was, whether certain interrogatories which the plaintiff sought to administer to the defendant ought to be allowed inasmuch as they tended to shew that the party interrogated had committed a criminal offence,—we are of opinion that the interrogatories ought not to be allowed.

Rule discharged.

1865.	}	CLARKE v. WILLIAMS AND OTHERS.
Jan. 16.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Deed of Arrangement—Release—Plea in Bar.

A deed executed by a debtor for the benefit of creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, cannot, unless it contain a clause of release, be pleaded in bar to an action.

Declaration for goods bargained and sold, for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, and for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendants at their request, and for money due on accounts stated between them.

Plea, that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th of October 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons; and thereupon a deed, bearing date the 30th of January 1864, was made and entered into and executed by and between the defendant, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams of the one part, and W. W. Lewis of the other part, which said deed was and is as follows: "This deed, made the 30th of January 1864, between J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams, all of, &c., of the one part, and W. W. Lewis, of, &c., on behalf of and with the assent of the undersigned creditors of the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams of the other part, witnesseth that the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams hereby conveyed all their estate and effects to the said W. W. Lewis absolutely, to be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams, in like manner as if the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams had been at the date hereof duly adjudged bankrupt."

Averments, that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendants whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards did, in writing, assent to and approve of the said deed, and the said trustees appointed by the deed executed the same, and the execution of the deed by the defendants was attested by an attorney; and within twenty-eight days from the execution of the deed by the defendants the same was produced and left, having been first duly stamped, at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and together with such deed there was delivered to the Chief Registrar an affidavit by the defendants that a majority representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendants whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards had in writing assented to and approved of the said deed, and also stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the defendants comprised in the deed, and the deed did before the registration thereof bear such ordinary and ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf, and immediately on the execution of the deed by the defendants possession of all the property comprised therein of which the defendants could give or order possession was given to the said trustees, and at the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendants in respect of the claim herein pleaded to within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and all conditions have happened and been performed, and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, and the plaintiff became and was and is bound by the deed as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Hance, in support of the demurrer.—This case is identical with Eyre v. Archer (1) and The Istones Park Iron Ore Company (Limited) v. Pattinson (2).

THE COURT then called upon

Crompton, to support the plea.—Eyre v. Archer (1) shews that the plea is good by way of accord and satisfaction. This case is like that of an ordinary composition deed entered into between a debtor and his creditors, the non-assenting creditor here under the statute being precisely in the same position as an assenting creditor. The deed cannot be pleaded as a release, nor as a payment, but it operates by way of accord and satisfaction.

[CHANNELL, B.—Assume, for the purpose of argument, that the debtor's property is conveyed to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, where is the satisfaction? MARTIN, B.—The deed is only an answer to the action if the act of parliament make it an answer.]

It is submitted that the deed and the facts stated in the plea are an answer.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The case of Eyre v. Archer (1) in the Common Pleas and The Istones Park Iron Ore Company (Limited) v. Pattinson (2) in this court have decided this point.

MARTIN, B.—This is not a case like that of an ordinary composition deed.

CHANNELL, B. and PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

1864. } BENHAM v. BROADHURST.*
Dec. 2. }

Debtor and Creditor—Composition-Deed—Covenant with the Creditors who Sign respectively to Pay a Composition to all the Creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192).

By a composition-deed between a debtor of the one part, and the several creditors who signed the deed respectively of the other part, after reciting that the debtor was unable to pay his debts in full, the latter covenanted with the several persons parties thereto of the second part, to pay to all his present creditors a composition of 5s. in the pound on their respective debts:—Held, that the deed was not valid, since the non-assenting creditors were not in an equally advantageous position with the executing creditors, for the deed gave to each individual creditor who had executed the deed the right of action for the composition on his individual debt, while a non-assenting creditor had no power of suing either personally or by means of any one as trustee on his behalf.

Error was brought in this case to reverse the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in favour of the plaintiff, on a demurrer to a plea.

The action was for goods sold and delivered. The defendant pleaded a composition-deed with his creditors, and alleged that the plaintiff though a creditor who had not executed or assented to the deed was bound by it under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The plea set forth the fulfilment of all the matters required by the statute to make a composition-deed binding on non-assenting creditors, supposing the deed itself to be valid. The deed was set out in the plea. The material parts were in the following words: This indenture made on the 17th of December 1863, between M. B. Broadhurst, gentleman, of the one part, and the several persons whose names and seals are hereunto respectively subscribed and set, being seve-

Broadhurst is indebted, amongst others, unto the several persons parties hereto of the other part, or their respective principals, in the several sums of money set opposite their respective names in the schedule hereto, and being unable to pay his debts in full, he hath agreed to enter into covenants hereinafter on his part contained; and in consideration thereof, the said several persons hereto of the other part have agreed to enter into the covenants hereinafter on their parts contained: now, this indenture witnesseth, that in consideration of the premises he, the said M. B. Broadhurst; and also that he, the said M. B. Broadhurst, shall and may from time to time and at all times hereafter, unless and until he shall make such default as aforesaid, have and be entitled to full and free liberty, leave, power and authority to go, pass and repass to and from such place and places and in such manner as he shall think proper, and for any purpose whatever, without any control or interruption of or by them, the said several persons parties hereto of the other part, or any or either of them, or any or either of their co-partners, executors or administrators, or any person or persons by or with their or any or either of their order, direction or covenant; and further, that in case the said several persons parties hereto of the other part, their or any or either of their partners, executors or administrators, shall sue or prosecute at law or in equity, or do or cause to be done any act, matter or thing whatsoever, whereby or by means whereof the said M. B. Broadhurst, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall or may be sued, prosecuted or molested for any such debt or debts now due as aforesaid, contrary to the foregoing covenant and the true intent of these presents, then and in every such case he or they shall or may plead these presents in bar of any action or actions, suit or suits, that may be commenced or prosecuted against him or them, and these presents shall operate as and are hereby declared and agreed to be an effectual and absolute discharge of the same; and moreover, that they the said covenanting parties, the partners, executors and administrators respectively, will, upon full payment of the said composition of 5*s.* in the pound on the amount of their respective debts, upon the request and at the costs of the said M. B. Broadhurst, his heirs, executors or administrators, make, give, sign and execute unto him or them good and sufficient releases, acquittances and discharges for the several debts now due and owing to them as aforesaid by the said M. B. Broadhurst, and of and from all actions and demands whatsoever in respect thereof.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

The Court below held the deed to be bad on a different point from that decided in error.

Mellish (F. M. White with him), (June 21 and Dec. 1, 1864), for the plaintiff in error.—The composition-deed is good under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 192. All the creditors are on an equality under it. It is made, no doubt, between the debtor and those creditors who sign; but the covenant is in substance a covenant by the debtor with those who execute the deed to pay the composition to all the creditors. Section 192. in terms says, a deed between a debtor and some of his creditors shall be a good deed if it be on behalf of all the creditors. The main object of the statute is that all creditors should have equal right, not that each should have a separate remedy. In Ilderton v. Jewell (1), in error from Ilderton v. Castrique (2), the deed was held bad because it did not refer to non-assenting creditors at all. The word "respectively" here must be rejected as repugnant to the manifest meaning of the whole covenant and the plain intention of the whole deed. The covenant as to the release helps this view. Unless the composition be paid to all the creditors, none are bound. The release is on condition of the debtor paying all the creditors. In the case of Clapham v. Atkinson (3), where the deed was held good, the release is less stringent on the debtor than in the present case. The creditors covenant back with the debtor that on condition that and so long as the debtor keeps the covenant, the creditors will not sue him. A non-assenting creditor has the same powers and privileges with all the other creditors, because unless he is paid the composition, he may sue for the whole debt. In practice it is usual for one or two creditors only to execute the deed. The requisite majority of the assenting creditors do not execute it, but sign consents in writing. An assenting creditor who does not execute could not sue on the deed in his own name, any more than a non-assenting creditor; but each can sue in the name of the creditors who execute the deed.

Holl (Sill with him), for the defendant in error.—The deed is bad. The non-assenting creditors are in a worse position than the assenting creditors. If the parties use terms which confine the operation of the deed to executing creditors only, the deed is void—Ilderton v. Jewell (1), Ilderton v. Castrique (2). The deed here professes to be between the debtor and those creditors who sign. The debtor covenants with the creditors who execute respectively to pay the composition to them respectively. Clapham v. Atkinson (3) is distinguishable from this case. There there was no covenant at all to pay the composition until tender of the composition or payment: the covenant to release did not operate to bar the right of any creditor to sue for his original debt.

[BLACKBURN, J. — Surely there is, in effect, a promise by Atkinson to pay the composition. ERLE, C.J. — The effect of Clapham v. Atkinson (3) is, that an agreement to take a halfpenny composition and a tender of it, bars the action of the non-assenting creditor without any cessio bonorum. But the present case is very distinguishable.]

Here, the intention of the deed is to give each creditor a right of suing in his own name for his share of the composition. The word "respectively" cannot be rejected. It only expresses the full sense of the deed. It is very probable that many of the creditors would not have accepted the deed, unless they had severally got a separate right of suing for their individual share of the composition. The covenant as to the release does not carry it further. It would be a very unreasonable construction of that covenant to hold that the release was not intended to operate as to any creditor unless every creditor had received his composition.

(1) 16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 142; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 256.

(2) 14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 99; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 206.

(3) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 51.

It is a covenant by each creditor that each will not sue, and that each will release on payment of his share of the composition. There is no trustee here in whose name a non-assenting creditor could sue. If there could be such a construction the non-assenting creditors would be in a worse position than the executing creditors, for the non-assenting creditors could not bring an action in the name of the executing creditors, without at least obtaining a Judge's order and indemnifying them against costs. In Ex parte Cockburn (4) the Lord Chancellor Westbury held the deed void, though there was a covenant to pay all the creditors; since the non-assenting creditors could not sue on the deed, and no trustees had been appointed through whom they could sue. Ex parte Rawlins (5) is to the same effect.

[BLACKBURN, J.—According to your argument there cannot be a good deed unless there is a trustee.]

If the agreement were to pay a sum down a trustee would not be necessary, or if the debtor described each creditor in the deed he might give him a right of suit, otherwise a trustee is necessary.

(Other points were discussed on which no judgment was given. They are, therefore, not further noticed.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered on the 2nd of December 1864, by—

CROMPTON, J.—We think that we may dispose of this case upon the first point, as we are of opinion that the deed is invalid on the first objection taken. It appears to us, as it is now established, that a debtor's covenant to pay is sufficient without a cessio bonorum, and without there being any fund to which the creditors can look for their composition, that we ought to take greater care that the assenting and non-assenting creditors have equal rights under such a covenant. By the act it was evidently intended that such an arrangement might be made by the debtor with all the creditors, or with some of the creditors as trustees for the whole body; but we must always look to the deed to see how far this intention of the act has been carried out. We must examine this deed to see whether the necessary provisions have been made for giving the parties equal rights under the covenant to sue, which covenant to my mind is in effect the substitute for the fund which the creditor would have had in the cessio bonorum. The present deed, it will be observed, is made between the debtor and the executing creditors only, who take a covenant to themselves respectively and individually. There is no covenant by the debtor with the non-assenting creditors, or with any trustee for them on which they or the trustee can sue. They have not, therefore, equal protection with the executing creditors, and the foundation of our judgment is, that here the non-assenting creditors have not an equal right to sue,—an equal right which is considered in effect an equivalent to so much property. The covenant run thus: "M. B. Broadhurst doth hereby for himself, his heirs, &c., covenant with the said several persons parties hereto of the other part respectively, &c. in manner following, that is to say, that he, the said M. B. Broadhurst, his executors, &c., will pay unto all and every the present creditors of him the said M. B. Broadhurst, the sum of 5s. sterling in the pound on the several amounts of the respective debts of such creditors by two equal instalments." That is a covenant to pay all and every of the present creditors, not to the covenantees only, the sum of 5s. in the pound on their debts in equal instalments; and then the executing creditors covenant back that they will release the debtor on certain terms, which are stated. Now, this covenant with the executing creditors clearly, in my mind, gives, and was intended to give, a right to each individual creditor to sue the debtor on the covenant contained in the deed, and I think the main object of the deed was that each creditor respectively should have that individual right. It was argued that we may reject the word so often and carefully repeated, "respectively," and that we might by thus rejecting it construe the covenant as one made with all the executing creditors; that all the non-assenting creditors should be paid so as to make the executing creditors trustees for the whole body, but by that construction each executing creditor could not have the legal right which it was the chief object of the deed to give him. It seems to us that it is impossible to construe the covenant as a joint covenant with regard to some, and a separate one as regards the others. I cannot conceive that it was intended that the whole body of executing creditors, changing from time to time as they come in and execute, should be trustees to sue for each individual debt. Mr. Mellish did not shew any mode in which a right of suing on the covenant could be given to the non-assenting creditors, he only suggested it might by possibility be done. That being so, I am of opinion that the non-assenting creditors have not the benefit of the covenant to sue which the executing creditors have; and, therefore, without going into any of the other points, the judgment of the Court will be, that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

Libel—Accord and Satisfaction.

To an action for libel the defendant pleaded that, after the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff and the defendant agreed to accept certain mutual apologies to be published by the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, in certain weekly journals belonging to the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, in full satisfaction and discharge of all causes and rights of action in the declaration mentioned and all damages and costs sustained by the plaintiff; and that in pursuance of the agreement the defendant did publish his part of the mutual apologies in the weekly journal belonging to him, and that the plaintiff did also in pursuance of the agreement publish his part of the apologies in the weekly journal belonging to him:—Held, that the plea was a bar to the action as an accord and satisfaction.

Declaration for libel published of and concerning the plaintiff in a certain periodical called the Orchestra.

NEW SERIES, 34.—EXCHQ.

Plea—that after the commencement of this suit the plaintiff and the defendant agreed together to accept certain mutual apologies to be published by the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, in certain weekly journals belonging to and published by the said plaintiff and the defendant respectively, in full satisfaction and discharge of all the causes and rights of action in the declaration mentioned, and all damages and costs sustained by the plaintiff in respect thereof; and that thereupon and in pursuance of the said agreement he, the defendant, did, on the 14th of May 1864, print and publish his part of the said mutual apologies in the weekly journal belonging to and published by him, the said defendant, and so agreed upon on that behalf as aforesaid, that is to say, in the defendant's weekly journal called the Orchestra, of which the plaintiff had notice; and the plaintiff did also after the making of the said agreement and in pursuance thereof, to wit, on the 14th of May 1864, print and publish his part of the said apologies in the said weekly journal, belonging to and published by him, the plaintiff, and so agreed upon in that behalf as aforesaid, that is to say, in the plaintiff's weekly journal called Boosey's Musical and Dramatic Review.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

Joyce, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. After the cause of action has accrued it can only be released by deed. The defendant is seeking by his plea to set up a parol arrangement as a release.

[MARTIN, B.—Why is not the plea good by way of accord and satisfaction? Do you say that the expense of labour and printing the apology is of no value? CHANNELL, B.—Does the plea go far enough? It states that there were mutual apologies, but it does not state that the form of these apologies was agreed upon. MARTIN, B.—The statement of the plaintiff's apology is mere surplusage.]

There is no averment in the plea that there was an acceptance of the apology; in order to make the plea good, it ought to have contained such averment.

[MARTIN, B.—Had the apology been a verbal one it might not have amounted to a good satisfaction. But I think a written apology might be a good satisfaction. In

K

Lane v. Applegate (1) the plaintiff entered into a written agreement with the defendant, which stated that the plaintiff had burnt one of certain letters, and was then about to destroy another; and that she had undertaken to destroy all other letters which might come into her possession: the destruction of the letters was held to be a sufficient accord and satisfaction.]

A performance of the agreement might be well pleaded as a good accord and satisfaction.

[MARTIN, B.—That is this case. The judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Lane v. Applegate (1) is, “that the agreement was a bar to the action as an accord and satisfaction.” On general demurrer it must be taken that the form of the apologies was agreed upon. The case in Starkie’s Reports is a stronger case than the present. It would be a strong thing to call throwing letters into the fire labour, but the setting up of type might well be called labour. That case is an authority that this is a good plea, and I think the case is good law, because I find it reported by Mr. Starkie without any note or comment, and he was pre-eminently distinguished for his knowledge of this branch of the law.]

Needham, in support of the plea, was not called upon.

Common Appurtenant—“Levant and Couchant”—Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.

To a declaration in trespass the defendant pleaded thirty years’ enjoyment of right of common of pasture over the locus in quo for the cattle levant and couchant upon the toftstead belonging to him as appurtenant thereto:—Held, that the number of commonable cattle not being in question, it was not necessary, for the support of the plea, that the cattle should actually be fed upon the produce of the toftstead; and that there is no distinction, in this respect, between a plea, founded on the Prescription Act, and a plea grounded on prescription properly so called.

Declaration in trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff’s closes, and pulling up and destroying posts, rails, &c.; with a second count for injury to the reversion.

The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the defendant John Woodhall (1), at the times when they did what was complained of, and thence to the commencement of this suit, was possessed of a toftstead, the occupiers whereof for thirty years before this suit enjoyed as of right, and without interruption, common of pasture over the said closes and pieces of land in which &c. for all their cattle levant and couchant upon the said toftstead at all times of the year, as to the said toftstead appertaining, and that the plaintiff wrongfully obstructed the said John Woodhall in the enjoyment of the common of pasture, by putting up, and at the said times when &c. wrongfully keeping the said posts and rails on the said closes and pieces of land in which, &c., over which the said John Woodhall had the said right of common, and thereby prevented him from enjoying the said common of pasture as he was entitled to do, so that without pulling up and destroying the said posts and rails the said John Woodhall could not enjoy his said common of pasture; and that the alleged trespasses and grievances in the first and second counts mentioned were respectively committed by the said John Woodhall, as such occupier in his own right, and by the other defendants as his servants and by his command, for the purpose of removing the said obstructions and preventions as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, doing no unnecessary damage to the plaintiff on the occasion aforesaid.

Issue on all the pleas.

The action was tried, at the York Summer Assizes, 1864, before Blackburn, J., who directed a verdict for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them.

(1) There were seven defendants, and this plea was repeated accordingly, the name of each defendant being substituted in turn for that of John Woodhall.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now (Jan. 25) delivered by—

CHANNELL, B.—The present question was reserved by my Brother Blackburn at the trial of the cause at York at the last Assizes. The action was trespass quare clausum fregit. The plea of a defendant, John Woodhall, alleged that for thirty years before the suit he had enjoyed, as of right and without interruption, common of pasture over the locus in quo for his cattle levant and couchant upon the toftstead belonging to him as appurtenant thereto. This was traversed.

It was proved at the trial that the toftstead was a close of about two acres in extent, and that upon it there was a house or houses which had been used for stalling cattle, but that the cultivated part of the land during the thirty years was occupied as garden ground, and no part of its produce applied to feed the occupiers' cattle. It was further proved that the defendant Woodhall and other defendants (owners of small pieces of land in the neighbourhood) had for long beyond thirty years turned out their cattle to graze upon the locus in quo; and at the conclusion of the case the learned Judge stated that it was clearly established that the owners of these pieces of land (the defendant Woodhall included) had as of right for upwards of thirty years turned their cattle, housed upon their respective pieces of land, to use the common, but that the cattle had not during this period derived their sustenance from the produce of the pieces of land, the alleged dominant tenements, and he doubted whether such cattle were in law levant and couchant, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, giving the defendants leave to move.

A rule was granted last term to enter the verdict for the defendants upon the issues joined on the pleas raising the question, and it has been argued. The argument was confined to the case of Woodhall.

His case was this: he had a toftstead or close, two acres in extent; he had for thirty years as of right, and claiming to have a right of common over the locus in quo as appurtenant to his toftstead, turned his cattle upon it; the cattle had been housed upon his toftstead, but were not at any time during the thirty years fed upon the produce of it, all their food, beyond what was got upon the common, being provided from elsewhere.

The right claimed by the plea and upon the facts is for common appurtenant, and not for common appendant. No question of surcharge arises, such as has been the point in dispute in most of the cases where the term "levant and couchant" has been interpreted and explained. Here the number of the cattle put upon the common in exercise of the right claimed, is not in question, and the only point we have to determine is, whether, under the circumstances stated to us, any cattle could be levant and couchant in the sense required to make the right of common such an one as the law will recognize. We think that they can. The term "levant and couchant" is a very old legal phrase, and in its primary sense means "when the beasts or cattle of a stranger are come into another man's ground, and there have remained for some good space of time." This is the definition of it in the Termes de la Ley, 424; but it is clearly established by the authorities—see notes to Mellor v. Spateman (2)—that, as used in this plea, it means something more, namely, a measure of number, and that it implies within it that the number of cattle which are alleged to have used the common, is such as the winter eatage of the toftstead, together with the hay and other produce obtained from it during the summer, was capable of maintaining.

The plea therefore, when expanded, avers that, for thirty years before the suit, the defendant Woodhall had enjoyed common of pasture for such number of cattle as his toftstead could maintain by its produce, beyond the amount of food obtained by them from the common: and the real question is, whether it further involves that the cattle must have actually been fed, either wholly or in part, from the produce of the toftstead. We think it does not. All the cases and authorities bearing upon the subject were cited in the argument, and there is in none of them a distinct statement to this effect. The cattle must be "levant and couchant" in its primary sense, and their number is to be such as the produce of the dominant tenement would suffice to feed if cultivated for that purpose. But no authority has been cited which shews that the cattle must actually and in fact be fed upon the produce, provided the test can be applied, so as to ascertain the number. Here there is no dispute as to the number. In the absence of express authority, we should not be justified in holding what would in effect restrict the right of the person entitled to the common to use his dominant tenement in such manner, and for such purposes, as he may deem most beneficial to him. Prima facie it is the right of every man so to do, and in the absence of a clear rule of law to the contrary, we ought to uphold it. The argument for the plaintiff was, that the dominant tenement must, in part at least, be used for the purpose of the production of food for the commonable cattle; but that was not supported by any sufficient authority, and we think that the actual consumption of the produce of the toftstead was not involved in the averment in this plea.

It was alleged, that the plea being founded on the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.) made a difference; and that, although the evidence might have proved the averment in a plea grounded upon prescription properly so called, it did not, when contained in a plea grounded on thirty years' actual enjoyment. Upon consideration, we think there is no distinction. The defendant, in our judgment, proved that he actually took and enjoyed the right of common, without interruption, for the full period of thirty years before the suit, which is all that the statute requires. The rule will therefore be made absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants.

Baron and Feme—Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 21.
—Protecting Order—Unlawfully acquired Property.

The protection of an order granted to a wife under the 21st section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, is confined to the lawful earnings of lawful industry, and does not extend to earnings (or property purchased with earnings) acquired by her as keeper of a brothel.

Declaration in trespass and trover, with indebitatus counts.

Pleas—Not guilty; leave and licence; a denial of the plaintiffs' property, and never indebted.

Issue joined on all the pleas.

The action was brought by the administrators of Mary Ann Wild, who at the time of her death was living apart from her husband, against an auctioneer employed by the husband to realize the furniture, &c. in her possession at the time of her death.

The case was tried, in Liverpool, before Blackburn, J., during the South Lancashire Winter Assizes, 1864, when evidence was given to shew that the deceased had voluntarily left her husband in 1857, and had since that time kept a brothel; also that on the 9th of November 1860 she applied for and obtained a magistrate's protecting order under the 21st section (1) of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. The necessary expenses of obtaining the order (which was duly registered according to the provisions of the 21st section) were defrayed by a man with whom she was at the time living in adultery. The order had not been discharged.

In answer to the questions put to them, the jury found that the order had been obtained by fraud, and that the property of the deceased had been acquired by unlawful means.

The learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the goods, ruling that the order was good until discharged, and giving the defendant leave to move.

(1) This section is as follows: "A wife deserted by her husband may at any time after such desertion, if resident within the Metropolitan District, apply to a police magistrate, or if resident in the country to Justices in petty sessions, or in either case to the Court, for an order to protect any money or property she may acquire by her own lawful industry, and property which she may become possessed of, after such desertion, against her husband or his creditors or any person claiming under him; and such magistrate, or Justices, or Court, if satisfied of the fact of such desertion, and that the same was without reasonable cause, and that the wife is maintaining herself by her own industry or property, may make and give to the wife an order protecting her earnings and property acquired since the commencement of such desertion, from her husband and all creditors and persons claiming under him, and such earnings and property shall belong to the wife, as if she were a feme sole; provided always that every such order, if made by a police magistrate or Justices at petty sessions, shall, within ten days after the making thereof, be entered with the Registrar of the county court within whose jurisdiction the wife is resident; and that it shall be lawful for the husband and any creditor or other person claiming under him, to apply to the Court, or to the magistrate or Justices by whom such order was made, for the discharge thereof; provided also that if the husband, or any creditor of, or any person claiming under the husband, shall seize or continue to hold any property of the wife after notice of such order, he shall be liable at the suit of the wife (which she is hereby empowered to bring) to restore the specific property, and also for a sum equal to double the value of the property so seized or held after such notice as aforesaid: if any such order of protection be made, the wife shall during the continuance thereof be and be deemed to have been during such desertion of her, in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under this act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation."

Edward James (Jan. 14) obtained a rule to enter a nonsuit on the grounds, first, that the order was fraudulently obtained; secondly, that even if it were not, it did not protect goods which were not the proceeds of lawful industry; and, thirdly, that the verdict was against the evidence.

Quain now shewed cause.—The fact of the jury having found that the property was obtained by unlawful means does not affect the case, for the enacting part of the section speaks of "earnings and property acquired" generally. The word "lawful" is entirely omitted in the Scotch Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 86, and it is also omitted in the 7th and 8th sections of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, the Amending Act.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The introductory part of the 21st section contains the word "lawful"; and the word must therefore be understood wherever "earnings" are subsequently mentioned.]

The words are quite general. These goods were clearly the wife's property; for they were purchased lawfully, though the money with which they were purchased may have been acquired unlawfully. The 25th section (2) of the act confirms this view.

Edward James (Holker with him), for the defendant.—The legislature only intended to protect women who were improperly deserted by their husbands, and to enable them to deal lawfully with property obtained by their honest labour. The word "lawful" in the commencement governs all the rest of the section. Here there was no pretence for saying that the deceased woman had any other property than what she had earned by her immorality; and the business she carried on was not only immoral, but indictable (3).

POLLOCK, C.B.—Although some difficulty may arise in dealing with this new legislation, in which a wife who has obtained a decree of judicial separation is treated, with regard to property, as if she were a feme sole, we are all of opinion that the legislature intended to confine the protection given by the act to the lawful fruits of lawful industry, and that they studiously avoided extending that protection to property acquired by such means as were used by the wife in this case. Were it not so, a direct encouragement would be given to vice and profligacy.

(2) The words in the 25th section are, "In every case of a judicial separation the wife . . . shall be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her," &c.

(3) The question as to the jurisdiction of the magistrate to grant the order under the circumstances, and the validity of the order, was also argued by Quain; but the Court stopped James in his argument on that head, intimating that the case would be decided on the second ground of the rule only.

CHANNELL, B. concurred.

PIGOTT, B.—A clear distinction is drawn between property “which the wife may acquire by her lawful industry,” and property “which she may become possessed of”—a distinction which would have been unnecessary if the legislature had intended to extend the protection afforded by the act to the earnings of a profligate course of life.

Debtor and Creditor—Validity of Composition Deed—24 & 25 Vict. c. 134 (Bankruptcy Act, 1861)—Plea alleging Tender of Composition.

To a declaration by indorsee against drawer and indorser of a bill of exchange, the defendant pleaded a plea setting out a composition deed, whereby a majority in number and three-fourths in value of his creditors, in consideration of the payment of the composition agreed upon before the 10th of April then next, agreed to accept a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound in discharge of their respective debts, so far as they were able to do so without the consent or permission of, and without prejudice to the rights of third parties or sureties, but no further. The plea also alleged compliance with the requisitions of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and a tender to the plaintiff of the composition in respect of his debt:—Held, on demurrer, that this deed, although containing no actual release in terms, was good under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, so as to bind the plaintiff, as if he had executed it; and that the plea alleging a tender of the composition shewed a good defence to the action.

The writ in this action was issued on the 7th of March 1864. The declaration was by the indorsee against the drawer of a bill of exchange for 50*l.*, due on the 4th of February 1864.

The sixth plea set out an indenture, dated the 9th of March 1864, and expressed to be made between the defendant of the one part, and the creditors of the defendant of the other part, whereby, after reciting that the defendant was indebted or liable to sundry persons in divers sums of money which he was then wholly unable to pay in full, and that the names of the said persons and the amounts to which the defendant was so indebted or liable to them respectively, or as nearly as the same could be ascertained, were set forth in a schedule to the deed; and that the defendant had proposed to pay to all his said creditors a composition of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, upon their respective debts; and that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors had agreed to accept the said composition in discharge of their respective debts, so far as they were able to do so without the consent or permission of, and without prejudice to the rights or claims of third parties or sureties, but no further; it was witnessed, that in consideration of the payment of the said composition to the said creditors respectively, on or before the 10th of April next, the said creditors agreed to receive and accept the said composition in discharge to such extent as thereinbefore mentioned. The plea then averred performance of the first six conditions required to be observed by the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and further, that there were no trustees of the said deed, nor was there any property comprised therein, whereof the defendant could give or order possession: and that the plaintiff at the time of the making of the said deed was a creditor of the defendant for the sum of 50*l.* in respect of the causes of action sued for, and that all things had occurred, &c. necessary to make the said indenture binding on the plaintiff in respect of his said debt, and to release and discharge the defendant from the payment of any greater sum than the sum of 6*l.* 5*s.*, being the said composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound on the debt so due to the plaintiff as aforesaid; and that before the said 10th of April 1864, the defendant was and thence hitherto had always been ready and willing, and before the said 10th of April, tendered and offered to pay to the plaintiff, who then refused to accept the said sum of 6l. 5s. as and for such composition as aforesaid.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Hance, for the plaintiff.—The deed cannot be pleaded in bar of the action, even if it be a valid deed under the statute, because it contains no release—The Ipsstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (1), Eyre v. Archer (2) and Wells v. Hacon (3), per Blackburn, J.; and because there is no covenant by the debtor to pay, and the creditors have no means of enforcing the payment of, the composition agreed on. At the most the plea amounts to a mere accord without satisfaction. [He also cited Tabor v. Edwards (4), which was decided on the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 224.]

Henry James, for the defendant.—The Ipsstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (1) differs from this in two points: first, there was in that case a bare accord without satisfaction, there being no allegation of tender as here; and secondly, there was nothing equivalent to a release by non-assenting creditors. The statute makes the assenting creditors quasi agents for the non-assenting, for the purposes of the deed; and by this deed the assenting creditors say all the creditors shall discharge the debtor. In Wells v. Hacon (3) it could not be said that the plaintiff had released the debtor, for there was no covenant binding on the non-assenting creditors; besides, the remarks of Blackburn, J. as to a release were mere obiter dicta in the case. In Eyre v. Archer (2) there was no agreement to accept a composition; and the deed was a mere assignment in the form given in Schedule D. to the act. The defendant here rests his case entirely on the ground of composition taken for the debt. All the cases shew that, if there be a release, it binds the non-assenting as well as the as-senting creditors; they can be bound for the purposes of common law procedure as well as of bankruptcy procedure, and if the deed be not good under the act, it is good at common law—Symons v. George (5). There is no special virtue in the use of the word "release"; if an intention to release be gathered from the deed, there is a release in law. The plea shews a good accord with satisfaction.

Hance, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, B. now (Jan. 31) delivered the judgment of the Court (6).—In this case the main point insisted on, on the part of the plaintiff, was that, as the deed contained no release, it could not be pleaded in bar. Two cases were cited in support of this view—The Ipsstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (1) and Eyre v. Archer (2). On the part of the defendant, it was urged that the plea was good, as an accord and satisfaction.

The plaintiff did not execute the deed; and therefore the first question here is, whether the requirements of the 192nd and following sections of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 have been sufficiently complied with to bind the minority by the assent of the majority of creditors in number and value. Compliance with such requisites, procuring assents, registration, &c., is sufficiently alleged in that plea, and therefore admitted on demurrer. The case of Clapham v. Atkinson (7), in error, decided that it is no valid objection that a deed is a mere composition-deed, containing no cessio bonorum. Another objection was suggested, namely, that the deed contains no covenant by the debtor to pay the composition mentioned, and that it shews no means by which the creditors can enforce payment. It is very clear, we think, that, upon actual default made by the debtor, the creditors are admitted to their remedy on their original debts; and it appears to us that the creditors cannot complain of any inequality or unreasonable preference. We think, therefore, that this is such a deed as, by virtue of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, to bind the plaintiff in the same manner as if he had executed it.

This being so, the question before us is, whether the plea is a good one, which alleges that the creditors of the defendant, the plaintiff being one, "had agreed to accept a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound, in discharge of their respective debts, so far as they are able to do without the consent or permission of, and without prejudice to the rights or claims of third parties or sureties, but no further"; and then alleges a tender, by the defendant to the plaintiff, of the amount of the composition. We think that such a plea is good, and that our judgment must be for the defendant. It has been held that the agreement of other creditors to accept the composition is a sufficient consideration for the agreement of each individual creditor to accept a smaller sum in satisfaction of a larger. There is therefore here a good accord. And then arises the question as to the effect of the tender. It may be inferred from Reay v. White (8) that where there is a binding accord to receive a particular composition in discharge of a debt, a tender of the composition agreed upon is sufficient to make the plea good. This may also be inferred from Roeling v. Mugeridge (9) and Norman v. Thompson (10), Cooper v. Phillips (11) and Hazard v. Mare (12). The cases cited on the part of the plaintiff are distinguishable from the present. In Eyre v. Archer (2) the deed was in the form of Schedule D. of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, and was therefore a mere assignment, and not a composition-deed. In The Ipstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (1) there was an agreement by the creditors to accept a particular composition as well as an assignment by the debtor; but there was no allegation of tender. The question to decide was, whether the plea was good as a statutable release, and not whether, if it had averred a tender, it would have been good. We think the deed in this case is as good, under the Bankruptcy Act, to bind the plaintiff as if he had signed it, and that the plea which alleges a tender shows a good defence. There will therefore be Judgment for the defendant.

} STONE v. STRANGE

Inspection of Documents—Breach of Promise of Marriage.

The Court will allow a defendant in an action for breach of promise of marriage (as in other cases of contract) to inspect and take copies of letters in the plaintiff's possession written by the defendant to the plaintiff.

This was an action for breach of promise of marriage. The defendant applied at chambers for an order to inspect letters in the plaintiff's possession which he had written to the plaintiff. Bramwell, B. refused the order; and H. T. Cole subsequently obtained a rule to shew cause why the defendant should not inspect and take copies of the letters written by him to the plaintiff, or why the plaintiff should not answer on affidavit, stating what documents she had in her possession relating to the matters in dispute, or what she knew as to the custody such documents were in, and whether she objected to their production, and if so on what grounds.

C. G. Prideaux now shewed cause.—The defendant's affidavits do not suggest that the letters will assist his case, but merely state that he will be prejudiced if the inspection be not allowed. He cannot have discovery or inspection to ascertain the weak points of the plaintiff's case—Wigram on Discovery, 261, Schneider v. Mangino (1), Shadwell v. Shadwell (2).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—He wants to know what he himself wrote. If the letters contain an agreement to marry, he is entitled to see them ex debito justitiæ, just as he would be in the case of any other contract.]

H. T. Cole cited Price v. Harrison (3),—but was not called on to argue.

POLLOCK, C.B.—Let the rule be made absolute in the first alternative.

Rule absolute accordingly.

1865. } HENRY WALKER AND OTHERS
 Jan. 25; } v. WILLIAM NEVILL AND
 Feb. 10. } WILLIAM JAMES NEVILL.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), sections 192. and 197.—Composition-Deed—Joint and Separate Creditors—Joint and Separate Estates—Covenant not to sue.

A deed of composition and inspection entered into by the defendants and their creditors, and purporting to be made under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, shewed that there were joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates of the compounding debtors, and that both classes of creditors were to receive a uniform composition of 18s. in the pound:—Held, that, although the deed placed the joint and separate creditors on the same footing, it was a valid deed, under sections 192. and 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

Quære—Whether the deed would have been valid if it had been a deed of assignment, and for a distribution of the debtor's estate.

A plea of an arrangement by deed, under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, between the defendants and their creditors, shewing that there were joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates, averred that "a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the said creditors of the defendants, and each of them, &c. executed the indenture":—Held, that it was sufficiently averred in the plea, that the requisite majority of each class of creditors had assented to the deed, so as to make the deed binding on non-assenting creditors.

A deed of composition and inspection contained a covenant, on the part of the creditors, not-to sue within a time limited, viz. before the 20th of May 1865, accompanied by the following stipulation: "That these presents shall and may be pleaded and allowed in any court of law or equity as a bar, or in discharge of all and every action or actions, suit or suits, or other proceedings, judgments and executions which shall or may be brought, commenced, sued, prosecuted, or taken against the debtors, or either of them, or their, or either of their, goods or estates by the said several creditors, or any of them . . . contrary to the true intent and meaning of these presents":—Held, that although a covenant not to sue for a limited time cannot be pleaded in bar, yet such a covenant accompanied by an express provision that during the limited time it may be so pleaded can be pleaded in bar.

The affidavit required by the fifth condition of section 192. to be delivered to the chief Registrar, stating a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtors . . . have in writing assented to or approved of such deed, and also stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the debtors comprised in such deed, need not distinguish the joint from the separate debts of the debtors.

Declaration against the defendants on a joint and several bond to recover the sum of 10,000*l.* payable by instalments.

Plea, by the defendant William Nevill, that he had entered into an arrangement by deed, under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, with his creditors to pay them a composition of 18s. in the pound.

The material parts of the deed were as follows: This indenture, made on the 24th of June 1864, between William Nevill and William James Nevill, son of the said W. Nevill, merchants and copartners, of the first part, E. P. White, D. G. Asser, and H. Blackburn, who or whose respective partnership firms are creditors of W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, and such copartners, of the second part, and the several persons, companies and partnership firms, including the parties hereto of the second part who are creditors of the said W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, or of one of them, whether executing by themselves or their respective attornies, partners or agents, or assenting to these presents, being an instrument intending to take effect under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, or bound thereby in consequence of the same being executed or assented to, or approved of in writing by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the joint and separate creditors of the said W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* or upwards, of the third part.

It recited that W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill carried on, in Gresham Street West, the trade of manufacturers of hosiery, in copartnership, under the firm of T. B. and W. Nevill & Co. That W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill were indebted jointly as copartners or severally to several persons whose names, or the names of whose firms, were mentioned in the schedule in the sums set opposite to such names. That W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, thereafter occasionally referred to as the said debtors, being unable to pay in full the amount of the several debts due from them, had proposed to pay to their creditors at once a dividend of 10s. in the pound on the amount of their debts and further dividends, amounting to at least 5s. in the pound on the amount of the debts before the 20th of November 1864; and further dividends, making together with the previous dividend an aggregate dividend of 18s. in the pound on the amounts of the debts on the 20th of May 1865; and that on such payments, amounting to 18s. in the pound, the said debtors should be released and discharged upon the remaining part of such debts, and that the debtors should have a letter of licence from their creditors; and that the creditors had assented and agreed to such proposal on condition that the debtors should collect their assets and wind up their estate under the inspection and subject to the direction of the committee. And that there was a sum of money belonging to the debtors in the bank of Barclay & Co. sufficient for the payment of the dividend of 10s., and which was available for that purpose, and the debtors had other assets the realization of which would, it was estimated, furnish the means of paying such further dividends as would make up the composition of 18s. in the pound.

The deed then witnessed that W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill did jointly and severally covenant with each of their creditors parties thereto, in the manner following: "That they, W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, or one of them, their or one of their heirs, executors, or administrators, shall and will pay out of the sum or fund now available or appropriated for that purpose, unto the creditors respectively, or their executors or administrators, on demand made as to each debt by the creditor or creditors to whom it is owing, his or their executors or administrators 10s. in the pound, on the amounts of the respective debts due and owing to the creditors respectively, and also shall and will, before the 20th of November 1864, pay or cause to be paid unto the creditors respectively, or their executors and administrators, pari passu and without any preference or priority, at one time, or from time to time, according to the assets in hand, such sum or sums as will make up a further dividend of at least 5s. in the pound on the amounts of the debts due and owing from them the debtors to the creditors, and also shall and will, before the 20th of May 1865, pay or cause to be paid unto the creditors or their respective executors and administrators, pari passu and without any preference or priority, at one time, or from time to time, such sum or sums of money as will make up a further dividend of 3s. on the amount of such debts, which dividends will together amount to the aggregate dividend or composition of 18s. in the pound on the amounts of the respective debts."

"And also will until the composition of 18s. in the pound shall have been paid, manage and wind up the partnership trade, and realize and collect their stock, credits and assets under the inspection and subject to the control of the committee." And the deed further witnessed, "that in consideration of the premises, they the several creditors parties hereto do, and every of them doth hereby, give and grant unto W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, and each of them, full force and perfect licence and liberty to come and go, pass and repass, from place to place within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, when, where, and as their or either of their business or occasions shall serve or require, until the 20th of May 1865, without being sued, molested, arrested, charged or troubled in their or either of their persons or otherwise, for and concerning or on account of any debt, sum or sums of money, or other matter or thing whatsoever, whereby or wherewith they or either of them are or is or may be charged or chargeable or indebted to the several creditors or any of them, or their or any of their heirs, executors or administrators, partners or partner. And each of them the several creditors parties hereto, so far as relates to the acts and deeds of himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, doth covenant with W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, and each of them, their and each of their heirs, executors and administrators, that they the several creditors respectively, or their respective executors and administrators, or any other person or persons whomsoever, by, with or through their or any of their order, consent or discretion, privity or contrivance, shall not nor will at any time hereafter before the 20th of May 1865, sue, arrest, attach, extend, molest, implead or trouble W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill, or either of them, their heirs, executors or administrators, or their or either of their bodies, goods or estates, for or on account of any debts, dues or sums of money which they or either of them now owe or owes to the creditors respectively, or their respective partners, either solely by themselves or himself, or jointly with or for any other person or persons whomsoever, by bond, bill or covenant, simple contract or otherwise howsoever, for or on account of any other cause, matter or thing whatsoever, wherewith they the debtors, or either of them, now are or is or shall or may be charged or chargeable; and that these presents shall and may be pleaded and allowed in any court of law or equity as a bar and in discharge of all and every action or actions, suit or suits, or other proceedings, judgments and executions which shall or may be brought, commenced, sued, prosecuted or taken against them or either of them, their or either of their heirs, executors or administrators, or their or either of their goods or estates, by the said several creditors or any of them, their or any of their executors or administrators, or any other person or persons whomsoever, by, through or with their or any of their acts, means, privity, order, consent or procurement, contrary to the true intent and meaning of these presents; and further, that if and when the said composition of 18s. in the pound shall be duly paid to the creditors respectively, then W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill respectively, and their respective heirs, executors and administrators, estates and effects, shall stand and be for ever acquitted, released and discharged of or from all the several debts and liabilities now owing from or incurred by them or either of them and the creditors respectively, all claims and demands in respect or on account hereof; and these presents shall be pleaded as such release accordingly, but without prejudice to any mortgage, lien or other security which any of the creditors now hold or are entitled to for their respective debts, or to their right to enforce or avail themselves of such security, and without prejudice to rights and remedies against parties other than the debtors liable to the creditors. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that if the said W. Nevill and W. J. Nevill shall have, in the opinion of the said committee, made default in the observance or performance of any of the covenants or agreements hereinbefore on their behalf contained, or if the committee shall deem it advisable with reference to the general interests of the creditors so to do, in consequence of any proceedings being adopted adversely to the debtors or either of them, or to the present arrangement, it shall be lawful for the committee at any time before the payment of the composition, by writing under their hands, to revoke the letters of licence, hereinbefore contained."

The deed also contained clauses that the committee should adopt or oppose any proceedings against the debtors in the Court of Bankruptcy, with the view of obtaining or contesting any adjudication of bankruptcy, and that the parties of the second part should be indemnified and saved harmless out of the estate and effects of the debtors in respect of all matters and things which they shall lawfully do in or concerning the business affairs of the debtors, and that the creditors should at all times allow and confirm their acts in all respects, and that the parties of the second part should be reimbursed and repaid out of the estate and effects of the debtors all costs, charges, and reasonable expenses that they should sustain about the matters and things aforesaid.

The plea then averred that the plaintiffs were creditors of the defendants within the meaning of the indenture, and that the defendants duly executed the indenture, and that its execution was duly attested by an attorney, and that the parties to the indenture of the second part duly executed the deed, and that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the said creditors of the defendants and each of them whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, executed the indenture or in writing assented thereto or approved thereof, and that within twenty-eight days from the day of its execution by the defendants the same was produced and left, having been and the same was before registration duly stamped with and bore such ordinary ad valorem stamp duties as in and by the said act were and are in that behalf required, at the office of the chief registrar, in the said act in that behalf mentioned, for the purpose of being, and the same was within the said twenty-eight days duly registered according to the act, and that together with the said indenture there was delivered to such registrar an affidavit by the defendants that such a majority as aforesaid had executed or in writing assented to or approved the said indenture as aforesaid, and which affidavit also stated the amount or value of the property and credits of the defendants and each of them as and being such debtors comprised in the said deed, and to be distributed thereunder, of which said deed and of the said execution thereof the plaintiffs at the time of the commencement of this suit had full notice and knowledge; and that the plaintiffs, as and being such creditors as aforesaid, afterwards, contrary to the covenant, licences, liberty and letters of licences in the indenture mentioned, and without the said letters of licence having been at all revoked, sued and impleaded the defendants by bringing this action and declaring and proceeding herein, and on account of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, the same being and consisting of certain debts, dues and sums of money which the defendants at the date and at the time of the said execution of the said indenture by the defendants and the parties thereto of the second part, and by the said majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors as aforesaid, owed to the plaintiffs by and under the bond in the declaration mentioned; and that the defendants have since their execution of the said indenture always been ready and willing to do, and have done, and the said committee in the said indenture mentioned and the said creditors have respectively done, and everything has happened necessary to make the said indenture, and each and every of the provisions thereof, valid under the said act, and as binding upon the plaintiffs as if they had been parties thereto and had duly executed the same.

The plaintiffs replied by a fifth replication—That at the time of the execution of the said indenture by the defendants, they the defendants were and still are jointly, and each of them was and still is severally, indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount for which this action is brought, and that amongst the said creditors parties to the said indenture of the third part there are other joint creditors of the said defendants whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, and that the said defendants at the time of their said execution of the said indenture were possessed of joint property and estate, and each of them was possessed of separate property and estate.

Sixth replication—That amongst the creditors parties to the said indenture of the third part, there are joint creditors of the defendants whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, and also separate creditors of each of the defendants whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, and that together with the said indenture there was not delivered to the chief registrar a full account of the debts of the defendants which respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, distinguishing the partnership debts of them, the said defendants, from the separate debts of each of them, as required by the General Order in Bankruptcy of the 22nd of May 1862.

The plaintiffs also demurred to the plea.

The defendant joined in demurrer, and demurred to the fifth and sixth replications respectively, to which there was a joinder in demurrer.

Butt (W. Paterson with him), in support of the demurrer.—The first point is, that it appears from the deed that there are joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates, and as the deed provides a uniform dividend to be paid to both classes of creditors it places them on the same footing. Now, under the Bankrupt Act, 1849, the two estates would have to have been kept distinct, the separate estate for the separate creditors and the joint estate for the joint creditors; and the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, by the 177th section, likewise contemplates a distinct administration of the joint and separate estates in bankruptcy.

[CHANNELL, B.—No doubt, under the practice in bankruptcy the proceeds of the separate estate were applied to the discharge of the debts of the creditors on the separate estate, and the joint assets in like manner to the payment of the creditors claiming on the joint estate, and then if there was a surplus of assets of the separate estate it was carried over to the joint estate: but may there not be by section 197, where the deed shall expressly so provide, a division of assets otherwise than according to the law and practice of bankruptcy?]

The deed cannot put upon a non-assenting creditor the same dividend, with respect to his claim on the separate estate, as that received by a creditor claiming on the joint estate from the assets of such joint estate. If the estate is administered without the joint and separate estates being kept distinct, the joint creditors may have their dividends increased at the expense of the separate estate, and the creditors on the separate estate, who may possibly be entitled to be paid in full out of the separate estate, would have to share pari passu with the creditors on the joint estate. Under the Bankrupt Act of 1849, this question was decided in Leonard v. Sheard (1). The point made in that case was, that the deed was bad because either it did not provide for the separate creditors at all, or if it did, it put them upon the same footing as those creditors to whom the joint debts were due, and on this ground the Court held the deed invalid; Erle, C.J., who then was a member of the Court of Queen's Bench, in his judgment says, "The assignment to the trustees is of the joint and separate estate of the defendants, and the trusts which the parties of the second part have to perform is to distribute the joint and separate estate of the defendants equally among the joint creditors. In a case of bankruptcy the joint estate would have to be distributed among the joint creditors and the separate estate among the separate creditors."

[CHANNELL, B.—In that case there was an assignment of the debtor's property for the benefit of his creditors, and the Court held that such property ought to be distributed as required by the Bankrupt Law; but the present is the case of a composition-deed.]

There is no real distinction between the two cases. The 224th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1849, is repealed, but the 197th section places the case on the same footing as it would have occupied had the 224th section not been repealed. The section in the present act provides, first, that the parties to the deed in all matters relating to the estate and effects of the debtor shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, and shall have the benefit and be liable to all the provisions of the act; and then goes on to state, that the creditors under the same shall have the same rights with respect to the debtor and his estate and effects as are possessed by creditors with respect to the bankrupt or his estate and effects in bankruptcy. This point was raised in Ex parte Cockburn (2); but the Lord Chancellor in disposing of it grounded his judgment on the fact, that the deed did not shew that there was any joint estate at all. Now, here it appears on the record that there are joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates. In his judgment the Lord Chancellor says that it has been argued "the word 'creditors' ought to be taken as indicating the several classes of creditors, and that the words of the statute ought to be taken, distributing as to the majority and value of each class, the object of course being to shew that if there be not a majority of each class assenting the parliamentary conditions have not been fulfilled; and the result being represented to be that if the separate creditors were to unite the joint estate might be distributed amongst the separate creditors. But if there be no joint estate the assets will be distributed pari passu amongst all the creditors joint and separate. In this case I am obliged to assume that there is no joint estate, because it lies at the very foundation of this objection that there should be a joint estate. If there had been any, there might have been some weight in the argument; but I must assume the contrary, and there being no joint estate the joint and separate creditors are not distinguishable in any respect." The Lord Chancellor's observations apply as much to composition-deeds as they do to deeds of assignment, and on the face of the present deed the existence of joint and separate estates is shewn; it also appears that there is a sum of money in the hands of certain bankers which is to be applied to the payment of the dividend. Secondly, the averment in the deed is, that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the said creditors have executed the deed is insufficient, as "said creditors" can only mean joint and separate creditors. As that averment stands at present, it is impossible to say whether a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the joint creditors or separate creditors, and of both joint and separate, have executed the deed; if the requisite number of joint creditors have not signed the deed, the plaintiffs as non-assenting creditors are not bound by it.

(1) 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 183; s.c. 1 E. & E. 667.

(2) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 17.

[CHANNELL, B.—On general demurrer, I think the averment in the plea must be taken to mean that the requisite number of joint and separate creditors have signed.]

Either the deed ought to be made with the joint creditors alone, and there ought to have been a separate deed with the separate creditors, or it might be possible to draw a deed including both joint and separate creditors, and then to obtain the assent of three-fourths in number and value of the joint and separate creditors respectively, and thereby shew that the requisite number of each set of creditors have signed the deed. Thirdly, the covenant not to sue contained in the deed is not pleadable in bar. It does not amount to a covenant not to sue at any time, but is a covenant not to sue for a limited time. Now, it is well-considered law that a covenant not to sue at any time may be pleaded in bar to avoid circuitry of action, but a covenant not to sue for a limited time cannot be so pleaded—2 Wms. Saund. 150 a, Thimbleby v. Barron (3); the reason is, that if the right to bring a personal action be once suspended, for ever so short a time, it is extinguished—Ford v. Beech (4). To defeat this strict rule of law, a covenant not to sue is construed according to the intention of the parties, and as it never could be their intention that the right of action should be for ever lost, it is held that such a covenant does not operate so as to be pleaded in bar, but that it only gives the covenantee a remedy by cross-action. Here the covenant is not to sue until the 20th of May 1865; it is clearly therefore a covenant not to sue for a time limited, and is not pleadable in bar. Fourthly, a deed under the 192nd section is only binding on the non-assenting creditors when all the requisites of that section have been complied with. By the fifth condition of that section it is made necessary that together with the deed an affidavit should be delivered to the Chief Registrar, amongst other things, stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the said debtor comprised in the deed. Now, the averment in the plea limits the operation of that section by confining the statement in the affidavit to the property to be distributed under the deed. The creditor is entitled to have a statement on oath, not only of that which his debtor can pay but also of his credits; the statement in the affidavit is also insufficient, because it does not, according to the General Order in Bankruptcy, 22nd of May 1862 (5), distinguish the partnership debts from the separate debts. Lastly, the covenant not to sue and the proviso relating to the revocation of the letters of licence by the Committee of Inspection are unreasonable, and the deed is therefore not binding on the non-assenting creditors.

Mellish (Beresford with him), in support of the plea. — The main question is, whether the deed is bad because the same dividend is to be paid to the joint and separate creditors. In some cases the assets must be distributed as in bankruptcy, but in the case of a composition-deed, the composition may be paid by some third person, and it may be that it is the interest of the creditors to accept a composition, because they obtain a better dividend through some third person than they would if they had an assignment of the debtors' estate and distributed it among themselves. It certainly appears here that there is a certain sum of money at the bankers' available for the payment of the first instalment of the composition, but it does not appear whether it forms part of the assets of the debtors or from whence it comes. When once it is decided that a composition-deed is within the 192nd section the act applies.

(5) Together with every deed or instrument left after the 5th of June next at the office of the Chief Registrar, under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and in addition to the affidavit or certificate required to be delivered to the Chief Registrar under the fifth condition of the said section, there shall be delivered to the Chief Registrar a copy of such deed or instrument certified by the attorney or solicitor attesting the execution of the same by the debtor to be a true copy, and also and as near as may be in the form of the schedule hereunder written, a full account of the debts of the debtor which shall respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, together with the names in alphabetical order and the residences of his creditors, distinguishing those who have, in writing, assented to or approved of the deed, and such account shall be accompanied with an affidavit by such debtor verifying the same.

[CHANNELL, B.—It was decided in Clapham v. Atkinson (6), in the Exchequer Chamber, that a deed between a debtor and his creditors means all his creditors, and that such a deed is within the 192nd section of the act.]

Yes, "all his creditors"; that must mean joint and separate creditors. How is it possible to read this deed without holding that it deals with all the creditors?

[CHANNELL, B.—Prima facie, "creditors" means all the creditors.]

In bankruptcy there is no such thing as a certificate that applies to a discharge from separate creditors without applying as well to a discharge from the joint creditors. The words in the 192nd section, "a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors," mean three-fourths of all creditors, joint and several. There are plenty of anomalies in the act; that cannot be helped; if the deed is within section 192, then it is valid, and the act must be worked out as best it can. The plea does not shew that any injustice is done to any set of creditors; if it could be shewn that the separate assets were enough to pay 20s. in the pound, there might be some foundation for the argument on the other side. A creditor who has a joint claim upon his debtors as well as a several claim against one of them, has his choice whether he will prove on the joint or separate estate. Take the common case of a holder of a joint and several promissory note, he has his election as to the proof of his debt. In which list is he, the holder of a joint and several promissory note, to be ranked? Is he to be counted in both lists? This only shews that there are great difficulties in carrying out the act, and it is only a reasonable construction to hold that the act is complied with if the creditors, both joint and separate, constitute the requisite number. It is so in inspection deeds. It is not more reasonable to create two classes of creditors, and for that purpose to take them separately. In deeds of assignment and inspection the difficulties of applying the act are less numerous, but in the case of composition-deeds, the essence of which is that there is to be no distribution of assets, it is impossible to apply some of the expressions in section 192. One argument used to shew that this is not a deed within the act is, that the 197th section does not apply to composition-deeds. The answer is, it can only be applied so far as the nature of the thing admits. It is there enacted that the creditors have certain powers, rights and remedies with respect to the debtor "and his estate and effects"; how can those words be applied to composition-deeds, "and the collection and recovery of the same"? or how can that expression be applied when there is no estate and effects to be collected or recovered and there is nothing to be distributed? From the proviso at the end of the section, it may with reason be held, that the intention of the legislature was that the 197th section is not to be applied strictly to all deeds, but only so far as its provisions may be applicable. No authorities can be adduced adverse to this argument. Leonard v. Sheard (1) was a case of a deed of assignment.

Ex parte Cockburn (2) decides nothing to the present purpose; a point somewhat similar to that raised in the present case was taken, but the facts did not support it, and from that alone it must not be inferred what the decision would have been. The true construction of the 192nd section is that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value, means three-fourths of the creditors taking the joint and separate creditors together. The averment in the plea, that a "majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the said creditors of the defendants and each of them," sufficiently shews that the majority is composed of both classes of creditors. Next, with regard to the objection to the covenant not to sue. No doubt, at common law, except in the case of bills of exchange, a right of action cannot be suspended; a right of action once suspended is lost. But the plea in the present case is good, because the covenant expressly goes on to stipulate "that these presents shall and may be pleaded and allowed in any court of law or equity as a bar and in discharge of all and every action or actions, suit or suits, or other proceedings, judgments and executions which shall or may be brought, commenced, sued, prosecuted or taken against them, or the debtors, or either of them, by the said several creditors, contrary to the true intent and meaning of these presents." In Gibbons v. Vouillon (7) it was held, that if the covenant operates as a defeasance, it could be pleaded in bar. The objection to that is, that if the deed contain such a covenant and the creditor sue for his debt, he loses his debt altogether, so that he is not even entitled to a dividend on it; and that is thought, and properly so, to be very unreasonable; but this deed has been very carefully worded, so that the consequences of a creditor bringing his action is not to extinguish his debt, but merely to prevent him from recovering it. This case differs from that of Dell v. King (8), and is similar to the covenant contained in the deed in the case of Strick v. De Mattos (9), which this Court held to be a good deed. Keyes v. Elkins (10) is also an authority in favour of the defendant that the covenant not to sue is pleadable in bar. With regard to the last point. Special demurrers are now abolished, and the plea is to be construed according to the requirements of the act. The only object of the affidavit is for the purposes of the stamp-duty; it is required simply to shew the amount of the duty to be charged, and not to state the amount of the debtor's property. Besides, the replication is bad. It ought to have set out the order in bankruptcy. Can it be said that a disobedience of the order invalidates the whole deed?

(9) 33 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) Exch. 276; s. c. 3 H. & C. 22.

(10) Ante, Q. B. 25.

There is no penalty attached for a disobedience of the order. It is merely a direction to the registrar that he is not to register a deed unless it be accompanied with a proper affidavit; it cannot mean, that if an affidavit be delivered and it contain an error the deed is to be vitiated. The Lord Chancellor by an order in bankruptcy cannot add a condition to the act of parliament.

Butt, in reply.—This is not strictly a composition-deed, for it provides for the distribution of a certain sum of money which is stated in the deed to be ready for distribution; and it also states that there are other assets, the realization of which would furnish the means of paying the further dividends. In construing the 197th section the 192nd section cannot be excluded. The words of the former section are, "every such deed"; that must mean deeds mentioned in section 192. The present deed is not a valid deed within those sections. In Addison on Contracts, p. 920, 5th edit., under the head 'Covenant not to sue,' it is laid down, Where a creditor has covenanted that he will not put his contract in suit at any time, there the covenant is pleadable in bar as a release; but where the covenant is that it shall not be put in suit for a certain time, there it is only a covenant not pleadable in bar unless it be a covenant not to sue for a limited time, with a proviso for forfeiture if an action be brought within that time, in which case it operates as a bar by force of the condition if the action be brought within the time. That is not the case in the present instance; here the covenant is simply one not to sue for a limited time. In Gibbons v. Vouillon (7) there was not only a covenant not to sue, but a forfeiture of the debt if the plaintiff sued. Strick v. De Mattos (9) is distinguishable. The covenant not to sue in that case was unlimited as to time; it was, not to sue whilst the deed was in force. The deed was in force for ever, therefore it was not a covenant not to sue for a limited time.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, B. (Feb. 10) delivered the judgment of the Court (11).—This was an action of debt on a bond given by the two defendants to the plaintiffs, conditioned for payment by defendants jointly and severally of money by instalments.

The defendant William Nevill pleaded a deed dated the 20th of June 1864, relied on by him as a valid deed under the Bankruptcy Act of 1861.

After setting out the deed verbatim, the plea goes on to allege the existence and performance of such matters dehors the deed as prima facie, and subject to the objections hereinafter stated, would make it a valid deed under the Bankruptcy Act. To this plea there was a demurrer, and the question arises whether the plea is good.

The first objection raised to the plea is, that it appears therefrom that there are joint and separate creditors, and also joint and separate estates of the compounding debtors, and that the deed places the joint and separate creditors on the same footing, and that such a deed, even though a good deed under the 192nd section of the Bankrupt Act, looking to that section only, is void as against non-executing creditors by reason of the facts stated and the 197th section. In support of this objection, the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 140. was referred to. We think that this objection to the deed cannot be sustained. Looking to the 192nd section, apart from the 197th section, a deed of composition, though it contain no cessio bonorum, comes within the words in the 192nd section, namely, a deed "relating to the debts or liabilities of the debtor and his release therefrom, or the distribution, inspection, management, and winding up of his estate, or any of such matters."

Whatever doubt may have formerly existed, we hold this point to be now decided by the recent case of Clapham v. Atkinson, in the Court of Queen's Bench, and in the Exchequer Chamber (6). The present deed is not, it is said, a deed of composition only; but it does not at all purport to be a deed of assignment. It is, we think, a deed of composition and inspection, and good as such under the 192nd section. Then, do the provisions of the 197th section (taking the fact to be that there are joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates, whilst as to the composition to be paid both classes of creditors are placed on the same footing) render the deed inoperative against non-executing creditors? We think not. The words relied on in the 197th section to invalidate the deed, are the word "such" in the commencement of that section, and the words "all parties bound thereby shall in all matters relating to the estate and effects of such debtor be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, and shall respectively have the benefit of and be liable to the provisions of this act, in the same or like manner as if the debtor had been adjudged a bankrupt, and the creditors had proved, and the trustees had been appointed creditors' assignees under such bankruptcy; and the creditors under the same shall, as between themselves respectively, have the same rights with respect to the debtor and his estate and effects, and the collection and recovery of the same, as may be used or exercised with respect to the bankrupt, or his estate and effects in bankruptcy." Whatever weight there might be in the objection, as applicable to a deed of assignment, where the property assigned is to be distributed, but at the same time a distribution according to the law of bankruptcy as applicable to joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates, is excluded, we think that it does not invalidate a deed of composition and inspection, good within the 192nd section. As the words of the 192nd section have been considered as applying to several classes of deeds, namely, deeds of composition as apart from deeds of assignment and for distribution, we think the words in the part of the 197th section which we have been considering may be so read as to be inapplicable to a deed of composition, however they may apply to and affect a deed of distribution.

We were referred by Mr. Butt to the case of Ex parte Cockburn (2) on appeal. There the point was mooted; but in that case there was no proof of the existence of any joint estate, and no opportunity was afforded of deciding the point. We do not find any expression of opinion by the Lord Chancellor in that case, as to the weight of the objection had it distinctly arisen, that calls upon us to doubt the conclusion at which, in the present case, we have arrived.

It is also objected that the deed could not bind the non-assenting creditors, unless the requisite majority of each class, namely, of the joint creditors, and of the separate creditors of each debtor, had assented. If that be so, we think the allegation in the plea, that "a majority of the said creditors of the defendant and each of them assented," is a sufficient averment of such assent.

It was further contended, by the plaintiffs, though not very strenuously, that the covenant by the creditors not to sue was unreasonable, and that the proviso in the deed relating to the revocation of the letters of licence by the committee of inspectors was unreasonable, and that in respect of these matters the deed was not binding on non-executing creditors. We do not think that these are such unreasonable conditions as would avoid the deed.

It was more shrewdly contended that the deed in question could not be pleaded in bar; that it contained no present release, but a covenant to execute a release at or after the time when 18s. in the pound should be paid.

It was further argued, that though a covenant not to sue at any time might be pleaded as a discharge, the present covenant was not such a covenant, but only a covenant not to sue for a limited time, and that such a covenant could not be pleaded in bar.

Now, there is no doubt that a simple covenant not to sue for a limited time, is of itself only the subject for a cross-action, if broken, and not pleadable in bar. But here there is an express provision, that during this limited time, the deed may be pleaded in bar; and we think, that if the plaintiff had in fact executed such a covenant, it might be pleaded in bar to an action by him. This being the case, he is in the same position by virtue of the statute, unless this or some other covenant in the deed is so unreasonable that the assent of the requisite majority cannot bind the minority. In Dell v. King (8) the covenant, which we held to make the deed bad, was so framed as to work a forfeiture of all claim against the debtor's estate in the case of an action being brought. If a creditor had brought an action with the bona fide intention of contesting the validity of that deed, or of proving the amount of his claim, he would, if the deed had been held to bind him, have lost not only his original demand, but also all claim to the composition. Now here the case is different. The creditor may, if he chooses, bring an action for the purpose of testing the validity of the deed, and by so doing will not forfeit his right to the composition.

A covenant not to sue, which, though differently worded, was in effect the same as this, was contained in the deed in Hidson v. Barclay, the decision of which case in this court is reported in the 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 273, and 3 Hurl. & C. 9. That deed has now been held good by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of this Court (12). It may, therefore, now be taken, that a covenant not to sue does not make the deed void as against the non-assenting creditors, and further that if properly worded to effect that purpose as this one is, it may be pleaded in bar. We think, therefore, that this plea is good.

Besides the demurrer to the plea, there were two replications which were demurred to. The fifth replication only states facts for the purpose of raising rather more distinctly the first objection to the plea which we have already disposed of. The sixth replication alleges, that an affidavit distinguishing the joint and separate debts, was not delivered to the registrar. The 192nd section does not require that the affidavit to be delivered shall so distinguish the debts, and we think that we cannot import such requirement into the act as an additional condition to the validity of the deed.

Our judgment will therefore be for the defendant on all the demurrers.

Jan. 14. } WRIGHT v. GOODLAKE

Evidence—Interrogatories—Payment into Court.

Interrogatories may be put to a plaintiff to ascertain the true measure of the damages he has sustained, and so guide the defendant as to the amount he may fairly pay into court.

The plaintiff, who was the author and registered proprietor of a pamphlet called History and Construction of the Clifton Suspension Bridge, brought this action against the printer and publisher of The Times newspaper, for infringing the copyright of the pamphlet. The plaintiff's affidavit stated that the most valuable part of his pamphlet, relating to the construction and engineering of the bridge, was copied verbatim in the columns of The Times, without any acknowledgment, on the 20th of September 1864, the day before that fixed for the visit of the members of the British Association to the bridge, on which occasion the plaintiff expected to sell a large number of copies of the pamphlet; and that though application had since been made to the editor of The Times, no acknowledgment had been made of the article having been taken from the plaintiff's book. Martin, B. at chambers made an order by which the following (among other) interrogatories were allowed to be put to the plaintiff by the defendant: "When did you publish the pamphlet, and do you claim to have a subsisting copyright in it? State how many copies were sold during the two months next preceeding the 20th of September last, and how many during the two months next following the said 20th of September; also how many, if any, were sold on the said 20th of September."

Wills moved for a rule to set this order aside, on the ground that it was unfair to interrogate with the view of ascertaining how little the defendant could safely pay into court, and that the order amounted to leave to inspect the plaintiff's books to see how much damage he had sustained.

[CHANNELL, B.—Lord Tenterden said that the bona fide desire to meet a plaintiff's claim by payment into court shewed an honest intention on the part of a defendant.]

A defendant must be considered to enjoy a great privilege in being allowed to pay money into court at all. This is substantially an application to inspect the plaintiff's books of trade, which the defendant is not to be allowed to do just because he has injured the plaintiff.

POLLOCK, C.B.—There is no reason why these interrogatories should not be administered.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 — Composition-Deed not pleaded—Subsequent Attempt to set aside Fi. Fa.

A defendant, who did not plead a composition deed, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, when he had the opportunity, will not be allowed afterwards to avail himself of it for the purpose of defeating execution.

The writ in this action was issued, under the Bills of Exchange Act, on the 24th of November 1864, and the defendant not having applied for leave to appear, judgment was signed on the 20th of December, and execution levied under a fi. fa. on the 26th of December.

On the 6th of December the defendant executed a valid deed of composition with his creditors, which was registered on the 9th; and he now sought to have the fi. fa. set aside, although he had not pleaded the deed.

E. Besley having obtained a rule for that purpose,—

Hayes, Serj. shewed cause, contending that, as the validity of the judgment was not questioned, the defendant could not now, after omitting to plead the deed when he had the chance, and so to give the plaintiff an opportunity of answering it, avail himself of it to set aside the execution.

Pollock (with him Besley), for the defendant, argued that there was no laches on the part of the defendant; and that if there were, still it was contrary to the spirit of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, to allow the defendant's laches to be set up against him, for the effect would be, that the laches of the debtor would give a fraudulent preference to the non-assenting creditors, and thus fraudulent debtors would be encouraged.

POLLOCK, C.B.—Though fraud be a possible result, we must give effect to the law of the land; and as the defendant did not plead the deed when he had the opportunity, he cannot avail himself of it now.

Jan. 31. { SHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Negligence—Accident—Railway Station.

The level crossing between the platforms at a railway station, which formed part of the "way out" for passengers arriving at the south platform, was blocked for more than ten minutes by the train in which the plaintiff arrived there. Under such circumstances, it was usual for the arriving passengers—and the railway company did not object to the practice—to walk alongside and round the end of the train in order to cross the line. The plaintiff in so doing, in the dark, stumbled over a hamper which had been taken out of the train, and placed at the side of the line, some distance from the platform:—Held, that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the railway company.

Declaration—That the defendants were carriers of passengers for hire from Wakefield to Thornhill Lees, in carriages on a railway, and used a certain station at Thornhill Lees for the use and accommodation of the said passengers there; and the said station was in the possession, and under the management of the defendants, for the purpose aforesaid. Yet the defendants negligently managed the said station and carriages, and omitted to light the said station in a proper and sufficient manner for the use and accommodation of the said passengers there, and to provide proper and sufficient accommodation for the said passengers to depart safely from the said carriages, on their arrival at the said station, and negligently left hampers in the way of passengers departing from the carriages at the said station, whereby the plaintiff, having been received and carried by the defendants as a passenger, on the said railway, from Wakefield to Thornhill Lees, and being in the act, on his arrival at the last-mentioned place, of departing from the said carriages, fell over the said hamper and was thrown down with great violence at the said station, and was greatly shaken, and suffered great pain, and was permanently injured, &c.

This action was tried, before Blackburn,

J., at Leeds, during the West Riding Summer Assizes, 1864, when the following facts appeared in evidence.

At the Thornhill Lees station on the defendants' railway, the west end of the platform at the north side of the line was opposite to the east end of the platform at the south side, and there was a level crossing between those points, which was used by passengers arriving at the south platform in order to get to the place of exit from the station, which was situate on the north platform. After dark on the 12th of November 1863, the plaintiff alighted on the south platform from a train in which he had come from Wakefield. The train was so long as to reach considerably beyond the level crossing at the east end of the platform, where the ticket collector was stationed with a light; and, after giving up his ticket there, the plaintiff was directed by the collector to "pass on," and in order to reach the place of exit on the north platform, he walked, with other passengers, alongside the train, intending to cross over the line behind it. This was the usual practice of passengers, and was not objected to by the defendants' servants, when the arriving train was of extraordinary length. While so walking, the plaintiff stumbled over a hamper which had been taken out of the train, and set down at the side of the line, and he thereby sustained the injuries complained of. There was no light near the place where he fell.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 200*l.*, the Judge reserving leave to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should think there was no evidence of negligence.

Overend having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Manisty and Kemplay (Nov. 17, 1864) shewed cause, contending that there was strong evidence of negligence, it being proved that the plaintiff was only following the practice usually observed under similar circumstances, and that his being obliged to go by the path where he sustained the injury, amounted to an invitation to him by the company to use that path.

Overend and Maule, contra, insisted that there was no invitation or even sanction given to the plaintiff by the company to use the road he did. It was his duty to wait where the ticket collector was till the train moved off. Even if there had been a sanction, the fact that there was no light where the plaintiff fell would not amount to negligence on the part of the defendants—Wilkinson v. Fairrie (1).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There was in that case no obligation to go where the accident happened.]

It was the usual practice at the station to deposit goods taken from the trains alongside the line, where the hamper was, and therefore Cornman v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (2) is in point.

[CHANNELL, B. referred to Toomey v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (3).]

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, C.B. delivered the judgment of the Court (4).—In this case the learned Judge reserved the question for the Court in these terms: "I think there is a case to go to the jury, and I reserve leave to enter a nonsuit if the Court should think there is no evidence; the defendant not to appeal without the leave of the Court of Exchequer." The accident appears to have happened by reason of the train, in which the plaintiff arrived at the station, being of greater length than the platform on which the passengers had to alight, in consequence of which the ordinary way across the line for the purpose of getting at the opposite platform and the place of exit from the station was impeded and stopped up by the train; and it appears that the train remained as long as ten minutes or a quarter of an hour. This had happened before, and the passengers, therefore, had acquired the habit of passing along the line, so as to reach the opposite platform by going round the end of the train, and then crossing; and some evidence was given that when the passengers, on this occasion, were at the end of the platform on which they alighted from the train, where the tickets were taken, they were told to "go on," and certainly there was no other way of going on, except by going alongside and round the end of the train. Under these circumstances, we are all of opinion that there was some evidence of negligence to go to the jury. There was no light; there was a hamper put down, which the plaintiff stumbled over, and he received considerable damage. It appears to us sufficient to say that, if on the arrival of a train there is an obstacle to the passengers getting at the place of exit from the station, which remains there for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, there is some evidence of negligence; certainly a passenger should be able to get away in much less time than a quarter of an hour after the arrival of the train by which he came; and, if that be so, the defendants would be responsible for any mischief that arose in this case, unless the jury thought that the accident was entirely attributable to the negligence of the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that it is impossible to say that there was not some evidence of negligence. The rule, therefore, to enter a nonsuit will be discharged, and the verdict must stand.

Rule discharged.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, B. (Feb. 10) delivered the judgment of the Court (1).—This was a special case stated without pleadings for the opinion of the Court, and was argued before us in the course of the present term.

The question is, whether the defendant is liable on a promissory note for 917*l.* 11*s.* dated the 28th of August 1856, payable to the plaintiffs or order.

The facts, as they may be extracted from the case agreed upon, may be shortly stated. The plaintiffs are bankers at Dublin; and they had for many years prior to 1837 and down to the time of his death a banking account with Mr. George Latouche, with whom the defendant Amelia Latouche intermarried in the year 1831. On the occasion of the marriage, property was settled in the usual way to the defendant's separate use. On the 25th of November 1855 the defendant's husband died. After his death she gave the note now sued upon. The circumstances which preceded the giving this note which are material to be noticed are the following. In 1837, her husband's account being then overdrawn, and the plaintiffs being aware that she had separate estate, agreed that her husband should have permission to overdraw his account to the extent of 950*l.* for a period of two years, the plaintiffs retaining certain securities then in their hands, and having by way of further security a joint promissory note of the defendant's husband and herself for 950*l.* The defendant's husband and herself gave a joint promissory note for that amount.

In 1840 a new arrangement was come to, substantially the same as the former. A new joint promissory note was given, dated the 1st of August 1840, for the sum of 950*l.* In 1848 an arrangement was come to, and a third joint promissory note, namely, one for the sum of 1,000*l.*, dated the 1st of January 1848, was given by the defendant's husband and herself. The terms of this arrangement are not distinctly stated in the case. It is, however, clear that the note was given as a security to the bank for the overdrawn account of George Latouche. It is not, however, at all clear with respect to this note, whether there was any limitation of time during which the arrangement was to be enforced, as on the previous occasions. In 1855 the husband died. At that time there was a balance of 2,340*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* due from him to the bank. This was reduced by securities, which have been realized, namely, assignment of a policy and of a legacy, to 917*l.* 11*s.* The bank then applied to the defendant by a letter, in which they state that this last-mentioned balance "is uncovered by any security, an application for your and Mr. Latouche's joint note for the same having been postponed on account of his illness." The defendant, in reply, expresses her regret that she is unable to pay this amount, and ultimately signs the note on which this action is brought. The question we have to decide is, whether she is liable upon this note; and we think she is.

We do not adopt the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel, that the words "for value on account of the late George Latouche" in the note precludes the defendant from shewing there was no consideration for her making it. But as the note prima facie imports a consideration, the onus of proof lies upon the defendant to shew that there was no consideration for this note, which was made at a time when she was not under coverture. We do not think that the facts stated in this case shew there was no consideration. The note of 1848, although made during coverture, was binding on the defendant's separate estate. Unless something occurred to discharge the defendant's separate estate from liability, there was, we think, a good consideration for the note now sued upon, made by her after her coverture was determined. It is not, we think, material that more than six years elapsed from 1848 to 1855, for it has been held that a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations, and as to which the remedy has gone, is still a good consideration for a promise in writing to pay. We think that the same principle applies to the present case, though the note of 1848 was signed by the defendant when covert, and only bound her separate estate in equity.

It was argued that the note must be taken to have been made subject to some agreement between the parties, either as to the time for which George Latouche was to be permitted to overdraw his account, or that it was to be a security (collateral to the assignment of the policy and legacy) for the then overdrawn account to the amount of 1,000*l.* only, and not a security for a new credit beyond the 1,000*l.*; and if such agreement existed, then that, 1,000*l.* having been realized on the policy and assignment of the legacy, the note of 1848 was in effect satisfied, and afforded no consideration for the subsequent one. We think, however, that it does not appear upon the case stated that there was any such agreement, and it is for the defendant to shew it. The only statements in the case at all tending to shew such an agreement are contained in the letters of the plaintiffs of the 31st of July and the 28th of August 1856, and which are to the effect that the balance on the amount of the policy and legacy is uncovered by any security. This, however, when taken with the next sentence, "an application for your and Mr. Latouche's joint note for the same having been postponed on account of his illness," seems to refer to the fact that the six years had expired since the note of 1848, rather than to admit that that note would not have been during the six years a security for such a balance on the ground of any agreement subject to which it was given. Our judgment will, therefore, be for the plaintiffs.

Legacy Duty—Attachment for Non-payment—13 & 14 Vict. c. 97. s. 8.

Under the 8th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, the Court will grant an attachment, absolute in the first instance, against a person withholding legacy duty, who has failed to shew cause why he should not pay the money to the Receiver General of Inland Revenue.

Coxon, on the 24th of November 1864, obtained a rule calling on Robert Eaton to shew cause why he should not pay to the Receiver General of Inland Revenue the sum of 24*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*, which he had received for the purpose of paying legacy duty.

The 8th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97. is as follows: "If any person shall have received or gotten into his hands or shall receive or get into his hands any sum or sums of money as and for the duty upon or in respect of any legacy or residue, and shall improperly neglect or omit to appropriate such sum or sums of money to the due payment of such duty, or shall otherwise by or under any means or pretences whatsoever, improperly withhold or detain the same, every such person shall be accountable for the amount of such duty or sum or sums of money, and the same shall be a debt from such person, to Her Majesty, and recoverable as such accordingly; and it shall be lawful for the Barons of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer in England, Scotland or Ireland respectively, upon application to be made for that purpose on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, upon such affidavit as to such Court may appear sufficient, to grant a rule requiring such person to shew cause why he should not deliver to the said Commissioners an account upon oath of all such duties and sums of money as aforesaid, and why the same should not be forthwith paid to the Receiver General of Inland Revenue or to such persons as the said Commissioners shall appoint or authorize to receive the same."

It appeared on affidavit that Eaton had been duly served with the rule, but did not shew cause. The rule was afterwards made absolute; and

C. Hutton now moved for an attachment absolute in the first instance.—Eaton had disobeyed to the rule absolute of the Court, which was served on him in the usual way; therefore there may be an attachment absolute in the first instance. This resembles the case of an attachment for non-payment of costs between subject and subject; and if a subject may in such case have the attachment absolute, a fortiori the Crown may.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We think that the Commissioners are entitled to an attachment absolute in the first instance.

MARTIN, B., CHANNELL, B. and PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Rule absolute accordingly.

Bill of Sale—Registration under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. — Alteration — Property in Chattels.

The filing of a copy of a bill of sale of personal chattels is valid and effectual under the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, although the original bill of sale has been previously altered or destroyed. The property in the chattels will remain in the person to whom they were conveyed by the deed on its execution.

This was an appeal, by the defendant, against the decision of the Court of Exchequer, discharging a rule to enter a verdict for the defendant, or for a new trial.

The question was as to the validity of a certain bill of sale, by which certain goods were assigned to the plaintiff as the security for a loan. At the time of the execution of the bill of sale a rough inventory of the goods which had been previously made by the plaintiff on several loose sheets and appended to the bill of sale remained fixed thereto. A few days afterwards a fair copy of the inventory was made and signed, and, with the consent of both parties to the bill of sale, the rough inventory was disannexed from the bill of sale and the fair copy affixed to it instead. A copy of the bill of sale and of this fair inventory was duly registered. The rough inventory and the fair copy exactly agreed.

Quain (Hawkins with him), for the appellant, contended that by disannexing the first inventory, the bill of sale was mutilated and altered by the plaintiff, and so rendered void; that as this was done before registration there was, in fact, no bill of sale to register under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, consequently that the bill of sale, not being duly registered, was inoperative under the statute—Pigott's case (1) and Davidson v. Cooper (2).

J. D. Coleridge (Day with him), for the respondent, the plaintiff, urged that all that the Bill of Sales Act, the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, required was that a copy of the bill of sale and schedule should be registered within twenty-one days after the execution of the bill of sale; that this had been done in the present instance; that the alteration was immaterial, as it was only carrying out the intention of the parties, and made with the full knowledge and consent of both; that even if the alteration were material, the property in the goods passed to the plaintiff by the deed at the time of the execution, and remained in him, as the requirements of the statute had been complied with.

[CROMPTON, J.—A bond or a bill, which lie in contract, may be vacated by an alteration; but I never heard of an estate in land being divested because the title-deeds conveying it were destroyed. The object of the act of parliament is to inform the public that on a bygone day a certain deed was executed. BLACKBURN, J.—Supposing the alteration vacated the bill of sale, what does it matter, if a true copy of the bill was filed within the twenty-one days? The property in the goods passed to the plaintiff on the execution of the bill of sale.]

ERLE, C.J.—The distinction is noticed by Lord Abinger, C.B., when delivering the judgment of the Court in Davidson v. Cooper (2), between the case where an altered deed is relied upon as the foundation of a right sought to be enforced, and where it is used merely as proof of some title resulting from its having been executed. Registration of a copy under this act, is not the least affected by the previous destruction of the original deed.

Jan. 21. } ANOTHER.

Landlord and Tenant—Excessive Distress—Damages.

In an action for an excessive distress the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages, although he proves no actual damage.

Declaration for an excessive distress.

Plea, not guilty.

The cause was tried, before Martin, B. and a special jury, at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1864. The plaintiff was tenant to the defendants of a mill and premises situate at Broad Street, Lambeth. The plaintiff being indebted to the defendants for six quarters of rent, amounting to 121*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, the defendants directed their broker to distrain for the same, and accordingly on the 15th of June 1863 the broker entered the mill and seized corn and flour to the value of 260*l.* as a distress for rent. He remained in possession of the premises until the 20th of June, when the plaintiff paid the amount of the rent and costs incurred in making the distress. At the trial the plaintiff proved no actual damage. The learned Judge directed the jury that, if the plaintiff had sustained no real damage, to find a verdict for the defendants. The jury found that the plaintiff had sustained no real damage, whereupon the learned Judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants, reserving leave for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for 1*l.* (being the amount agreed upon between the parties), if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff, notwithstanding he had incurred no actual damage, was entitled to nominal damages.

Laxton having obtained a rule accordingly,—

E. James and J. H. Hodgson, for the defendants, shewed cause.—This action for an excessive distress is brought under the Statute of Marlbridge (52 Hen. 3. c. 4), and that enactment is, that “distresses shall be reasonable and not too great, and they that take unreasonable and undue distress shall be grievously amerced for the excess of such distresses.” The true construction of this act is, that there must be some real damage done to the tenant. In Piggott v.

Birtles (1), Lord Wensleydale, then a member of this Court, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, “The common law right of a landlord to distrain for rent service appears to be restricted at common law to the taking of a reasonable distress.” So Lord Coke intimates in his reading on the Statute of Marlbridge, c. 4 (2), which statute he there says, “agreeth with the reason of the common law.” But whether the duty to make a reasonable distress be created by the common law or by the statute an action will equally lie, if there be a breach of that duty, and damage thereby arise to the person on whose goods the distress is made,” but in the present case the defendant suffered no damage.

Laxton, contra, was not called upon to argue.—He cited Smith v. Ashforth (5).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I do not think that we need hear the learned counsel upon the other side. I think we must take it that the arrangement was made at the trial, as reported by the Judge. The case of Piggott v. Birtles (1) appears to me to mention several instances in all of which there was damage; and it is, I think, in reference to that case that Baron Parke, now Lord Wensleydale, thought, and the whole Court thought with him, that depriving a man of the use of his property for a week was a ground of damage and injury to him, and was a question fit to be left for the consideration of a jury. My Brother Martin, having consulted my Brother Bramwell, reserved the point. In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled either to enter the verdict for 1*l.*, or, if he were not he would be entitled to a new trial. The present verdict for the defendant cannot stand. The evidence disclosed facts which resemble those stated in Piggott v. Birtles (1), a case which decided that an excessive distress continuing for a week was an injury for which the jury might have given some damages. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the rule ought to be made absolute to enter the verdict, according to the arrangement at the trial, for 1*l*. There was actual damage in this case, which, according to the case already alluded to, was a proper subject for a jury to consider.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. The circumstances of this case were these. The defendants made a distress upon the goods of the plaintiff; it was obviously an excessive distress, for the goods seized were of more than double the value of the rent due; the corn and flour having been seized, the sheriff's officer remained in possession for a week; and ultimately he was paid out without a sale. The question is, then, whether I ought to have told the jury, "If you think there was an excessive distress, you must find your verdict for the plaintiff for some damages." I am of opinion that would have been a proper direction; and it seems to me, I own, that the case which has been cited—Piggott v. Birtles (1)—is conclusive upon the matter. I say that there must have been some damage in consequence of the act of the defendants. Mr. James contends that if a man distrained excessively and seized a much larger quantity of goods than was necessary to produce the rent, and within a short time afterwards, or immediately upon having ascertained the distress was excessive, admits that he is in possession of more goods than he ought to have taken, but is willing to confine himself to a reasonable quantity, and says, "I have taken too much in respect of my claim and I will now reduce it," that in such a case the landlord is not liable in damages; but I think we must treat the whole matter as one transaction, and what the landlord did and said after the seizure is entitled to no consideration. But that is not this transaction; it is nothing like it. The plaintiff in this case was a dealer in corn and flour, and he was prevented for a whole week in consequence of the distress from dealing with it. It appears to me that the judgment in the case of Piggott v. Birtles (1) shews that the plaintiff has sustained damage. The damages at the trial were agreed upon; perhaps 1*l*. is too much, but the amount was immaterial; 40*s*. was first named, and then a farthing, and then

1*l*.; I made it 1*l*., because I did not want to throw discredit upon the plaintiff's case; perhaps it would have been better if I had said 1*s*.; but it is an utterly immaterial circumstance. I may say that my Brother Channell is entirely of the same opinion, and he was strongly of opinion when the rule was moved that in an action for an excessive distress, under such circumstances, this was a proper direction to the jury.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. The jury have found there was an excessive distress, and it is impossible to say that there has not been some damage accruing for which the defendant would be responsible; they may be nominal damages, but no doubt the amount of damage will vary very considerably. It is a question of degree. If you seize a man's goods and hold them for a week, how can you say he is not put to inconvenience? The case of Baylis v. Fisher (6) was not so strong, but there the Court held the damages were excessive.

Toll—36 Geo. 3. c. xxiv. (Local Act)—2 & 3 Vict. c. 93. and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88. (Police Acts)—Exemption of Police Constable from Toll on Turnpike-road and Bridge.

The bridge erected and the roads made by a company of proprietors, under the provisions of 36 Geo. 3. c. xxiv., on which the company are authorized to take toll, subject to exemptions provided for in the act, are a "turnpike-bridge" and "turnpike roads" within the meaning of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93. and of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88. s. 1; and, therefore, the exemption from tolls granted by the last-mentioned act to police constables extends to such bridge and roads respectively.

These were cases stated by Judge's order for the opinion of the Court, pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

(6) 7 Bing. 153.

The plaintiff in both cases was the superintendent of the Southampton Police Force, established under the acts for the establishment of county and district constables, and the defendants were toll-keepers in the service of the Company of proprietors of Northam Bridge and Roads, and were appointed to take toll, the one from persons passing along the bridge, the other from persons passing through a toll-gate on the road hereinafter mentioned.

The questions in the two cases were substantially the same.

In the year 1796 the above-named company obtained an act of parliament, 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv. (which was to be considered as part of each of these cases) to enable them to build and maintain a bridge over the River Itchen, at or near Northam, within the liberties of the town of Southampton, to the opposite shore at or near Bitterne Farm, in the county of Southampton, and to make and maintain a certain road, with a footway by the side thereof, from the town of Southampton to the end of the said bridge at or near Northam, and a certain other road, from the end of the said bridge on the opposite shore at or near Bitterne Farm to a gate, called Botley Turnpike Gate, in the said county.

By the 2nd section of the act, the company are directed to build or cause to be built a good and substantial bridge at, near or from Northam aforesaid, over and across the River Itchen, to the opposite shore at or near Bitterne Farm, in the parish of South Stoneham, in the said county, with a proper ascent or approach to the said bridge at each end thereof, and fit and proper for the passage of travellers, cattle and carriages, with proper foot or causeways; and also one or more toll-house or toll-houses at the end or ends of, on or near to the bridge, with bars, gates and other proper conveniences for the collection of tolls; and it is enacted that the said bridge should for ever be and remain a public bridge, and all persons, horses, cattle and carriages should have free liberty upon payment of the respective tolls granted by the act, to pass over the bridge without any hindrance or interruption.

By the 8th section it is enacted that, in case the said bridge should at any time become impassable and unsafe for travellers or carriages, the said company and their successors should cause the same to be forthwith rebuilt or repaired, and made safe and commodious for the passage of travellers, cattle and carriages, and in the mean time it should be lawful for the company and their successors, during all such time as the bridge should be impassable and unsafe as aforesaid, to provide a proper and convenient ferry for the passage of travellers, cattle and carriages over the said river as near to the said bridge as conveniently might be, and it should be lawful for such person or persons as the said company should appoint for that purpose, to demand, collect and receive for the passage of such travellers, cattle and carriages in the said ferry, before they respectively should be permitted to pass, the like tolls as were by the act authorized to be taken for passing over the said bridge.

By the 9th section of the act, directions are given for making the roads, with power to erect and set up toll-houses, toll-gates, bars and other proper conveniences, for taking the tolls granted in, upon and across the roads, or any part of either of them.

By the 21st section, in case any road or roads then in being should be continued or made part of the said intended roads, the persons liable to repair such roads at the passing of the act are to continue liable to such repairs.

By the 46th section it is enacted, that certain tolls therein mentioned might be demanded and taken at the several gates by such persons as the said company should appoint for that purpose, before any person, horse or other cattle, coach, waggon or other carriage should be permitted to pass over the said bridge, or through any or either of such toll-gates or bars: provided always, that it should be lawful to and for all and every person, and also to and for all and every carriage, horse, beast or other cattle or things chargeable with any of the tolls or duties granted by the act, to pass once for the same toll over the said bridge and through all and every the turnpikes, toll-gates and toll-bars to be erected by virtue of the act, without being liable to pay a toll at each turnpike, toll-gate or toll-bar, anything thereinbefore contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

The 51st section empowered the company to erect gates on the sides of any of the said roads, or across any lane, highway, &c., contiguous to and leading into or out of such road and to collect tolls at the said gates, so as the same should not subject any person to a larger toll than was appointed to be paid for passing through any of the gates to be erected across the roads leading to the said bridge.

And by the 53rd section it is enacted, that the roads thereby directed to be made "should be deemed and taken to be turnpike-roads within the intent and meaning of the 13 Geo. 3. c. 84. (General Turnpike Act) and of the several acts made for the purpose of explaining, amending or repealing the same or some part thereof, and that all and every clause and provision contained in the 13 Geo. 3. c. 84, subject to the provisions of the said other acts (except when the same were otherwise altered by that act), should be in full force with regard to the roads included in this act, as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if this act had been made and passed previous to the 13 Geo. 3. c. 84."

By the 38 Geo. 3. c. 64. (an act to alter and enlarge the powers of the said act of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv.) so much of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv. as related to building the said bridge with the opening or waterway in the said current of the said river and constructing a drawbridge there was repealed; and by section 2. it is enacted, that in building so much or such part of the said bridge as shall extend across the main channel of the river, the said company should construct one or more arch or arches therein of as large exclusive dimensions as the nature or situation of the work would reasonably admit of, for the purpose of boats, barges or vessels passing underneath the same; and that in building so much or such part of the bridge as should extend across the lesser or Roman channel, the said company should have regard to the passing of ships and vessels from the sea to the place called Wood Mill and back again, and for that purpose should take care, order and provide that an opening or waterway of the width of 25 feet at the least, from side to side, be made or left in the mid current of the said lesser or Roman channel, so that a proper and convenient drawbridge might, if the same should be found requisite as thereafter mentioned, be constructed and laid over the said opening or waterway of the same extent with or greater extent than the opening or waterway, and also two other openings in the same part of the said bridge, one at each end of the said drawbridge, each of which said openings should be of the width of 20 feet at the least from side to side in the said waterway, and should, when requisite as therein mentioned, order and provide that all proper and convenient ropes and pulleys, tackle and other necessary instruments and implements for opening the said drawbridge be provided for that purpose.

And by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88 (also to be considered as part of each of these cases), entitled An Act to amend the Act for the Establishment of County and District Constables (2 & 3 Vict. c. 93), it was enacted in the 1st section, that no toll should be demanded on any turnpike-road or bridge for any horse, or police van, carriage or cart passing such road or bridge in the service of the police established under the provisions of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93, provided that the constable in charge of such horse, van, carriage or cart, if not chief constable, should produce an order in writing under the hand of the chief constable, or should have his dress according to the regulations of the police force at the time of claiming the exemption.

After the passing of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv, the said company built the bridge and made the roads authorized to be made, and also erected certain toll-gates and bars for taking the tolls granted by the said act, and amongst others a toll-house with a gate for collecting tolls at the Southampton end of the bridge, and a toll-house and bar at the other extremity of the road; and also a certain gate called the Hedge End Gate on the road from the end of the bridge, at or near Bitterne and leading to the said Botley Turnpike Gate; and the defendants Andrews and Doling had been appointed by the said company toll-keepers at the Bridge Gate and the Hedge End Gate respectively; and on the 1st of January 1863, the plaintiff, being such constable as aforesaid and being in charge of a horse and police cart, and in the service of the said police, and having his dress according to the regulations of the police force at the time of the claiming the exemption hereinafter mentioned, and requiring to pass along the said bridge and also along the last-mentioned road, claimed the right to pass through the said gates without payment of any toll in respect thereof, nevertheless the defendants refused to allow him to pass along the bridge and along the said road without paying for toll the sums of 7½d. on the bridge and 3d. on the road; and the defendants respectively demanded the said sums from the plaintiff as and for such toll, and the plaintiff in order to pass along the said bridge and road was compelled to pay to the defendants respectively the said sums, which were now sought to be recovered back from the defendants respectively. It was admitted, by the plaintiff, that the tolls demanded and paid were the proper and legal tolls to be paid in respect of the said horse and cart, under the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv, if the plaintiff was not entitled to the exemption claimed; and the questions for the opinion of the Court were, whether the plaintiff, being such constable as aforesaid, having his dress, &c. as aforesaid, was exempt from paying the said tolls on passing along the said bridge and along the said road respectively.

J. D. Coleridge (Poulton with him), for the plaintiff.—The question, which is substantially the same in both cases, is, does the 1st section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88. grant the exemptions which are claimed by the defendants? The matter is res judicata already, for the ratio decidendi adopted in The Company of the Proprietors of Northam Bridge v. the London and Southampton Railway Company (1) is to be adopted here. The definitions of “turnpike-road” given in that case by Lord Abinger, C.B. and Rolfe, B. (2) settle the question in favour of the plaintiff, while public policy and common sense point to the same conclusion.

(1) 6 Moo. & W. 428; s.c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 165.

(2) A turnpike-road means “a road having toll-gates or bars on it, which were originally called ‘turns,’ and were first constructed about the middle of the last century.”—A turnpike-road is “a road on which a turnpike is lawfully erected and the public are bound to pay tolls.”

Lush (C. Pollock with him), for the defendants.—In The Northam Bridge and Roads Company v. the London and Southampton Railway Company (1) this Court only decided that the road in question was a turnpike-road within the meaning of the Railway Acts; that is, that a railway arch crossing it must be of a certain specified width. The definitions of “turnpike-road” given by the Judges were given solely with reference to those acts.

The road in question is not a turnpike-road, within the meaning of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88; that act only adds an exemption to the exemptions already created by the General Turnpike Act. The bridge and road were made by the company out of their own funds; and the company do not receive the tolls as trustees for the public. The 13 Geo. 3. c. 84. was in force when the bridge and road were made, and was afterwards repealed by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126, applying to “all acts then in force and thereafter to be passed.” This last act was then amended by the 4 Geo. 4. c. 95 (4), so that none of the exemptions given by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. apply here, this not being a trust road or bridge. The exemption given to policemen is to be ranked with the other exemptions given by the General Act, which include a constable with a prisoner, but do not extend to a constable going to fetch a prisoner. Now, that omission is supplied by the Police Act; and, consequently, the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88. s. 1. only adds to the then list of exemptions over public turnpike-roads, and does not extend the area over which the exemptions previously created are to apply. Another distinction between general and special turnpike-acts is, that the latter contain no clause enabling a person to go and come during twenty-four hours for one toll. Again, the 53rd clause of the 36 Geo. 3. c. 94. refers to the roads only, and not to the bridge; and the exemptions given by the General Act are inapplicable where there is a foot toll; so that the words "turnpike-bridge" can only mean a bridge where tolls are taken for cattle and vehicles only, and not for foot passengers.

Coleridge, in reply. — We are dealing with a local turnpike act, which is not to be construed differently according to the collateral statutes which are to be read in connexion with it. If we are dealing with a Police Act, the question is, what is a "turnpike-road" within the meaning of the Police Act? It must mean what ordinary people would understand by the words in ordinary language; so that the case which has been cited, and the definitions there given, apply here.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There are no bridges with tolls, except proprietary bridges.]

It is only a proprietary bridge, which, within the meaning of the Police Act, can be a turnpike bridge.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, B. (Feb. 10) delivered the judgment of the Court (5).—The question in Longland v. Andrews is, whether, under the circumstances stated, and having regard to the sections of the acts of parliament set out in the case, the plaintiff was liable to pay toll for passing over Northam Bridge, the bridge mentioned in the special case?

The toll was demanded under the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv., and would be payable by the plaintiff, unless he is exempted by the 1st section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88.

The case seems to us to turn on the question whether the bridge mentioned in the case was a "turnpike bridge," within the meaning of the 1st section of the act last referred to? If so, the plaintiff, under the circumstances stated in the case, comes sufficiently within the other provisions of that section, and is entitled to the exemption claimed.

It was argued, on the part of the defendant, that the words "turnpike bridge" apply only to a turnpike trust bridge, and that Northam Bridge is not a trust bridge; that the company of proprietors are owners of property in their own right, bound, indeed, to allow the public to pass over the bridge on payment of toll, where not entitled to exemption; but that the company in no case receive the tolls in trust for the public.

It was further argued that the words referred to, namely, "turnpike bridge," apply only to a bridge where tolls are taken in respect of horses and carriages only. We see no reason for so limiting the construction to be placed on the words of that section.

It is clear, we think, from the 2nd, 9th and 46th sections of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv. that a toll is authorized to be taken at the bridge; and though the 53rd section of that act only in terms applies to road (for the purpose of bringing roads within the operation of the General Turnpike Act), we think the bridge erected by the Company of Proprietors of the Northam Bridge Roads, at which the company are entitled to take toll, subject to such exemption as may be provided for, is a turnpike bridge, within the 1st section of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93.

We see no ground for limiting the very general words of that section, which speaks of "any turnpike bridge," to a turnpike trust bridge, as contended for on the argument, or to a bridge at which tolls are authorized to be taken in respect of horses and carriages only; and not, as by the 46th section of the 36 Geo. 3. c. xciv., for persons as well as for a horse or carriage. So to limit the operation of the 1st section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88. would be, we think, to do violence to the plain language of the section. Our judgment must be for the plaintiff to enter a verdict for him, 40*s.* and costs of suit.

In Longland v. Doling, the question is substantially the same as in the last case. The toll claimed is for passing through a toll-gate on the road, and not over the bridge. We think that the exemption equally applies here, and we give judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff in both cases.

ON ERROR AND APPEAL IN CASES IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

EASTER TERM, 28 VICTORIÆ.

1865. }
April 21. } SALOMONS v. PENDER.

Principal and Agent—Buyer and Seller —Commission.

An agent who is intrusted to sell land for his principal at a commission, if he become the purchaser, is not entitled to any remuneration.

Declaration for work and labour done and performed, and for commission and reward due and owing in respect thereof, and on accounts stated.

Plea, never indebted.

The cause was tried at the London Sitings after Hilary Term, before Martin, B. and a special jury. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff was a surveyor, and brought his action to recover the sum of 456*l.* 10*s.*, which he alleged to be due to him for commission on the sale of land of the defendant. The defendant was possessed of 1,860 yards of land in Oxford Street, Manchester, and in a conversation with the plaintiff, told him, that if the plaintiff could get him, the defendant, 10*s.* per yard per annum he would sell it. In the year 1864 a company was formed for the purpose of building a theatre. The plaintiff, with Messrs. Peacock and Negroponte, and some others, were the promoters of the company. In the beginning of 1864 the promoters of the company offered through the plaintiff to purchase the land at 10*s.* per yard. The defendant accepted the offer, but no written contract was entered into at the time. The purchasers, however, relying on the parol contract, commenced building operations some weeks before the date of the written contract was signed. The written contract for the sale of the land was entered into, signed by Peacock and Negroponte as buyers, on the 13th of April 1864. The plaintiff became a shareholder in the company on the 14th of April, and the company was registered as the Public Entertainments Company (Limited) on the 15th of April. The defendant subsequently became a director in the company. On behalf of the defendant it was contended that as the plaintiff was a promoter and director in the Public Entertainments Company, and therefore one of the purchasers of the land, together with Peacock and Negroponte, he could not recover any commission. The learned Judge directed the jury, that if they thought that the plaintiff was a partner with Peacock and Negroponte in the purchase of the land, to find their verdict against the plaintiff. The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Bovill moved for a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The question is, whether when a man is employed as an agent to sell land for another he is entitled to charge a commission, when he is himself the purchaser or one of them.

[MARTIN, B.—A man cannot be an agent for another and a principal in the same contract.]

If an agent employed to sell property becomes the purchaser, the principal is not bound by the contract. He may repudiate it if he pleases; but if he adopts the contract and takes the benefit of it, he cannot turn round and say to the agent, I will take the benefit of your work and labour, but I will not remunerate you for it. Suppose a man says to another—If you can find me a purchaser for my land at 10*s.* a yard, I will pay you commission; and the agent says, I have found you a purchaser, pay me my commission. The contract is fulfilled. Why is the person employed not to be paid his commission? Surely the principal cannot take the benefit of the introduction, and decline to pay for it?

[MARTIN, B.—The agent cannot recover because he has taken upon himself a position incompatible with the duty of an agent. BRAMWELL, B.—Besides, when he is employed to find a purchaser, that means, he is to find a third person as purchaser. If he is the purchaser himself he does not fulfil his contract.]

One way of putting the case is, that it is a contract to get the seller 10*s.* a yard for the land, less commission; no mention whatever is made about a third person.

[MARTIN, B.—Suppose a man offered 11*s.* a yard for the land, is he not bound to communicate that to the principal?]

Yes, and if the principal adopts the contract he must pay the commission. In Story on Agency, sect. 211, it is said, "Indeed, it may be laid down as a general principle, that in all cases where a person is either actually or constructively an agent for other persons, all profits and advantages made by him in the business, beyond his ordinary compensation, are to be for the benefit of his employers."

POLLOCK, C.B.—If there were any species of authority for breaking in upon the general principle, I should be very much inclined not to refuse a rule, but to allow the matter to be argued. But I have heard nothing, either in the way of authority or argument, which satisfies my mind that a person can, in the same transaction, buy as principal and also charge a commission as agent. I do not think that the privilege of repudiation is of such great value as that because a man may repudiate a contract, he must therefore be held bound to pay the commission when he has sold the land, in point of fact, to the very man who charges the commission. I think a man cannot charge commission for a sale in which he himself is the buyer; and on this ground it appears to me there should be no rule.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think my Brother Martin's view was quite correct. It certainly may be a little hard upon the plaintiff, whose interest in the land may be very much smaller than the commission he would have got if he had sold it to third parties; but we must look to the case on principle, and it appears to me that Mr. Bovill has made a fatal concession. He concedes that the defendant might have rejected the bargain if the defendant had known that the plaintiff was one of the principals. Why? It must be because the plaintiff had no authority to make such a contract on his employer's behalf; if the plaintiff had no authority to make the contract, he was not employed to enter into it, and therefore he has earned no commission. It is almost a matter of demonstration. It is quite true that the defendant gets the benefit, if benefit it be; but he may say, "If you choose to bring about a contract for my benefit, which I did not employ you to do, I will not pay you as if I had employed you—it is the act of a volunteer, and I will take advantage of it." But there is another view. He might say, "I did not employ you to make this contract, but you have made it, and you have altered my position by what you have done, and I am not under an obligation to reject it." It seems to me that the case is against Mr. Bovill, even in his own way of putting it, and that there should be no rule.

MARTIN, B.—I am quite of the same opinion. It seemed to me, and the principle on which I acted at the trial was, that the plaintiff was employed to act as an agent, and it did not strike me in the way my Brother Bramwell has put it; although there seems to be a perfect answer on that ground, which is rather a narrow one. The view I took of it was this: that when a man is employed as agent, that is, to be middle man between his employer and another principal, if he himself becomes that principal, he takes a different position from that of agent; he becomes a principal, and his doing so annihilates any right as agent. That is the principle I acted on; but I think my Brother Bramwell has given a technical answer to this case, that, in point of fact, the plaintiff has never done that which he was employed to do and for which he was to receive a commission; for what he was to do was to sell to an independent third person, whereas he sold to himself and in point of fact never did that labour for which the defendant contracted to pay him. But there is another view of the matter. Mr. Bovill stated that here there was a contract for a sale which was not rescinded, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to commission. In my judgment that is a pure fallacy. It is true that if the defendant desired to rescind the contract of sale he must do so in toto. But the contract in which the plaintiff sues is by no means a contract for sale; it is a by-contract altogether. In Story on Agency, page 172, section 210, the learned writer says, "In this connexion also, it seems proper to state another rule in regard to the duties of agents, which is of general application, and that is, that in matters touching the agency, agents cannot act so as to bind their principals where they have an adverse interest in themselves. This rule is founded upon the plain and obvious consideration, that the principal bargains, in the employment, for the exercise of the disinterested skill, diligence and zeal of the agent, for his exclusive benefit." And then he goes on, "It is a confidence necessarily reposed in the agent, that he will act with a sole regard to the interest of his principal, as far as he lawfully may; and, even if impartiality could possibly be presumed on the part of an agent, where his own interests were concerned, that is not what the principal bargains for"—which is what my Brother Bramwell stated—"and, in many cases, it is the very last thing which would advance his interests." Then he goes on to cite a variety of instances, from writers on the Civil law, to that effect, and says, "If, then, the seller were permitted, as the agent of another, to become the purchaser, his duty to his principal and his own interest would stand in direct opposition to each other; and thus a temptation perhaps, in many cases, too strong for resistance by men of flexible morals, or hackneyed in the common devices of worldly business, would be held out, which would betray them into gross misconduct and even crime. It is to interpose a preventive check against such temptations and seductions, that a positive prohibition has been found to be the soundest policy, encouraged by the purest precepts of Christianity. This doctrine is well settled at law; but it is acted upon in Courts of equity to a very large extent." Mr. Justice Story therefore is a direct authority against this motion. Mr. Bovill read a passage which says that where a person is an agent for another, all profits and advantages made by him in the business beyond his ordinary compensation are to be for the benefit of his employers. What is meant is this, that where a property is sold by an agent and afterwards a suit is commenced in the Court of equity by the principal against him, on taking the account between the parties credit would be given to the agent for the amount of his commission, so as to take the account fairly between them; and that would be reasonable.

Rule refused.

1864.	}	THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. THE EARL OF SEFTON.
May 30;

Succession Duty—16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. ss. 2, 10, 21, 39, 45, &c.—Unsaleable or Unproductive Land, Duty payable on Succession thereto—Mode of Assessing and Time of Estimating Duty—Annual Value.

The late Earl of S. died in 1855, and the defendant, the present Earl, became entitled, under the will of his father, to certain real property, in respect to portions of which he paid succession duty, at the rate of 1l. per cent. on the value; with respect to other portions, amounting to 48,000 square yards, in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, he omitted such portions from his return for assessment, being advised that no duty was payable thereon, inasmuch as the same was not in demand as marketable or building land, nor was capable of being sold or let profitably as such, nor was capable of being used productively for agricultural or other purposes, and was then and had been for ten years previously and ever since wholly unoccupied and unproductive. He informed the officers of Inland Revenue of such omission and his reasons for so omitting such portions, and was told in reply that if after any interval he should derive income or profit from such portions he would be expected to deliver a further account. Some time after the late Earl's death, the present Earl still denying his liability to pay duty, gave notice to the officers of Inland Revenue that he had sold 1,561 square yards of the land at 16s. per yard, and he subsequently sold a further portion thereof.

Upon an information, by the Attorney General, asking for duty at the rate of 1l. per cent. in respect of the defendant's succession to the whole of the 48,000 square yards, or at least in respect of so much of such land as had then been or might at any time thereafter be sold or otherwise disposed of, it was held by the majority of the Court of Exchequer, that the defendant was not liable to pay the duty claimed on any portion of the 48,000 square yards; that "annual value," in the 26th section, means present actual annual value, and that such value, and not possible or prospective annual value, is the basis on which succession duty is to be calculated; and this decision was affirmed, on appeal, by the House of Lords.

Semble (per the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford), that property, such as that in the present case, capable of being sold, has an annual value within the meaning of the act; and (per the Lord Chancellor) a value equal to interest at 3l. per cent. on the sum that might have been realized if the property had been sold at the time of the accruing of the succession, and (per Lord Chelmsford) the value of an annuity which could be purchased with the amount for which the land would sell. But that, inasmuch as the Crown had in the present case assented to the statement of the Earl that the property was of no saleable value at the time of his succession, it must be bound by such assent.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer on the 6th of July 1863, in a suit instituted on behalf of the Crown for the recovery of succession duty, and the questions in the appeal were the same as were involved in the suit below; that is to say, first, whether succession duty is payable in respect of real property which at the time of the successor becoming entitled thereto, and subsequently during his possession thereof, is not actually yielding income, but which is eventually sold by the successor for value? and, secondly, whether, if duty be payable, the amount of such duty is to be calculated on the value of the succession at the time when it fell into possession, or on the value realized by the subsequent sale?

The circumstances giving rise to the question in dispute are fully detailed in the report of the case in the Court below (1), and may be shortly re-stated as follows:

Under the will of the late Earl of Sefton, who died on the 2nd of August 1855, his son, the present respondent, became entitled in possession on his father's death to certain land, part of the Toxteth Park estate at Liverpool, in respect of which it was admitted that but for the circumstances after mentioned he would be liable to pay succession duty at the rate of 1*l*. per cent.

The circumstances relied on as exempting the respondent from duty were, that at the time when he came into possession on the late Earl's death the land in question was neither in demand or marketable, or capable of being sold or let profitably as building land, nor capable of being used productively for agricultural or other purposes; and that it was then, and had been for ten years previously, and with the exception of what had been sold still was unoccupied and unproductive; and that no income had ever been derived by the respondent from the unsold portion, or, down to the time of sale, from that portion which had been sold.

Shortly after the late Earl's death, the respondent, in the course of some correspondence with the officers of Inland Revenue on the subject of his succession, informed them that he had omitted the land in question from his return for assessment, being advised that inasmuch as the same was wholly unoccupied and unproductive, and not capable of yielding income, no succession duty was or would be payable thereon. He was told in reply, that if after any interval from the late Earl's death he should derive income or profit from the land he would be expected to deliver a further account. And the matter remained in this state down to the time of the sale.

In the month of April 1862 the respondent, still denying his liability to pay duty, caused notice to be given to the officers of Inland Revenue that he had sold 1,561 square yards of the land at the rate of 16*s*. per yard. He subsequently sold a further portion consisting of 1,000 square yards at the rate of 6*s*. per yard. And thereupon the proceedings in the Court below were instituted for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that the respondent was chargeable with duty in respect of his succession to the land in question, or so much at least thereof as had been then or should thereafter be sold by him.

The respondent put in his answer, admitting the facts as stated by the information, and thereupon the suit was set down and came on for hearing in the Court of Exchequer on the 27th of January 1863.

On the 6th of July the majority of the Court gave judgment, declaring that the respondent was not chargeable with succession duty in respect of the land in question. Hence the present appeal.

The Attorney General and The Solicitor General (with them Locke and Hanson), for the Crown.—The property in question is a succession clearly made liable to duty by the act of parliament, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51; and there is nothing in the act which exempts it from duty under the peculiar circumstances stated upon the information. It is clearly a taxable succession, under the 2nd and 10th sections of the act, not afterwards exempted. The words "beneficially entitled" in the 2nd section simply mean that the property is not to be subject to a trust. To exempt the property from duty, it must be shewn that there is an impossibility, by any means which the Court of Exchequer can work out, of arriving at the value of this particular succession; such a possibility is not excluded here, and any augmentation of value accruing during the continuance of the succession may be afterwards then assessed. The 21st section is merely for determining a rate of valuation, and does not exempt anything from taxation which a taxing section taxes. The words "annual value," however, in that section do not require that the land should be at once capable of being let, or should be immediately productive. The annual value may be arrived at, if the principal value can be by any means arrived at. Notwithstanding the wording of the 21st section, the duty remains, in its nature and essence, a tax, not upon income, but upon capital—In re Elwes (2). Supposing this land to have devolved on a corporation instead of upon Lord Sefton, there would have been no difficulty in ascertaining the duty to be paid under the 27th section. It cannot have been intended by the 21st section that the interest of an individual is not to be taxed, when it would have been taxed if it had gone to a corporation under similar circumstances. Either duty was payable upon the succession when Lord Sefton died, or if not then, it was payable under the 45th section, when a value could be ascertained to belong to the property. With regard to the series of provisions in the act, for general cases, which follow the 22nd section, those are cases which, if not dealt with specially by special provisions, would have fallen under the previous sections and the general taxing powers of those previous sections; and the fact that those particular cases are dealt with specially cannot take out of the general clauses cases which those particular sections do not deal with, because those particular sections take certain cases, and deal with them in a special manner. And when those particular sections are examined, if some of them do not hit the present case, which it is submitted they do, at all events there is a principle pervading them, which is consistent with, and favourable to, the claim which the Crown makes, and which negatives the notion of the legislature having meant to take such a case as the present out of the act, when the general words of the 10th section would cover it, merely because it may not have been the subject of some specific and particular provision. The 39th section shews clearly that the legislature contemplated that duty would be payable in a case like the present. This section shews also that the rules given by the act for arriving at the value do not apply in every case. The 39th section also gave the Commissioners power to demand, after the receipt of the notice sent by Lord Sefton, duty to be paid if after any time Lord Sefton should derive income or profit from the land. The legislature did not intend, in consequence of accidental circumstances, to relieve succession from taxation.

Sir Hugh Cairns and Mellish (with them Crompton Hutton), on behalf of the respondent.—The whole meaning of the act is, that the succession and its value must be ascertained at the time of the succession, except in certain specific cases; and, except in those specific cases, there is to be no repetition of the process of valuation at any subsequent period. There would appear to be cases in which, though property has become subject to succession, within the 1st and 2nd sections of the act, still there is no possibility of making it liable to the payment of duty. The principle pervading the act is, that for the purpose of ascertaining the value, you are to deal with land as you find it in proper and natural use; you are not to look at it prospectively, and to some other use which a man might make of it, or which he might make of it at the time, if he altered the mode of occupation. The 39th section cannot assist the argument on the other side. That section merely gives the Commissioners power to make compromises and concessions, not to impose a tax. The section assumes that a tax is already imposed. In looking at the act, this is not a succession made liable to duty by the act. There is no section which makes it liable to duty. The 2nd section creates no liability to the tax; it is merely an interpretation clause as to what is a succession; there is no reference to duty in it. The duty cannot be levied under the 10th section; it is merely an introductory provision, and you cannot proceed under it until the value has been ascertained by the later sections. It merely defines what the rate is to be when the value is ascertained. The 20th section does not deal with assessments, but with payments. The 21st section gives the rule of valuation; and unless the present case can be brought under this section, no duty is payable, and it cannot be brought under it. The whole principle of the section is that of annual value, and that as the property stands; even in the cases provided for by the 24th section, the same principle of annual value is applied. The 22nd section shews that annual value is of the essence of the case where duty is to be paid on property not of a fluctuating character. Timber is an instance in which there may be a succession, and yet no duty payable; it would have been free from duty but for the 23rd section. This section assumes that no tax is imposed upon it by the general section. With regard to the 24th section, a similar observation occurs as to advowsons. The legislature has not said with regard to building land what it has said with regard to advowsons and timber, which are analogous to ground of no value at the time of the succession. In neither case can an immediate sale be compelled. The general intention of the act is, where there is annual value in the property at the time of the succession, that that value is to be taken as the property is actually enjoyed, and an annuity is constituted upon the footing of that annual value; and this is done, even although, by a sale or by another mode of enjoyment, the property might be made more productive than it then is; and if there be no annual value, there is no tax until another succession comes. It is impossible to get the tax under the 10th section; then the Crown must come in with the 21st section, and it is impossible to get it under that section. A case similar to the present is not provided for by the act.

The Attorney General, in reply.—The question depends on the true interpretation of the 1st, 2nd, 10th, 20th and 21st sections, reading them in connexion with the 45th. The question presents itself in an alternative form. If because of the situation of the property at the time of the death of the late Lord Sefton, it was impossible that any duty could be assessed upon it then, it being of no value, the duty will be liable to be assessed upon it when it ceases to be of no value. On the other hand, if the property could be assessed to duty at the time of the death, we agree it could have been assessed; and there are grounds in the act from which it is clear that the duty is to be paid at some time or other, and the value can be ascertained. The 10th section, and that only, is the taxing clause, and all the rest is matter of regulation and modification. The succession here is a succession within the 2nd section, and the 10th section taxes "every such succession as aforesaid." Throughout the act there is shewn a principle which pervades the whole of it, of taxing the benefit when it accrues and comes into enjoyment if it is not meant, to tax it before.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, two questions arise on this appeal. First, what is the subject of taxation in a succession? and secondly, at what time is that subject to be ascertained and assessed? For this inquiry the material clauses of the Succession Duty Act appear to be the 10th and 21st sections. The 10th is the taxing clause, and it imposes duties according to "the value" of the succession; which value is ascertained by the machinery of the 21st section. By this latter section it is declared, that the interest of every succession in real property (with certain exceptions) shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property (that is, of the property the interest in which constitutes the succession), after making certain allowances; and the questions which arise are, what is meant by annual value, and at what time such value is to be ascertained?

Are the words "annual value" satisfied by taking the actual yearly value of the property in its existing state and manner of enjoyment, or the value which it would yield if applied or enjoyed in a different manner? And is the annual value to be ascertained at the time of the accruer of the succession, or will it include any future value, which it is certain or probable that the property will have within a short period of time? Upon these questions I think it clear that the value must be ascertained at the time of the accruer of the succession; and when the property is at that time yielding or capable of yielding annual income. I agree with the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Wilde(3), that the full present actual yearly value of the property in its existing

(3) The judgment of Mr. Baron Wilde not having been read in the Court below is not contained in the previous report. It is as follows:—"The defendant in this information appears to have succeeded to a plot of land at Liverpool, which was not at the time of his succession devoted to any remunerative purpose. Its immediate vicinity to a large town renders it probable that before long it will be very valuable as building land. And the question for our determination is, in what manner, and on what principle, is the succession duty in respect of such land to be assessed? Whether, on the one hand, the actual beneficial value at the time of the succession is to be looked at, or whether, on the other hand, it is competent to the Crown to any and what extent to regard the future but proximate, I had almost said immense, increase in value which awaits the land for building purposes? The governing sections of the act are as follows: By section 2. of the statute every successor is made liable to pay a tax 'in respect of every such succession, according to the value thereof.' It is not the value of the 'property,' or 'land,' but the value 'of his succession' which is the object of the tax and criterion of its amount. In the course of the argument in this case, various modes have been suggested in which this value should be ascertained. The results obtained are so widely different, and the principles of so universal an application, that the importance of arriving at a true determination can hardly be exaggerated. The next important section is section 21. It provides for the mode in which the value of state or mode of enjoyment is the subject of assessment.

I concur with Mr. Baron Wilde, that no system of assessment or charge can be adopted, which draws into the calculation of value a prospective or future benefit, which is uncertain as to the time of its incidence. But there may be successions which at the time of accruer neither yield nor are capable of yielding in their existing state any annual income, but yet are saleable and would fetch in the market considerable sums; and in such cases I incline to think (but the point does not now require decision) that the property which forms the succession (not being excepted from the operation of the act, which is the case with unopened mines, timber and advowsons) has an annual value within the meaning of the act, namely, a value equal to interest at 3l. per cent. on the sum that might have been realized if the property had been sold at the time of the accruing of the succession, and that the successor cannot baffle the statute by postponing a sale until a future period. Such might have been the course adopted in the present case, for it is impossible to suppose that land which sold for a large sum of money within a few months after the accruer of the succession was not of some value to be sold at the time of the succession. But this course was not taken, and the present appeal must be decided on the facts which are clearly admitted by the Crown.

For if the property has not at the time when the interest of the successor accrues any saleable value, or any actual or potential successions to real properties are to be estimated, and it declares that this shall be done through the medium of an annuity. This annuity once ascertained the rest of the calculation is easy enough, and, so far as I am aware, admits of no doubt. Now, for calculating this annuity, the section desires us to refer to the 'annual value' of the property. It is to be 'an annuity equal to the annual value of the property.' And here it is that the question arises, What is the meaning of the 'annual value of the property'? The meaning attached to these words by the Crown officers is as follows: That the land should be valued, taking into consideration not only the rent, profit or benefit which it then produces, or is capable then of producing, but in addition thereto the future advantage which may attach to it from any cause whatever, such as the advantages of situation (involving building or occupation value), mineral strata, which in future may be worth working, brick earth capable of future productiveness, stone which may in future be quarried, and the like; all these matters should, they say, be brought into due consideration, and a present capital value fixed on that basis. This capital value so ascertained is to be turned into an annual sum at 3l. per cent., which will then represent the 'annual value' intended by section 21; so that if a man came to the succession of an acre of land then used as arable land, and producing 40s., but which was in the vicinity of a large and increasing town, 'the annual value for taxation purposes would be, not the 40s., but so much in addition, as a calculation of the probable future value of the land reduced to an average annual value would add thereto. But is this the annual value by the section intended? There are several grave objections to such a conclusion.

"In the first place, there is no language in the section authorizing the recourse to a calculation of average and the adjustment of a hypothetical annual value based upon expectations, however well founded, of the future. There is no system or method of making such a valuation indicated. The only words are 'annual value,' and these without more would seem to mean 'actual' 'annual value.' But, moreover, it appears to me that when the legislature did intend this mode of calculation to be adopted they have distinctly said so. For in section 26, when it becomes necessary to provide for the case of manors, and opened working mines, whose amount is said to be fluctuating, the act, by express words, provides 'that the principal value of such property shall be ascertained, and the annual value thereof shall be considered to be equal to interest at 3l. per cent. on the amount of such principal.' This section is very instructive, for we have the legislature providing for an exceptional case the very system which it is now contended may be adopted under section 21. for the common case. But there is this further objection: The provisions of section 21. declare that the annuity representing the annual value having been ascertained, should be treated as an annuity payable during the residue of the successor's life, or for any less period during which he should be entitled thereto, and such annuity shall be valued according to the table in the schedule, and the duty charged upon such value. The object of taxation, therefore, was the actual benefit derived by the individual, and not the property itself. Each successor in turn is intended to pay a duty proportioned to the duration and extent of his enjoyment of the land, and no more. Any system of charge, therefore, which draws into the calculation a prospective and future benefit, uncertain as to the time of its incidence, has the vice of making a tenant for life or shorter period, pay upon the footing of an event which may not occur in his time, and for a benefit which may not accrue during his tenancy. Now, it is urged that if some system is not adopted which takes account of a value which, though future and uncertain, may, as in the present case, be something more than probable and near at hand, the result would be that the successor would obtain a benefit in respect of which he would pay no duty. And this is undoubtedly true, and it is the strength of the argument on the part of the annual value, it is clear that it is not capable of being assessed, and that it is not a "succession"; which word is defined to mean property chargeable with duty under the act. And this is, as between the parties before us, the condition of the property in question. The information admits "that at the time of the death of the defendant's father, and of his becoming entitled to the land, the same was not in demand or marketable as building land, nor was it capable of being sold or let profitably as such." And then the word "profitably" is explained by the subsequent allegation, "that the land was not, at the time of the defendant's becoming entitled thereto, capable of being used productively for agricultural or other purposes, and that such land was then and had been for ten years previously, and has

Crown. But it is by no means plain that the legislature intended to prevent such a result. If the question lay between a system which should make a successor pay for a benefit he might never receive, and one under which a successor might possibly receive a benefit for which he never paid, I can well understand that the latter might be the alternative chosen. Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that, as the property pays duty afresh as it passes into each successive hand, the Crown will receive duty on the increased value at the next devolution of the property after such value has accrued; and this was probably all that the legislature intended. But there is another side to the question. Landed property, more especially houses, may fall in value as well as rise. If prospective increase is to find a place in the determination of annual value, prospective decrease ought to do the same; and a man coming into possession for life of a row of houses in London, the actual net rental of which was then very high, might claim the right to insist on the probable fall in value of his house property, as situate in a quarter then going out of fashion. It is not easy to conclude that the legislature contemplated these hypothetical bases of value worked out by calculations both complicated and uncertain, and still less so to conclude that they should have left all this to be conveyed (in a strictly and remarkably well drawn act) by the special words 'annual value.' The truth is, that anything like exact justice between the Crown and the successor, forcing him on the one hand to pay to the last farthing for all that he receives, and protecting him on the other from paying for anything more than he actually enjoys, can only be obtained by some system which should provide for the incidence of the tax at the time when the increase or decrease in value takes place, so that instead of the succession being dealt with, and its value for tax ascertained once for all at the time of the successor becoming entitled, the account would be kept ever open, and the tax would be increased or reduced pari passu with the rise and fall in the annual value ever since been wholly unoccupied and unproductive, and that during no part of the time has any income or annual profit been derived from it." Upon these admissions, I am of opinion that the property, the respondent's interest in which is alleged to be a succession, had no assessable value at the time of the respondent becoming entitled, and that the Crown is not entitled to any duty. I shall, therefore, move your Lordships that the decree of the Court below be affirmed, and that the petition of appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—My Lords, the question in this case, which is very important, arises upon an information on the Revenue side of the Exchequer, on the Succession Duty Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. The somewhat loose and inaccurate form of the succession. This would attain perfect adjustment of taxation to benefit, but it would be in practice perfectly intolerable. And the legislature have, as it seems to me, wisely avoided anything of the kind, and to have been content to tax improved values in land, and the lucrative possession of land used for building, in the hands of those who succeed to land then so used. Some attempt was made in the argument to contend that the legislature had in fact provided for this intermittent method of levying the tax, and reference was made to section 37. for that purpose, which speaks of a successor who has not obtained the whole of his succession at the time of the duty becoming payable. But the learned Solicitor General, whose masterly argument threw all possible light on the intendment of these various clauses, hardly ventured to take his stand on this section 37, which, when carefully read, is obviously framed to meet a totally different case. I am, in the result, clearly of opinion that the words 'annual value' mean the actual present annual value of the land at the time of the succession; that such actual annual value must be measured (except in cases where mala fides can be successfully imputed) by the money benefit which the successor annually derives from the land, or which he is capable of deriving from it, in the condition and used for the purposes to which the land is then devoted. The facts agreed to by both parties in reference to the land in question in this case are very peculiar. It is difficult to conceive of any land at Liverpool that it was not capable of being used productively for any purpose during ten years before Lord Sefton came to his succession, and continued in that state until seven years after his succession, when portions were sold for building. But with the correctness of these facts we have nothing to do. I am bound to accept them as proved. The result, therefore, of the conclusions which I have above arrived at, as applied to this case, will be that if the land had really no annual value at the time of Lord Sefton's succession, he is discharged from duty in respect thereof."

in which the information is drawn, at first sight raised some little doubt what was the precise question meant to be raised. Upon carefully considering the statements of facts in the information, I have come to the conclusion that it is meant to be stated that the land had no annual value at the time that the present respondent succeeded to it, and the question for us to decide is, whether in that case the present Earl of Sefton is liable to succession duty. The information states the death of the late Earl of Sefton on the 2nd of August 1855; that the respondent sold a part of the land in question in 1862, and a further part in the same year, in respect of which the Crown claims succession duty; that the Crown and the respondent agreed that the land was not capable of being sold or let profitably as building land; that at the time of the respondent succeeding it was not capable of being used productively for agricultural or other purposes, and had been for ten years unoccupied and unproductive, and that no income or annual profit had been derived from it up to the time when the sale took place. That would leave the question unanswered, whether it could be made productive of some annual profit with ordinary care. But the information goes on to state that the respondent sent a notice that the land in question was wholly unoccupied and unproductive, and not capable of yielding income fluctuating or otherwise, and that, therefore, the respondent was not liable to pay duty. And, again, in April 1862, a notice was sent that the land in question was wholly unoccupied and unproductive, and not capable of yielding income fluctuating or otherwise, and that, therefore, he was not liable to succession duty. And the information states that those statements so made were according to the facts. We must, therefore, take them, I think, to be so. It seems that the result of these statements in the information is, that at the time of the succession taking place on the death of the father, the annual value of the waste land in question was nothing. The land produced no rent, and was incapable of yielding any, if ordinary care was taken to make it as productive as it could be reasonably made; and the question then for your Lordships is, whether, the annual produce during the first year of the succesion being nothing, any succession duty is payable? I think it is not.

The very able opinions of the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Wilde, who have discussed the question most fully, have satisfied me that the calculation of the succession duty which is to be on successions according to their value (by section 10), and is to be calculated by section 21. at the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of the property, and payable from the date of the successor becoming entitled thereto in possession in eight equal half-yearly instalments, the first to be paid twelve months next after the successor has become entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of the real property. The beneficial enjoyment means no more than in his own right, and for his own benefit, not as trustee for another. If the property is, then, of no annual value whatever, there is no basis whereon to make any calculations. If the land increased afterwards in value by the exertion and employment of the capital of the successor in improving his own property, it is out of the question to suppose that such increase of value should be taxed. That never came in any degree from the predecessor. If the property should increase by the advancing prosperity of the neighbourhood, or by wholly accidental circumstances, as the discovery of minerals, such increase of value does not appear to have been in the contemplation of the legislature. Neither its increase nor diminution after the succession took place seem to have been thought of by the legislature. This part of the case has been most ably discussed, and very satisfactorily to my mind, by two of the Judges below, and particularly by Sir James Wilde, who has entered more fully into it. All that the act says is, that the taxation in this particular case of land simply is to be according to the annual value, not the whole value of the corpus of the land. For land of fluctuating value—for land producing casual profit, as timber and for mines—the act has made special provisions. For land alone, simply, the only mode of taxing is a percentage, varying in amount with the remoteness of relationship, and in the clause imposing the duty expressly it is to be according to the annual value, beginning at the period of first enjoyment, and payable annually, the first portion at the end of the first year.

Martin, B. argues that it cannot be supposed that the legislature could have meant to leave valuable land, much more valuable land than the best land used in agriculture, untaxed. But no proposition can be more clear than that, however likely it may be that such land should not be omitted, the subject cannot be taxed unless there are words clear enough to impose it. There must be clear words. There certainly are none of that character. It is clear that nothing but annual value is taxed. It was admitted, in the very able argument of the Attorney General, that whenever it is to be actually taxed, and in the 21st section, which enacts the time of calculation, no other time for its commencement is contemplated than the beginning of the succession; and if there is no annual value there is none to calculate from, and what the legislature requires cannot be done.

But it is contended that the moment annual value begins to arise the calculation ought to begin. Is this to be the case? Is the waste land to be taxed if it becomes valuable ten or twenty years afterwards? Is there to be a distinction between those cases in which it becomes annually profitable, although by the industry or capital of the successor himself, or in part from the same cause? Are the eight half years to be dated from such an event however remote? Is there to be no inquiry whether that increased value is so caused in some degree by the successor's own capital or industry? Is there to be a fresh date for each additional improvement in several years so as to have continual succession duties as to each part? I consider that the legislature never contemplated such a succession of taxes, which it would be difficult to ascertain and fairly to adjust; but that they meant what they have said as imposing the duty with respect to land simply to fix it for the whole period of each succession once for all, and that according to one fixed criterion, the annual value of the land at the time at which the succession begins. There is no provision whatever made for any future calculations beginning from another period than the first period, than the first year of the succession, and if there is no annual value, then there is no duty. If there be any subsequent increase of value from any cause, the Crown will have the benefit of such increase on subsequent successions. As to the case suggested by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, where land has no value at the time when the succession begins, but is capable of being sold and so producing an annual value on the interest of money, I do not think it necessary to give any opinion, as it does not arise in this case.

The Lord Chancellor, in the course of the argument, suggested for consideration, whether the interpretation clause, which enacts that the term "succession shall denote any property chargeable with duty under this act," does not assist the Crown in this case. I do not feel sure in what way this enactment in the first section can be of use to the Crown. There is no doubt that the word "succession" does denote in the act a succession liable to duty, and the act provides for the mode of levying each duty; but it does not follow that everywhere, when that term is used, it has an addition to be made to it by construction, of a mode of levying it in another mode, if that provided is insufficient, as no doubt the legislature mean the tax to be levied by eight half-yearly portions of the tax, beginning at the commencement of the succession; but you cannot, by virtue of the definition, add another beginning at a different time, when that mode of levying is inapplicable. Therefore, I concur entirely with the motion of my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, in determining the question of the liability of the defendant to the payment of succession duty, we must take the facts as they appear upon the face of the information, in which there is an admission that "the several statements contained in the notice and letters set forth are according to the fact." Now, by the notice delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue accompanying the defendant's account for assessment, it is stated that the plots of land as to which the question arises are "wholly unoccupied and unproductive, and not capable of yielding income, fluctuating or otherwise." The Board of Inland Revenue, acquiescing too readily in this statement, informed the defendant that if, after any interval from the late Earl's death, he should derive income or profit from the land, he would be expected to deliver a further account, in order that the succession duty might then be calculated according to the value.

Now, whatever was the state of the land at the time of the succession, whether profitable or profitless, this mode of viewing the claim of the Crown was equally erroneous. Upon reference to the statute it will appear that the time when the question arises whether duty is to be paid, and, if payable, upon what value, must be determined, once for all, when the succession falls, and cannot be left for future ascertainment. If at the time when the successor becomes entitled to the property it is utterly valueless and incapable of realizing any annual profit, the liability to duty is not to be left open to the possible contingency of its thereafter becoming valuable, but must depend altogether upon its actual present condition. If it possesses any value upon which the duty may be calculated, there can no more be any future estimate upon its improvement in value than there could be a return of duty upon the deterioration of the property after the proper duty payable when the succession fell had been ascertained and paid. This appears to me to be clear from a consideration of some of the sections of the act. The 10th section enacts, "that there shall be levied and paid in respect of every such succession aforesaid according to the value thereof the following duties." These words necessarily refer to the preceding part of the act, where the meaning of the word "succession" is explained. The interpretation clause (section 1.) states, that in the construction and for the purposes of the act the term "succession" shall denote any property chargeable with duty under this act. These words seem to be intended to embrace every description of property which in its own nature would be chargeable with duty, although from some accidental circumstance connected with it at the time when the succession falls, it might happen not to be capable of or liable to assessment. If they were construed to apply not merely to property of a kind to be prima facie liable, but to such as from some present circumstance temporarily affecting it happens not to be in a condition to be the subject of an estimate for duty, there would be a conflict between the meaning of the interpretation clause and of the 2nd section. This latter section enacts, that "any beneficial interest in property or in the income thereof," (by which I understand a beneficial enjoyment in contradistinction to holding as trustee) "shall be deemed to confer a succession."

This succession arises upon the death of some person dying in possession or expectancy. Therefore the 10th section making every succession previously mentioned and explained liable to duty according to the value thereof, such value must necessarily be estimated at the time of the devolution of the property to the successor, even if there had been no other provisions than those in the act. But the 20th section places the matter beyond doubt, for it enacts that the duty imposed by the act shall be paid "at the time when the successor or any person in his right, or on his behalf" (words pointing to the case of a trust estate, and further explaining the words "beneficial interest" in the 2nd section), "shall become entitled to the succession." The 20th section having provided for the period when the duty is to be paid (obviously meaning by the words "is to be paid," becomes due), the 21st section enacts in what manner it shall be assessed, and at what times it shall be payable. Now, the interest of the successor is to be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of the property. There is no other mode provided for calculating the duty. If, therefore, when the successor becomes entitled in possession to his succession (being the point of time at which alone the duty imposed is to be ascertained in the manner prescribed by the act), the property has no value, how can it possibly be made the subject of an assessment for duty either then or at any subsequent period? I do not think that any of the sections referred to in the argument countenance the idea that the ascertainment of the duty to be paid can be postponed to any period after the death of the predecessor. The 37th section, providing for cases where a successor shall not have obtained the whole of his succession at the time of the duty becoming payable (that is, when he becomes entitled in possession to his succession), clearly does not mean where he shall not have realized the whole value of his succession, but where the property, having devolved upon him by right, he has been kept out of some portion of it. In this case he is to be charged only with the value of the property or benefit of which he gets possession at the time of the succession; but specific provision is made for his being chargeable with duty on the property afterwards obtained by him; as to which some doubt might have arisen unless the case had been thus specially provided for.

The provisions of the 39th section are wholly inapplicable to the present case. They apply only where the value of a succession "shall not be fairly ascertainable under any of the preceding directions." That is not the case with the land in question, for it is admitted by the information that it has been ascertained to be of no annual value whatever. The 45th section, requiring the successor in the case of real property to give notice to the Commissioners "when any duty in respect thereof shall first become payable," might, by the use of the word "first," introduce a little doubt, and aid the argument, that unproductive property becoming productive would be liable to duty, and that consequently the Crown would be entitled to notice in such an event. But it appears to me that this word meets with its proper application in such sections as the 23rd and 24th with respect to timber and advowsons, and the 25th with respect to beneficial leases, which are instances of exceptions from the general rule contained in the 20th section as to the liability to duty at the time when the successor becomes entitled in possession to his succession.

It was thrown out, in the course of the argument, that from the words in the information, "the land in question was not capable of being sold or let profitably as building land," it might be inferred that it would have realized some amount at the time of the defendant becoming entitled to the succession, although it might probably be sold or let more advantageously at some future period; and it was contended that if the land had a saleable value at the time when the succession fell to the defendant, it might be charged with succession duty. The difficulty would be in what manner the amount of duty to be paid would, under these circumstances, be arrived at. It can hardly be supposed to have been the intention of the legislature that a valuable succession of this description should escape assessment altogether; and yet there would be no annual value to furnish a basis for the only mode of calculating the duty prescribed by the act. Instead of considering "the interest of the succession" (in the words of the 21st section) "to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of the property," it would be necessary to ascertain the amount for which the land would sell and then make that amount the assumed purchase-money of an annuity to represent the duty. It appears to me that the 23rd and 24th sections, as to timber and advowsons "comprised in the succession," rather favour the view that for land yielding no annual value, but capable of immediately realizing a value by sale, the succession would be liable to succession duty. I do not understand that these subjects of property would have been exempt from duty, but for the special provisions respecting them. The language of the sections assumes that they would have been chargeable at once as "comprised in the succession." The rule as to the time and mode of charging the duty was introduced in case of the successor who, from the nature of the property, might possess it as a valuable part of the succession and yet derive no profit from it for many years.

I cannot help thinking that if the Crown had not acted upon an erroneous notion of the defendant's possible liability to duty at some future period, it would have been found that his land was not altogether valueless, and that the question might have been raised as to its liability to duty upon the marketable value as building land. But I must act upon the admission in the information that the plots of land in question were wholly unoccupied, and not capable of yielding income, fluctuating or otherwise; and upon that ground alone, I have come to the conclusion that the defendant was not chargeable with duty when he became entitled to his succession, and that he cannot be charged at any time afterwards. I therefore think that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer is right, and that it ought to be affirmed.

Decree affirmed; and appeal dismissed, with costs.

The Court refused to interfere with an order made by a Judge (under the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852,) for consolidating two actions, in one of which the husband claimed damages for injury done to his house and trade, while in the other both the husband and wife claimed for injury to the wife, and the husband also claimed for consequential damage to himself.

In the first of these actions, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for injury done to his house and trade by an explosion of gas, caused by the negligence of the defendants. The defendants pleaded on the 19th, and issue was joined on the 22nd of April 1865.

In the second action, the plaintiff in the first action and his wife claimed damages for severe injuries inflicted on the wife by means of the explosion, the husband also claiming damages for the loss of his wife's society and services, &c., and for the medical expenses incurred by reason of the explosion.

On the 4th of April, and before pleading in the second action, the defendants took out a summons to consolidate the two actions, and Pigott, B. thereupon made an order for their consolidation under the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which enacts that "In any action brought by a man and his wife for an injury done to the wife, in respect of which she is necessarily joined as co-plaintiff, it shall be lawful for the husband to add thereto claims in his own right, and separate actions brought in respect of such claims may be consolidated, if the Court or a Judge shall think fit: provided, that in the case of the death of either plaintiff, such suit so far only as relates to the causes of action, if any, which do not survive shall abate."

Lyell now moved to rescind this order, on the following grounds.—First, that the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, was intended to apply to cases only where the plaintiff claimed damages resulting to himself in consequence of the injury done to his wife, in respect of which claims the husband must, before the statute, have brought a separate action for the consequential damage sustained by him,—this appears from the first Report of the Common Law Commissioners(1); and, secondly, that the order itself was informal, because in the first action issue had been joined, while in the second no plea had been delivered, so that the effect of consolidating them would be to postpone the first in order that issue might be joined in the second.

The COURT (2) refused to interfere with the order, holding that the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act applied to these actions; and, as to the objection on the score of informality, intimating that the defendants should be put under terms if necessary.

Practice—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 40.—Consolidation of Actions—Husband and Wife—Joinder of Claims by Both with Claims by Husband.

The Court refused to interfere with an order made by a Judge (under the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852,) for consolidating two actions, in one of which the husband claimed damages for injury done to his house and trade, while in the other both the husband and wife claimed for injury to the wife, and the husband also claimed for consequential damage to himself.

On the 4th of April, and before pleading in the second action, the defendants took out a summons to consolidate the two actions, and Pigott, B. thereupon made an order for their consolidation under the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which enacts that "In any action brought by a man and his wife for an injury done to the wife, in respect of which she is necessarily joined as co-plaintiff, it shall be lawful for the husband to add thereto claims in his own right, and separate actions brought in respect of such claims may be consolidated, if the Court or a Judge shall think fit: provided, that in the case of the death of either plaintiff, such suit so far only as relates to the causes of action, if any, which do not survive shall abate."

Lyell now moved to rescind this order, on the following grounds.—First, that the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, was intended to apply to cases only where the plaintiff claimed damages resulting to himself in consequence of the injury done to his wife, in respect of which claims the husband must, before the statute, have brought a separate action for the consequential damage sustained by him,—this appears from the first Report of the Common Law Commissioners(1); and, secondly, that the order itself was informal, because in the first action issue had been joined, while in the second no plea had been delivered, so that the effect of consolidating them would be to postpone the first in order that issue might be joined in the second.

The COURT (2) refused to interfere with the order, holding that the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act applied to these actions; and, as to the objection on the score of informality, intimating that the defendants should be put under terms if necessary.

 May 3. } MARTIN v. GRIBBLE.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.)—Composition-Deed—Parties—Composition payable on Signing Deed.

A composition-deed, made between the defendant of the first part and the undersigned J. F., one of the creditors of the defendant, and also all the other undersigned creditors of the defendant of the second part, after reciting that the defendant was unable to pay his several creditors the full sum of 20s. in the pound, but was able and willing to pay each and all of them, on signing the deed, the composition of 5s. in the pound, and that the defendant had applied to the several parties of the second part to receive and take the composition of 5s. in the pound, payable on signing the deed, in full satisfaction and discharge of their several respective debts, which the parties of the second part had agreed to accept in full satisfaction and discharge, proceeded in consideration thereof to release the debts:—Held, that the deed was invalid, and not binding on the non-assenting creditors, as by the terms of the deed the composition was to be paid only to the creditors who signed, therefore those who assented were in a better position than those who dissented.

Declaration, first count, on a promissory note for 50*l.* by payee against maker, and second count for interest.

Plea, that after the last pleading in this action and after the 11th of October 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons, and thereupon a deed hereinafter particularly set forth relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendant and his release therefrom, bearing date the 8th of March 1864, was made and entered into by and between the defendant, the person in the deed named as Albert Gribble, of the first part, and John Fryer in the said deed named, and also all the other creditors of the defendant whose names were there undersigned and hereinafter set forth, of the second part, and which said deed, signed and attested as hereinafter mentioned, was and is in the words and figures following, that is to say, —This deed, made the 8th of March 1864, between Albert Gribble, of Collumpton, in the county of Devon, attorney-at-law, of the first part, and the undersigned J. Fryer, of No. 2, The Mint, in the city of Exeter, schoolmaster, one of the creditors of the said A. Gribble, and also all the other undersigned creditors of the said A. Gribble, of the second part, the said J. Fryer and all the other undersigned creditors of A. Gribble, being a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said A. Gribble, whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, and being hereinafter described as the several parties hereto of the second part. Whereas, from divers causes, the said A. Gribble is unable to pay his several creditors the full sum of 20*s.* in the pound, but is able and willing to pay each and all of them, on signing this deed, the composition or compensation of 5*s.* in the pound. And whereas the said A. Gribble hath applied to the several parties hereto of the second part to receive and take the said composition or compensation of 5*s.* in the pound, payable on signing the deed, in full satisfaction and discharge of their several respective debts, claims and demands on him which the several parties hereto of the second part have agreed to accept in such full satisfaction and discharge as aforesaid, and in consideration thereof do hereby respectively release the said A. Gribble of and from all debts, claims and demands due from the said A. Gribble to them respectively. Provided always, that the execution hereof by any or either of the several parties hereto of the second part shall not in any way prejudice or discharge their right to retain for their own use and benefit against all persons whatever any security or securities, whether legal or equitable, which are now held by any or either of them, and which may have been deposited or given by the said A. Gribble in respect of any debt, claim or demand not compounded for or compensated under and by virtue of this deed, and shall not in any way prejudice or discharge their right to receive under or sue upon any such security or securities as against all other persons than the said A. Gribble. The plea then averred that a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value, of the creditors of the defendant whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards did in writing assent to and approve of the said deed, and the execution of the said deed by the defendant was attested by a solicitor, and within twenty-eight days from the day of execution of the said deed by the defendant the same was produced and left (having been first duly stamped) at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and together with such deed there was delivered to the said Chief Registrar an affidavit by which the defendant had a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards had in writing assented to and approved of the said deed, and that the deed did before the registration thereof bear such ordinary and ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf; and at the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the claim herein pleaded to, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and all conditions precedent had been performed, and having been performed, the plaintiff became and was bound by the deed as if he had been a party to it and had duly executed the same.

Meadows White, in support of the demurrer.—The deed set out in the plea is clearly bad, and is not binding on the non-assenting creditors. It is stated to be a deed made between the debtor and the undersigned creditors only, and not with all the creditors, and the creditors who assent are in a different position from those who do not assent. If the plea had contained no averment of a tender of the composition-money, it would have been clearly bad—Fessard v. Mugnier (1), but that defect is cured by the amendment (2). The deed, however, is invalid because it is made only with the creditors who execute, and does not provide any means for the payment of the composition to those creditors who do not execute.

Yes; and also on the authority of Ilderton v. Castrique (4) and Ilderton v. Jewell (5). In the last case, Crompton, J., in his judgment, at p. 150, says, "The act of parliament means that the provisions of the deed shall not be confined to any class of creditors. It seems to me to be the same thing if you expressly exclude some of the creditors, or say those only shall get the composition who sign the deed. Though it is not now necessary to have a cessio bonorum, the payment of the composition must be so regulated that there should be a provision for the payment to all the creditors. The real objection to this deed is, that there is no provision made for all the creditors. The deed is a deed between the debtor and those creditors who execute it." Blackburn, J. did not assent to affirm the judgment in that case, but in the subsequent case of Dingwell v. Edwards (6), at p. 165, that learned Judge stated that there was no ground for his doubt. In this last case the Court differed as to the construction to be put upon the deed, but they were unanimous that if the composition was limited to be paid to the creditors who should execute it, the deed was bad. Now, in the present case the composition-money is only payable to those creditors who sign the deed. Signing the deed is a condition precedent to the payment of the composition, and this objection is fatal to the deed.

[MARTIN, B.—The case is directly within the Lord Chancellor's judgment in Ex parte Cockburn (7).]

The COURT then called on—

G. Tayler to support the plea.—It is not necessary that a deed, in order to be valid and within the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, should be a deed made between the debtor and all his creditors; it is a perfectly valid deed if it does not exclude any creditors from its benefits. This point was decided in Clapham v. Atkinson (8). The deed in that case was between the debtor of the one part and the undersigned creditors of the debtor of the other part; there the deed was held to be valid, and the present deed is precisely similar. Williams, J. in that case, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "The plaintiff did not sign the deed; but he is bound thereby if the deed fulfilled the conditions imposed by section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the following sections. We are of opinion that it does. It is within the words of section 192, being a composition-deed between the debtor and his creditors; and it is not shewn that any of the required conditions mentioned in section 192. of the statute have not been observed. The parties intended that the deed should be within that section, as it states the signing creditors to be the requisite majority in number and value. One objection was, that the deed was made with the creditors who signed, and not with all; but all the creditors have the option of coming in and signing. Therefore the objection, on this ground, fails." It is true the present deed states that the parties of the second part should receive the composition of 5s. in the pound, "payable on signing the deed"; but the words "on signing" refer only to the time of the composition being payable; it means, on the debtor's signing the deed, not on the creditor's signing it, the composition should be paid. Upon this construction, the deed is one made between a debtor and those creditors who execute, but made for the benefit of all his creditors; and such a deed is valid according to all the authorities. Here the defendant has had the composition tendered to him; he is therefore in as good a position as those creditors who have signed. Hudson v. Barclay (9) shews that the statute does not require that the deed should be tendered to every creditor for his signature. Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, says: "The Court (that is, the Court below) impliedly repeat that a creditor has a right to have a deed presented to him for execution, which, when executed by him, will put no burthen upon him to which he ought to be subjected. To this we cannot assent. There is no provision in the statute, nor is there anything in the nature of the transaction to render it essential that the creditors who are to be bound by the deed should have an opportunity to execute the deed at all. It may often happen that three-fourths of the creditors assent to the instrument before notice of it is given to some creditor, either because his residence is not known, or it may be to one who is not asked to sign, because it is thought he would certainly refuse; yet surely such a creditor would be bound as much as any other."

[BRAMWELL, B.—Suppose a man's debt is disputed, what step is he to take to get his composition?]

If the debtor does not tender the composition, then the creditor can sue for the original debt, but if he make the tender then the creditor can get the composition.

[PIGOTT, B.—Dingwell v. Edwards (6) is an express authority against you.]

There the Court were equally divided. And in that case the deed contained a covenant to pay the composition, which however was limited in its operation to those creditors who assented to the instrument.

[BRAMWELL, B.—In ordinary composition deeds a tender and refusal does not discharge the debt; there must be a payment of the composition money into court to make the plea good. I think you will find it has been so held in Cooper v. Phillips (10).]

White was heard in reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff. I think this case is so clear, and so distinctly within the Lord Chancellor's decision in Ex parte Cockburn (7), which has been so frequently referred to, that I do not think it necessary to do more than to say that in my judgment this case is concluded by the judgment given in that case. That case was decided in a Court not merely of co-ordinate jurisdiction with this Court, but a Court peculiarly acquainted with subjects of this nature. I am quite free to admit that I think an opposite conclusion might have been come to on the ground that the statute made all the difference, and prevented the rule of law that has been alluded to, and which is the foundation of the decision in Ex parte Cockburn (7) from applying. But I think we are bound by the Lord Chancellor's decision. He has acted upon a view of the law which undoubtedly has been recognized for a century. I may say, that if a deed be made inter partes, no person can sue upon it who is not a party. Here the defendant is entitled to nothing unless he signs the deed. That is not what the statute intended. The statute intended that all the parties to the deed should be upon the same footing whether they signed the deed or not. Those who signed the deed and those who did not sign it are not in the same position, and I think that makes this deed void, and that therefore the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment.

MARTIN, B.—I did not understand Mr.

White as urging the objection that this was a deed inter partes, and that the non-assenting creditors could not sue upon it. But it seems to me that upon the other question—what is the true meaning of this deed—there must be judgment for the plaintiff. Mr. Tayler has argued that the words “payable on signing,” mean on the signing by the debtor, but to give them that meaning would be to violate all the grammatical principles of the English language, and read the words in a sense quite different from that which they express. That, I dare say, has very often been done for the purpose of supporting these deeds. But this deed seems to express, as clearly as words can, that the creditor is to sign the deed, and that then and there upon the spot he is to be paid his composition-money, and that his signature—that is, the signing the deed by the creditor—is a condition precedent to his getting the money: that is the true meaning of these words. The language of the Lord Chancellor in the case referred to is as plain and distinct as it possibly can be, and what he says is: “To render a deed of composition and release binding on the minority of the creditors who have not executed or assented to, or approved of it in writing, it is necessary that the non-assenting creditors should stand under the deed in the same situation and with the same advantages as . . . the creditors forming the majority.” That is in the first judgment. In the second he says: “As I explained on a former occasion, in my view of the statute, a deed to bind creditors who have not executed it must be a deed which places the parties who execute and the parties who have not executed it precisely on an equal footing in point of law.” Now, whether that is expressed in direct language in the statute or not, I am sure I know not; but it is clearly to be implied from it. It would be the greatest injustice that by possibility could be that the assenting creditors should be in a condition to make better terms for themselves than for the non-assenting creditors. If the statute enables these assenting creditors to bind others, common and ordinary justice would certainly render it necessary that the parties who by assenting to the deed can bind others who do not assent to it should not put themselves on a better footing than those others. That being so, the very words of this deed provide that the parties who do not assent shall get nothing. That is a plain and direct provision in this deed. I also agree with my Brother Pigott that the late case of Dingwell v. Edwards (6) and the case of Ilderton v. Jewell (5), in principle are just the same, and it seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I believe that the case of Ilderton v. Jewell (5) is in point. That is almost enough to say upon the matter. I am not sure that there may not be some case in point the other way. But still I think Ilderton v. Jewell (5) is plainly in point. I cannot help making one remark, that the law upon these matters, and also the cases, are in a very unfortunate condition. I think it ought to be remembered it is more easy to follow an act of parliament than the cases that build it up.

PICOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think this deed is a deed which is a very crude document, to say the least of it. I very much doubt whether the framer of it himself quite knew whether he intended to include all the creditors, or only those of the second part. It is enough to say that, reading the deed, it is clear upon the plainest construction of the language that the parties are only to get their composition on signing the deed. On that supposition those who do not sign are not entitled to it according to the case of Dingwell v. Edwards (6). It is quite enough therefore to decide this case upon that authority. I may, however, speaking for myself, say I think it an unpleasant duty to have to sit and give judgment upon cases of this kind, where we are asked to support these deeds, or overturn them, on the most technical objections of form, without the least regard to the substance of the matter. I still hope that a very short form of deed may be brought before the legislature and sanctioned as binding on all parties; for all the community have a great interest in having this matter settled; and not by continuing litigation making it more unsettled every day.

 April 26. } GARDOM v. LEE AND OTHERS.

Vendor and Purchaser — Conditions of Sale—Deposit—Interest—Expenses of Investigating Title.

The plaintiff purchased land of the defendants subject amongst others to the following conditions of sale: Fourth, that within twenty-one days from the date of the sale the vendors should deliver an abstract of title to the purchaser; seventh, that if any purchaser make any objections or requisitions in respect of the title within thirty-five days from the day of sale, the vendors shall be at liberty at their election either to answer such objection or to rescind the sale on repaying the deposit without interest, and without incurring any liability to pay any of the expenses for investigating the title; eighth, that all rights of the vendors to hold the purchaser to have waived all objections or requisitions not made within the time specified as aforesaid, and such right of the vendors to rescind the contract shall not be deemed to be waived or in any manner affected or prejudiced by any negotiation as to any objections or requisitions or attempt to obviate or comply with the same. The sale took place on the 30th of July 1861, and a deposit of 100*l.* was paid to the vendors' solicitor. The abstract of title was not delivered until the 2nd of November. On the 8th of November the vendees' solicitor wrote to the vendors' solicitor, stating that the vendors, who were trustees, in his opinion "had no power to sell, and that it was not worth while going into the title"; he also wrote, on the 28th, desiring "to know whether the vendors would rescind the contract or insist upon specific performance." On the 30th of November the vendors' solicitor answered, "That he was satisfied that they had power to sell, and that his clients would expect the vendee to complete the purchase." The vendees thereupon incurred expenses in investigating the title, and it turned out that the trustees had no power to sell, and they, on the 21st of December 1861, declined to complete the purchase, and claimed to be paid interest on their deposit and the expenses of investigating the title. A further correspondence was continued until the 17th of November 1862:—Held, on these facts, that the vendors could not elect to rescind the contract under the seventh condition, and that there was no negotiation within the meaning of the eighth condition, and that therefore the vendee was entitled to recover interest on the deposit and the expenses of investigating the title.

This was a special case, stated by consent of the parties and in pursuance of an order of Channell, B.

By his last will and testament, duly executed, and dated on the 14th of November 1860, W. Wildgoose, of Morley Street, Birmingham, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever unto J. Lee, of Crick, near Derby, and G. C. Curtis, of Highgate, near Birmingham, their heirs, executors and administrators, upon trust for his wife, Hannah Wildgoose, during her life, and for that purpose to permit her to have the use and enjoyment of such part thereof as should not produce income, and to permit her to receive the income of such part as should produce income, and upon her decease upon trust, as soon as conveniently might be, to convert the whole of his said estate into money, and for that purpose to sell such parts as should not consist of money or securities for money either by public auction or private contract, with liberty from time to time to buy in any part thereof at any auction, and to rescind or vary the terms of any contract for sale that might have been entered into, and to convey such parts of the said estates as from time to time should be sold in such manner as the respective purchasers thereof should direct; and he declared that such purchasers respectively should be exonerated from all responsibility in respect of the application of the monies paid by them to the trustee or trustees for the time being of his said will, and the trustees were to stand possessed of the monies arising from such sales upon trust to invest the same on securities as therein mentioned, and to pay the annual income in equal moieties to testator's son and daughter for their respective lives, and after their death the trustees were to stand possessed of the trust funds for the issue of the son and daughter in equal shares as therein mentioned.

W. Wildgoose, the testator, departed this life shortly after the execution of his said will, without having revoked or in anywise altered the same.

Hannah Wildgoose is still living, and likewise the testator's son and daughter.

On the 30th of July 1861, J. Lee, G. C. Curtis, and Hannah Wildgoose put up for sale by public auction, in four lots, under the conditions of sale hereinafter mentioned, certain land in the county of Derby, which had passed to them by the said devise.

The clauses in the conditions of sale, which are material, are the following :

3rd. That each purchaser shall immediately after the sale pay a deposit in the proportion of 10*l.* for every 100*l.* of his purchase-money into the hands of the vendors' solicitor, and sign an agreement for payment of the remainder on the 31st of October 1861, at the office of the vendors' solicitor, at which time and place the purchase is to be completed, and if from any cause whatever the purchase shall not be completed on the said 31st of October 1861, the purchaser shall pay interest on the remainder of his purchase-money after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from that day until the purchase shall be completed, and shall from the same day be entitled to the rents and profits thereof. All outgoings payable by the landlord up to the said 31st of October will be discharged by the vendors.

4th. That within twenty-one days from the date of the sale the vendors shall, at their own expense, make and have ready for delivery at the office of their solicitor to the several purchasers or their solicitors, an abstract of the title of the vendors to the several lots.

6th. That each purchaser shall make his objections and requisitions, if any, in respect of the title to the lot bought, and send the same to the vendors' solicitor within thirty-five days from the day of sale, and all objections and requisitions which shall not be made within the time specified shall be taken to be waived.

7th. That if any purchaser make any objections or requisitions in respect of the title to the lots within thirty-five days from the day of the sale as aforesaid, the vendors shall be at liberty at their election either to answer such objection and comply with such requisitions, or to rescind the contract for sale on repaying the deposit alone, without interest for the same, or for any other part of the purchase-money, and without incurring any liability to pay to such purchaser any of the expenses for investigating the title or otherwise.

8th. That such rights as aforesaid of the vendors to hold the purchaser to have waived all objections or requisitions not made within the time specified as aforesaid, and such right of the vendors to rescind the contract as aforesaid shall not be deemed to be waived, or in any manner affected or prejudiced by any negotiation as to any objections or requisitions or attempt to obviate or to comply with the same respectively.

The plaintiff became the purchaser of lots 2. and 3. at the price of 49*l.* per acre for lot 2, containing 15 a. 1 r. 15 p.; of 42*l.* per acre for lot 3, containing 8 a. 0 r. 7 p., and paid a deposit of 100*l.* in respect thereof, and signed an agreement for the payment of the remainder under the 3rd condition of sale.

The following is the copy of the covenant of purchase, which was signed by the plaintiff and by Mr. Brooks, the agent authorized by the defendants : "Be it remembered, that at a sale by auction, this 30th of July 1861, of the property mentioned in the above-written particulars, W. Gardom, of Bakewell, shoemaker, was the highest bidder for and was declared the purchaser, subject to the above-written condition, of lots 2. and 3. in the particulars annexed, at the price of 49*l.* per acre for lot 2, and 42*l.* per acre for lot 3, and has paid into the hands of Mr. Jessop, the vendors' solicitor, the sum of 100*l.* by way of deposit and in part payment of his said purchase-money, and hereby agrees to pay to the vendors at the above-named office of Mr. Jessop, on the 31st of October next, the remainder of the purchase-money. As witness our hands."

The particulars referred to as above written and annexed contained a full and sufficient description of the lots 2. and 3. respectively.

On the 8th of August 1861, and again on the 12th of September in the same year, Mr. Taylor, the plaintiff's solicitor, applied by letter to Mr. Jessop, the defendant's solicitor, for the abstract of the defendant's title; but from difficulties which arose in obtaining some of the necessary deeds, the defendants were unable to furnish the abstract until the 2nd of November 1861, on which day Mr. Jessop delivered the same to Mr. Taylor.

After the delivery of the abstract Mr. Taylor wrote the following letter to Mr. Jessop: "November 8th, 1861. Wildgoose's sale.—I have not yet perused this abstract, but I have just been glancing over the sheets and am struck with the last testator's will, whereby he devises to trustees in trust for his wife for life and then to sell. You say in a note she is living and will join in the conveyance: how do you make out the power of sale has arisen? P.S.—Of course this query is merely preliminary, and is not to prejudice our right to make complete requisitions afterwards, but it does not seem to me worth while going on further, unless my present view that there is not as yet any power of sale be successfully combated."

After this letter some further correspondence took place between Mr. Taylor and Mr. Jessop upon the question, whether the trustees had power to sell, and on the 28th of November Mr. Taylor wrote the following letter to Mr. Jessop: "I am obliged for the copy-will, and regret I can see nothing in it enabling a sale, except the express power of sale which, notwithstanding the cases to which you refer and my further consideration of the matter, I must still contend does not come into force with its incidental authority to give receipts until after the widow's death. Under these circumstances, my client wishes to withdraw from the purchase. Please let me know as soon as you can whether you rescind the contract and return the deposit or whether you insist on specific performance by us. In the latter event I will within a reasonable time send you formal queries and requisitions on the whole title; but as yet I have not gone into the general title, not thinking it right to incur that expense, when apparently an insuperable objection lies on the surface."

To this letter Mr. Jessop replied as follows: "November 30th, 1861.—I am satisfied that we have now power to sell, and will thank you to send me your queries on the title, as my client will expect yours to complete the purchase."

After this letter the plaintiff's solicitor went into an examination of the title and laid the abstract of title before counsel to advise on the purchaser's behalf, and the deeds were compared with the abstract. After the plaintiff's solicitor had obtained counsel's opinion, he sent, on or about the 31st of December 1861, to the defendants' solicitor certain requisitions and observations on the title and the right of the defendants to sell, the fifth of which was copied from the opinion of his counsel on the point to which it refers, and was as follows: "The attempted sale in the lifetime of Hannah, the widow of W. Wildgoose, the testator of 1860, is wholly unauthorized. She cannot by her concurrence accelerate the period of sale, nor would the concurrence of the son and daughter remove the objection, as the contingent interests of their unborn issue cannot be bound; as against such issue the proposed sale and conveyance would be a plain breach of trust, in which of course the purchaser would be involved. This is too clear to admit of any discussion."

The plaintiff's solicitor wrote a letter accompanying these requisitions, stating that it became his duty on the part of the plaintiff to decline proceeding further with the purchase, and requesting that the deposit should be returned with interest and his expenses paid.

The defendants' solicitor did not at first yield to the objection as to the right to sell and convey, and some correspondence took place, and the matter stood over till the 1st of September 1862, when the plaintiff's solicitor again wrote to defendants' solicitor, requesting that the matter might be closed without further delay, and inclosing his bill of costs, and requesting payment of it, and a return of the deposit and interest.

On the 11th of November 1862, Mr. Jessop and Mr. Taylor had a personal interview, and at that interview Mr. Jessop objected to the plaintiff's demand for interest on the deposit and costs. On the 17th of November 1862, Mr. Jessop wrote a letter to Mr. Taylor, stating his willingness to pay back the deposit without interest and costs, and that on hearing from Mr. Taylor that he would be satisfied with this, he would send him a cheque for the amount. Some further correspondence took place, in which the plaintiff's solicitor insisted on his right to recover the deposit with interest and costs, and the defendants' solicitor denied the right to interest and costs, and stated on such claim being abandoned he would at once send a cheque for the deposit. The writ was issued in the present action on the 5th of December 1862. Since the declaration was delivered the 100*l.* deposit has been repaid, and no question is to be raised concerning such deposit, nor does the plaintiff seek for damages by reason of the non-delivery of an abstract in due time.

It is admitted that the defendants did in fact make and deduce such title to the property purchased by the plaintiff as they had, and that they were willing, so far as they had power, to convey such property to the plaintiff, and were ready to procure the concurrence of the testator's widow and of his son and daughter in such conveyance.

The defendants contend that they did not by the conditions of sale bind themselves to make a good title to the property or warrant that they had a good title to sell the same. That upon the facts above stated as to the making and rescinding of the contract, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover interest on his deposit or costs.

The plaintiff contends that by the contract and conditions, the defendants were bound to shew that they had a good title and right to convey the property to the plaintiff, subject to the power of rescinding the contract given to the vendors by the condition. And that upon the facts stated the defendants were not entitled to rescind and did not rescind the contract according to the conditions, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover interest on his deposit and costs.

The question for the Court is whether, under the circumstances stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover interest on the deposit and the costs of investigating the title or either of them. If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the said interest and costs or either of them, then the defendants agree that judgment shall be entered against them by confession or otherwise, as the Court may think fit, with costs. And if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the interest and costs or either of them in this action, then the plaintiff agrees that the judgment shall and may be entered against him of vol. proe., or otherwise as the Court may think fit, and that judgment shall be entered accordingly, with costs of defence.

It is agreed that if the judgment is entered for the plaintiff, the damages shall be assessed at 7*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* for the said interest, and 15*l.* for the said costs, and that judgment shall be entered for either or both of the said sums, as the Court may direct.

Hayes, Serj. (Fitzjames Stephens with him), for the plaintiff, contended that as the abstract of title was not delivered within the twenty-one days after the sale, and the objections and requisitions were not made within the thirty-five days, owing to the default of the vendors to deliver the abstract of title, the vendors could not rescind the contract under the seventh condition; and that the facts did not shew any negotiation to obviate the objections to the title or to comply with the requisitions made; that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest on his deposit and also the expenses he had incurred in investigating the title. He cited Tanner v. Smith (1) and Morley v. Cooke (2).

Lush, for the defendants, contended that the period of thirty-five days mentioned in the seventh condition was a limitation of time in favour of the sellers, and inasmuch as the sellers had not delivered the abstract of title in time, the purchaser might have refused to receive it, but having accepted the abstract he had waived all objection to its not having been delivered within the thirty-five days. That the eighth condition was inserted in the conditions of sale for the purpose of meeting the objection that if a negotiation with respect to an objection to title were prolonged beyond the time limited by the conditions for rescinding, the vendor lost the right to rescind; and he contended on the facts that there was a negotiation within the meaning of the eighth condition, and that the vendee was only entitled to a return of his deposit.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the Court. This is a case which the Court are called upon to decide under circumstances that the parties apparently did not contemplate, and for which they have made no provision. The seventh condition of sale points to the period of thirty-five days within which any objections are to be made, and if the objections are made within that period, the vendors are to be at liberty to either answer the objection and comply with the requisitions or rescind the contract; and the eighth condition, to a certain extent, enables them to do both, that is, first to try to comply with the requisitions, and if they cannot, then to rescind. That is the true construction of the seventh and eighth conditions taken together. I think it was well pointed out by my Brother Pigott in the course of the argument that in the present case these two conditions did not apply because there was no negotiation, but a dispute: the vendee saying the objection he had made was a good one, the vendors saying it was not a good objection. If the vendors had by any correspondence proposed instead, that some indemnity should be given, or that some other mode of complying with the requisitions and getting rid of the objection should be adopted, it would come within the eighth condition. I do not think Mr. Lush has answered that by saying "We stand upon our right, on the part of the vendors, to enforce the contract." The other side also stand upon their right, and insist that their objection is good, and that they have a right to throw up the contract. The parties then went on corresponding and trying to persuade each other, and each insisting that he was right and the other wrong. Mr. Lush argues that that is a negotiation within the eighth condition; I do not agree with him on that point. Too long a period has elapsed certainly to enable the vendors to rescind; and if we are to suppose the time is waived, I do not see my way clearly to know how it was extended, or how, being waived for one purpose, it was not waived for another. Upon the whole, it seems to me, and the ground upon which I give judgment for the plaintiff is this,—giving the fullest effect to the seventh and eighth conditions in favour of the vendors, it comes to this: by the seventh condition they are to comply with the requisitions or rescind the contract; by the eighth they are allowed not to do that immediately, but to endeavour to arrange and to comply with them if they possibly can. I think the case of Tanner v. Smith(1) applies the moment vendors say "We are right; we do not mean to do any more. You say you are right, and you do not mean to do any more. We therefore hold you to the bargain." I think after that they cannot rescind. For these reasons it appears to me that judgment should be for the plaintiff.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot help thinking that this is a very plain case. It seems to me that the seventh condition is a very intelligible and reasonable one, and so is the eighth condition, if a reasonable limit is put on it. A man undertakes to sell an estate; it turns out from some objection made that he cannot sell; he reserves to himself the liberty to say if the contract is not as represented, here is your deposit. That will be the state of things upon the seventh condition only. It might well be he would desire to say, I am entitled to remove the objection, or I think I can point out that it is unfounded, and I can obviate it by some equivalent or compensation, and I propose to negotiate. But then, upon that objection, in order that it might not be said I am bound without any attempt to remove or supersede an objection of this sort, the eighth condition is put in; and if there had been anything of the kind here, I should say the eighth condition would reserve the right of rescission, as my Lord has pointed out. But the parties do not negotiate as to the objections or requisitions, or attempt to obviate them, but the defendants stand upon their rights and say, Your objection is an ill-founded one; we shall not negotiate with you; we assure you it is unfounded. It seems that a condition of this description, with the meaning the defendant's counsel puts upon it, would be an unreasonable one, as is shewn upon this particular case, because the plaintiff's solicitor says there is an objection upon the surface, and before we go any further I point it out at once. What say the defendants? We insist it is no objection. The plaintiff's solicitor very wisely does what is objected to; he says, Well, if that is so, I shall make my requisitions to the title. I shall have to stand upon my rights, and I may as well have as many strings to my bow as possible. The result is, he is put to expense in consequence. I think that in reason and good sense the defendants have lost the power of rescission, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action. There is a difficulty which I must advert to, and it is this : the defendants do not at the last moment offer to rescind, and I am by no means sure that they may not at this moment say we never offered to rescind, and we hold you the plaintiff to your bargain ; bring an action against us for not complying with the contract, or file a bill to enforce specific performance. However, upon the whole, I think our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

PROCTER, B.—The plaintiff brings an action for the interest on his deposit and the costs necessarily incurred in investigating the title. The defendants urge their right to rescind the contract ; then the question is, whether they have a right to rescind under the circumstances, and whether they have rescinded. Now, there really is no difficulty in the construction of the seventh and eighth conditions of sale. It is perfectly plain to me that the sellers may at their election either rescind or negotiate with a view to remove an objection. The eighth condition says, if you attempt to remove the objection by negotiation you shall not be thereby deemed to have waived the right to rescind. Now, upon that the purchaser makes an objection in limine, and he makes it in the most business-like way, and accompanies it with this statement, "My client therefore wishes to withdraw from the purchase." That is what he says in his letter of the 28th of November 1861. What is the answer of the sellers ? In a letter of the 30th of November, their solicitor says, "I am satisfied we have power to sell ; we will thank you to send the queries on the title, as my clients will expect yours to complete the purchase." Is that a negotiation to remove the objection, or is it not, in point of fact, an election to hold a man to his bargain ; an election, in other words, not to rescind the contract upon the part of the vendors, but to hold the vendee to the contract ? I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole of the amount he claims.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

May 1. } IRBOTSON v. PRAT.

Nuisance—Firing Rockets—Frightening Grouse.

To a declaration alleging that the defendant, with intent to frighten away grouse from the plaintiff's land, fired and exploded rockets and fireworks so as to be a nuisance, the defendant pleaded that he committed the supposed grievance in order to prevent the plaintiff from shooting and killing grouse which had been enticed by the plaintiff from land of the defendant, and also in order to prevent the plaintiff from enticing other grouse which might be enticed by him from the defendant's land :—Held, that the plea was no answer to the action.

Declaration—First count, that the plaintiff was possessed of land, yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, on divers days unlawfully and with intent to drive and frighten away grouse and other game, then lawfully being in and upon the land of the plaintiff, from and off and away from the land of the plaintiff to certain other lands, and to prevent the plaintiff from hunting, shooting, killing and taking the said game on his land, fired, exploded and projected, and caused to be fired, exploded and projected, certain offensive, injurious, noxious, terrifying and dangerous rockets, fireworks, missiles, projectiles and combustibles, and made and caused to be made divers loud, jarring, annoying and disturbing noises close to and over the land of the plaintiff, so as to be and the same were a nuisance and a grievous disturbance to the plaintiff in his lawful and quiet occupation and enjoyment thereof, and thereby also the plaintiff's horses and cattle, which were then lawfully in and upon the land of the plaintiff, were then greatly alarmed, terrified and rendered wild, unmanageable and furious, and impelled to run and rush violently in and about and over the land of the plaintiff, and into certain bogs and quagmires therein, and against and over the walls, banks and fences of the land of the plaintiff, and to break down and destroy such walls, banks and fences of the plaintiff, and to escape out of the land of the plaintiff, and to go at large ; and by reason of the premises, the said horses and cattle sustained great injury and damage, and became and were rendered wild, dangerous and unmanageable, and thereby also divers large numbers of grouse and other game, then lawfully being in and upon the land of the plaintiff, were scared and frightened and driven off and away from the land of the plaintiff, which otherwise the plaintiff might and would have shot, hunted, killed and taken, and the plaintiff was otherwise also greatly disturbed and damnified in the lawful and quiet occupation and enjoyment of his land.

The second count was in trespass.

Second plea, as to so much of the 1st count as relates to the said grouse, the defendant says that before the time of the committing of the said supposed grievances in the first count mentioned, his Grace the Duke of Rutland was seised in fee of certain land abutting on and next adjoining the land of the plaintiff in the first count mentioned, and was entitled to the exclusive right of shooting, killing and taking grouse on his land; and the said Duke before the committing of the said supposed grievances had gone to great expense in getting up and preserving great numbers of grouse on his lands, as the plaintiff well knew, and the defendant says that just before the committing of the said supposed grievances the plaintiff fraudulently and wrongfully and with intent to lure and entice the said grouse away from the said lands of the said Duke on to the lands of the plaintiff, and to obtain for himself the benefit of the expense so incurred by the said Duke as aforesaid, laid and placed on the land of the plaintiff near to the lands of the said Duke quantities of corn and other substances on which grouse feed, and thereby then lured and enticed the said grouse in the first count mentioned, and was about to lure and entice other grouse away from and out of the land of the said Duke on to the lands of the plaintiff, and was then and there about to shoot and kill the said grouse; wherefore the defendant, as the servant of the said Duke and by his command, in order to prevent the plaintiff from shooting and killing the said grouse so lured and enticed as aforesaid, and from luring and enticing the said other grouse as aforesaid, committed the said grievances in this plea pleaded to, doing no more than was necessary for the purpose aforesaid.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Baylis, in support of the demurrer.—

The question is, whether when a person has a qualified right to game on his own land, another person is justified in disturbing the game by means which amount to a nuisance, as by sending up rockets, firing guns, and throwing stones. It is clear that the defendant cannot so act. The plea is bad on two grounds: first, because it does not cover the whole declaration; it is confined to the first count "so far as relates to the grouse." The wrongful act is sending up the rockets, the consequence of that act is frightening the grouse. The declaration alleges, by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant the plaintiff's horses and cattle were alarmed and terrified, and grouse and other game were scared and driven off, so that, in truth, the plea is a plea to damages only so far as relates to the grouse. Secondly, the plea is no answer to the declaration. The plaintiff has a qualified right to the game; whilst they are on his land they are his property. A man enticing away game from his neighbour's land to his own land is guilty of no unlawful act. Such an act is perfectly lawful. In the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill (1), Holt, C.J. puts this case: "One schoolmaster sets up a new school to the damage of an ancient school, and thereby the scholars are allured from the old school to come to his new." The action was held there not to lie. "But suppose Mr. Hickeringill should lie in the way with his gun and fright the boys from going to school, and their parents would not let them go thither, sure that schoolmaster might have an action for the loss of his scholars." Carrington v. Taylor (2) is also in point for the plaintiff; it was held in that case, that firing at wild fowl so near to a decoy as to make the birds there take flight, was evidence of a wilful disturbance of and damage to the decoy for which an action is maintainable by the owner. There is a great distinction between enticing grouse to come to a man's land and disturbing grouse and frightening them from a man's land. The act of putting down corn to entice them is a lawful act;

(1) 11 East, n. 574.

(2) Ibid. 571.

the act of firing guns to frighten them away is an unlawful act.

[BRAMWELL, B.—In Chasemore v. Richards (3) the plaintiff was possessed of a spring underground which supplied his well. The defendant dug a well on his land, and the plaintiff's spring in consequence dried up. The only remedy the plaintiff had was to dig his well deeper and so retain the water if he could.]

Yes; and here the Duke ought to offer better inducement to the grouse to remain; he ought to feed them better. In Read v. Edwards (4) it was held to be actionable for a man to allow his dog, knowing him to be accustomed to chase and destroy game, to be at large in the neighbourhood of a large wood which the dog entered and did the damage complained of, and Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, says, "As to the property damaged being game, we think this is no answer to the action, because the law recognizes in the proprietor of land a qualified right to game whilst it is upon the land." So in Sutton v. Moody (5), the Court say, "If one start a hare in my close and kill her there, it is my hare; otherwise if he hunt her into the ground of a third person, then it is the hunter's." Blades v. Higgs (6) and The Queen v. Pratt (7) are to the same effect.

Wills.—It may be admitted, on behalf of the defendant, that there is a qualified right to game, because then it appears more clear that the plaintiff has done wrong in enticing away the defendant's grouse. In Keeble v. Hickeringill (1), at p. 574, Holt, C.J. says—"Suppose the defendant had shot in his own ground: if he had occasion to shoot it would have been one thing, but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing and a wrong." So here, to entice away the defendant's grouse on purpose to damage him is a wrong; the plea alleged that the act was fraudulently done, and also that what the defendant did, was done to prevent other grouse from being enticed over to the plaintiff's land. Here is an attack on the defendant's possessory right; it is conceded, on the other side, that the grouse are the defendant's as long as they are on the defendant's land, and all that the defendant has done is to protect that right and prevent that right from being invaded, and to protect his possessory right the defendant has a right to fire guns and send up rockets on his own land. The plaintiff does the first act, and according to the allegation in this plea he does it with the intent to damage his neighbour, and on general demurrer it is admitted he does it with the intent alleged. The plea is therefore good.

Baylis was not heard in reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that in this case the declaration is good and that the plea is bad. The declaration complains of an act being done which is apparently injurious and done for the purpose which is attributed to the defendant in the declaration; and supposing there had been no plea pleaded, the declaration would be good. But then the defendant by his plea says, "You have done me some wrong, and I have been endeavouring to redress that wrong by doing some wrong to you." If a man attacks you by force you may defend yourself by force; but you cannot commit some other wrong of a totally different character by way of repairing or avoiding the consequences of the wrong that has been done to you. You must seek redress for that wrong in a lawful and proper way. If a man horsewhips you you cannot libel him; or if he libels you you cannot justify the libel by horsewhipping him to prevent him doing it again. On these grounds it appears to me that, the declaration being good and the plea bad, the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment.

MARTIN, B.—I think the principle of the case of Carrington v. Taylor (2) decides this case.

BRAMWELL, B.—I also am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. The declaration appears to me to be clearly good. It alleges that the plaintiff, being the owner of certain land, the defendant, well knowing the premises, on divers days and times, and so forth, unlawfully and with intent to drive and frighten away the grouse and other game then lawfully being on and upon the said land of the plaintiff to certain other lands, and to prevent the plaintiff from hunting, shooting, &c. and so on, fired rockets and made a noise. The defendant pleads a plea which admits the declaration to be true, and then sets up the right to do the thing complained of, for the purpose which the declaration attributes to the defendant; that is to do the act for the purpose of frightening away the game. What is the reason given? The reason given is this: That the game which the defendant frightened away was game which the plaintiff wholly or partially got off from the Duke of Rutland's land—say the defendant's land—the Duke having attracted it there by providing food for it, or taking care of it, and then the plaintiff, improperly attempted to get it on his land by putting down some grain on his land. Then, in order that the plaintiff may not shoot the game which the plaintiff had so attracted, and in order that the plaintiff may have no inducement to go on with such conduct—for that is the only meaning of preventing him from alluring the grouse aforesaid—in order that he should be without inducement for such acts as that the defendant did the thing complained of. It appears to me clearly that the plea is bad, because I see nothing, in point of law, to prevent the plaintiff from doing that which the plea alleges he has done. If the plaintiff has done no wrong, how can there be a justification for the defendant's act? No one can pretend for a moment that any action would lie at the suit of the Duke against the plaintiff. The truth is this: without saying anything as to the propriety of such conduct as this between gentlemen and neighbours, the true remedy, I take it, where a person knows game is attracted away from his land, is to offer them stronger inducements to remain. It is really like the case I mentioned in the course of the argument of Chasemore v. Richards (3), where, if a man has the misfortune to lose his spring by another's digging a well, the proper remedy is for him to dig a deeper well.

LIERY COMPANY (LIMITED)

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134).—Composition Deed — Parties — Covenant to pay Composition.

A deed of composition was made between certain persons, whose names and seals were subscribed and affixed in the schedule thereunder written, being creditors in their own right solely, or in co-partnership with others, of the debtor, of the first part; the debtor of the second part; and two sureties for securing the composition of the third part; and in which the parties of the second and third parts covenanted with the parties of the first part, and with all the other creditors of the debtor, to pay them a composition of 10s. in the pound on their respective debts:—Held, that as the non-assenting creditors were not parties to the deed, but only covenantees, they could not sue for the composition, and had not an equal advantage with the assenting and executing creditors, and that, therefore, the deed was not valid.

Declaration for calls.

Plea—That before the time of the commencement of this suit, and after the accruing of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, on the 11th of March 1864, a deed was made between the defendant's creditors of the first part, the defendant of the second part, and B. Wade and J. Crossley of the third part, relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendant and his release therefrom; that such deed was made in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf; and that the conditions in that behalf mentioned in the same act to render the said deed valid and effectual and binding on all the creditors were observed, and thereby the creditors of the defendant, for the considerations therein mentioned, released and discharged the defendant from all debts and liabilities of the defendant to the said creditors respectively, and from all actions and suits in respect thereof.

Replication—That the said deed was and is in the words following :

"This indenture, made on the 11th of March 1864, between the several persons or parties whose names and seals are subscribed and affixed in the schedule hereunder written, being creditors in their own right solely, or in co-partnership with others, of W. F. Hawkins, of Belper, in the county of Derby, corn and seed merchant, executing, assenting to, or approving of these presents, of the first part, W. F. Hawkins of the second part, and B. Wade and J. Crossley of the third part : Whereas the said W. F. Hawkins is indebted to the several creditors aforesaid in the several sums set opposite to their respective names in the schedule hereunder written, and is and may be indebted to divers other persons or corporations in divers other sums; and whereas the said W. F. Hawkins being unable to pay in full the sums so owing by him as aforesaid, the said several parties hereto of the first part have lately agreed to accept a moiety of their said respective debts, payable in manner and at the times hereinafter mentioned, in full payment and discharge of such debts respectively, and have agreed to execute to the said F. W. Hawkins such release as is hereinafter contained, and the said B. Wade and J. Crossley have agreed to guarantee the payment of the aforesaid composition in manner hereinafter contained ; and whereas it is intended that these presents shall operate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192; now this indenture witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the premises and of the covenant for payment of the aforesaid composition in manner hereinafter contained, the said several parties hereto of the first part and all other, if any, the creditors of the said W. F. Hawkins, whether persons, partnerships or corporations, do hereby, for themselves respectively and for their respective executors, administrators and successors, and not one of them for the acts and deeds of the others or other of them, but each and every of them doth hereby for himself or themselves, and for his or their own acts, heirs, executors and administrators only, covenant with the said W. F. Hawkins, his executors and administrators, that this present covenant shall operate and enure, and may be pleaded in bar as a good and effectual release and discharge of all and all manner of actions, suits, bills, bonds, writings, obligatory debts, accounts, sum and sums of money, judgments, extents, executions, claims and demands whatsoever, both at law and in equity, or otherwise howsoever, which they, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, administrators or successors, now have or hath, or hereafter shall or may have, challenge, claim or demand against W. F. Hawkins, his heirs, executors or administrators, or any of them, for or by means or on account of all and every or any of the debts to them, or any of them respectively, due and owing from the said W. F. Hawkins as aforesaid, or of any interest or commission due or demandable for the same, or for or by reason or on account of any other matter, cause or thing whatsoever in respect of the said debts : Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that nothing herein contained shall extend to prevent the said creditors, parties to or bound by these presents, or any of them, or their or any of their partner or partners, heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, from enforcing or otherwise obtaining the full benefit and advantage of any charge or lien which they, or any of them, now have or hath upon any estate or effects of the said W. F. Hawkins or any other person or persons, or from suing or prosecuting any other person or persons than the said W. F. Hawkins, his heirs, executors or administrators, who is, are or shall or may be liable or accountable to pay or make good to any of the said creditors all or any part of their said respective debts, either as indorsees or acceptors of any bill or bills of exchange, or promissory note or notes, or as being bound in any bond or bonds, obligation or obligations, or other instrument or instruments, or as being liable or accountable for the payment of any such debt or debts, without having subscribed any bill, note, bond or other instrument whatever, or otherwise howsoever, as if these presents had not been made. And this indenture further witnesseth, that in further pursuance of the aforesaid agreement, and in consideration of the premises, the said W. F. Hawkins doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with the parties hereto of the first part and *with all other creditors of the said W. F. Hawkins who are or shall be bound by these presents, severally and respectively, and their several and respective executors, administrators and successors, that the said W. F. Hawkins, his executors or administrators, shall and will pay to the aforesaid creditors, severally and respectively, or their several and respective executors, administrators or successors, the sum of 5s. in the pound upon their several and respective debts so owing by the said W. F. Hawkins, upon or before the 15th of March instant, and the further sum of 5s. in the pound upon the same debts, upon or before the 22nd of August now next, the value of property held as security being first deducted from the said debts. And this indenture further witnesseth, that, in consideration of the premises, the said B. Wade and J. Crossley do hereby, for themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, jointly, and each of them doth hereby for himself respectively, and for his respective heirs, executors or administrators, covenant with the parties hereto of the first part and with all other the creditors of the said W. F. Hawkins who are or shall be bound by these presents, severally and respectively, and their several and respective administrators and successors, that the said W. F. Hawkins, B. Wade and J. Crossley, or some or one of them, or the executors or administrators of them or some of them, shall and will pay, in manner and at the time aforesaid, the second instalment of the aforesaid composition hereinbefore covenanted to be paid by the said W. F. Hawkins, his executors or administrators: Provided always, that if a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said W. F. Hawkins, whose debts shall respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, shall not, at the time and in manner in that behalf appointed and enacted by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, assent to or approve of these presents or execute the same, then these presents, and every clause, matter and thing herein contained shall cease and be void: Provided, lastly, and it is hereby declared and agreed, that these presents, and the paramount object, intent and meaning thereof, are and shall be deemed and taken to be for the equal benefit and advantage of all the creditors of the said W. F. Hawkins,* as well those who execute or assent to or approve of these presents as those who do not, and that all such creditors shall stand, as nearly as possible, upon an equal footing; and the generality of this proviso shall not be restricted by any clause, matter or thing hereinbefore appearing."

And the plaintiffs say that they did not make or assent to the said deed.

Rejoinder—That all conditions, matters and things provided and required by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, to be observed, performed and fulfilled, in order to render the said deed as valid and effectual and binding on all the creditors of the defendant as if they were parties to and had duly executed the same, were observed, performed and fulfilled, and the said deed had, before the commencement of this suit, become and was and still is as valid and effectual and binding on the plaintiffs as if they were parties to and had duly executed the same.

Demurrer to the rejoinder, and joinder in demurrer.

Cohen, in support of the demurrer.—There are three objections which render the deed invalid, and therefore not binding on the non-assenting creditors. First, the deed is not made between the debtor and all his creditors, but only between the debtor and the creditors whose names and seals are subscribed and affixed in the schedule thereunder written, and it recites that the debtor is indebted to those creditors in certain sums, in the schedule to the deed mentioned. Secondly, there is no proviso in the deed that it shall be void, if default be made in payment of the composition-money, and the release is made, not in consideration of the payment of the composition, but is expressly stated to be in consideration of the covenants by the debtor and the surety. Thirdly, the plea was pleaded at a time when the composition-money was not yet payable, and it does not and could not state that the composition had been paid or tendered; yet at the same time the plea is not pleaded by way of equitable defence. With regard to the last point, it is quite clear that the plea affords no legal defence unless it avers a payment of the composition or a tender of the money—Cumber v. Wane (1), Fessard v. Mugnier (2). In Clapham v.

(1) 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 245.

(2) Ante, C.P. 126.

Atkinson (3), the plea was pleaded by way of equitable defence. With regard to the second point, no doubt it will be contended on the other side that this is not an ordinary composition-deed; and that inasmuch as it contains no proviso that the deed shall be void in case of the non-payment of the composition, and as the release is expressly stated to be in consideration of the covenants by the debtor and surety, therefore it operates as an immediate unconditional release. It must be admitted that there is no reason why a creditor may not take as an accord and satisfaction a covenant by the debtor and a covenant by the surety; and it is conceded that it appears from the terms of the deed that the parties intended it should operate as an immediate and unconditional release, the creditors simply relying on the covenants by the debtor and surety. But still the question remains, whether it is reasonable to allow a majority of creditors to compel a minority to release and forfeit their debts absolutely, and to rely only on the covenants of the debtor and the surety. It may perhaps be said, that if the deed operates equally as to all the creditors, it is for the majority of creditors, and not for the Court, to determine whether it is reasonable. The main objection to the deed is the first. Now, this deed is so framed that the debts are absolutely released, and do not revive on non-payment of the composition, and it therefore follows, that the only remedy of the creditors who are parties to the deed is, by suing the debtor and surety on the deed itself. It is clearly established by the more recent cases, that a deed may be valid under section 192, though not made between a debtor and all his creditors, provided it clearly appears that it was intended to apply to all the creditors, and also that it gives the same or substantially the same remedies and advantages to all the creditors alike. This is stated to be the necessary condition of a valid composition-deed by the Lord Chancellor, in his judgment in Ex parte Cockburn (4); at page 19 he says, "To render a deed of composition and release binding on the minority of the creditors who have not executed or assented to or approved of it in writing, it is necessary that the non-assenting creditors should stand under the deed in the same situation and with the same advantages as the creditors forming the majority. The 192nd section enacts, that the creditors who have not assented are to be bound as if they were parties to and had duly executed the deed. It follows that the provisions of the deed must be such as will apply to all the creditors equally, and without distinction or difference." This deed does not give equal advantages and remedies to those who are parties and those who are not. What is the position of the creditors who are parties to the deed? Their debts are released whether or not the composition be paid; but if it be not paid, they can sue the debtor and surety on the deed, and both will be estopped from denying the existence and amount of those creditors' debts. What now is the position of those who are not parties to the deed? Why, in the event of the composition not being paid they could not sue at all.

[MARTIN, B.—The deed contains an absolute release, and a covenant by the debtor and sureties with "all the creditors who are or shall be bound" to pay the "aforesaid creditors" a composition of 10s. in the pound.]

No doubt the covenant is entered into with all the creditors, but the deed is made only with the creditors whose names are subscribed to the schedule to the deed, and not with "all the creditors." The non-assenting creditors are not parties to the deed, and they cannot sue; this follows from an old and well-established technical rule of law, that a person who is not a party to an indenture cannot possibly sue on a covenant contained in the deed, even though he has executed the deed, and the covenant be made expressly with him and no other person.

[MARTIN, B.—Is not the strict rule of law overridden by the special agreement between the parties? Is it not a rule which depends upon the construction of the deed? Is it so stringent that if it appears on the face of the instrument that it is the intention of the parties to it that the covenantees should sue, that they cannot do so?]

(3) 4 B. & S. 780; s. c. ante, Q.B. 49.

(4) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 17.

It is an inflexible rule of law that no one can sue upon an indenture except he be a person named as a party in the indenture, or included in a class named in it. It is not enough that a person should be a covenantor. This point was considered in Ex parte Cockburn (4); at p. 20 the Lord Chancellor says, "It appears from this statement of the deed that the creditors who have not executed the deed, and those who are not named in the schedule, are placed by the deed in a situation very inferior to that of the majority of the creditors. To the latter the composition is paid down in hand, whereas the former have to rely upon the covenant. But, further, it is clear that the creditors who are not named and described in the schedule and have not executed the deed could not sue upon the covenant of the debtor. The covenant is with the parties to the deed of the second and third parts, and as the deed is between parties, no person who is not a party could sue upon the covenant. This clearly follows from the settled principles of law which are illustrated by the cases cited in the argument." All the authorities on the point are collected in Addison on Contracts, p. 946, where the law is thus stated: "Whenever a deed was expressed to be made between certain persons named in the premises of the instrument or described therein as the contracting parties, those persons only and their privies claiming through them by blood, representation or otherwise, could take advantage of the deed by way of action. It mattered not that the deed was made for the exclusive benefit or use of other individuals named therein, and contained covenants with them for the performance of certain duties; if they had not been made parties to the contract they could not sue thereon, although they might have sealed and delivered the deed in common with those who were formally described as parties to the instruments." And the cases cited in the note to Gilby v. Copley (5), Berkeley v. Hardy (6), Lord Southampton v. Brown (7) and Metcalf v. Rycroft (8) support the text. It is also laid down in Com. Dig. tit. 'Fait' (D 2.), "So a party to a deed cannot covenant with one who is a stranger to the deed—Per Holt, Carth. 76." The distinction in this respect between an indenture and a deed-poll is pointed out in Gardner v. Lachlan (9). A party not named in a deed cannot recover by means of it, if it be a deed between parties. A deed-poll might be so constructed as to give a person a right of action against the party who executed it; but where there is a deed between parties, it is a settled rule that no person can bring an action on it except a party or those who claim through him. No doubt, if a certain class of persons be named as a party to a deed, any one comprised in that class is entitled to sue according to his interest, although he is not mentioned specially in the instrument—The Sunderland Marine Insurance Company v. Kearney (10). So in Davidson on Conveyancing, p. 101, it is stated, "Covenants in an indenture entered into with persons not parties confer no right of action on such persons (though an action may be maintained by a party to an indenture against one who is not a party, but executes the deed), except that if the covenant relate to hereditaments and be contained in an indenture made since the 1st of October 1845, such a covenant may be sued on by a person not a party." Here it is quite clear that the covenants do not relate to realty, and the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 4. does not apply. One argument, however, in favour of the plaintiffs may be drawn from the fact of legislative interference, and that is, that the rule of law was so stringent that it required a positive enactment to vary it. But it may be said that this rule of law is generally applicable to indentures, and does not apply to composition-deeds; that the non-assenting creditors are made parties to such deeds by virtue of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. But this is not so. Section 192. enacts, that the deed shall be as valid, effectual and binding on all the creditors "as if they were parties to and had executed the same"; it does not enact the converse proposition, that it shall be as valid, effectual and binding on the debtor, and shall give all creditors the same rights of action as if they had executed and were parties to the same. Ex parte Cockburn (4) and Benham v. Broadhurst (11) are expressly in point. In the latter case, Crompton, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, says, "The present deed, it will be observed, is made between the debtor and the executing creditors only, who take a covenant to themselves respectively and individually. There is no covenant by the debtor with the non-assenting creditors, or with any trustee for them, on which they or the trustee can sue. They have not, therefore, equal protection with the executing creditors, and the foundation of our judgment is, that here the non-assenting creditors have not an equal right to sue,—an equal right which is considered in effect an equivalent to so much property." The deed is not made between the debtor and all creditors who may assent, so that it cannot be said that by assenting they can make themselves parties to the deed and obtain the benefit of the covenant. Again, there is an essential difference between the position of creditors whose debts are admitted in the schedule and those creditors whose debts are not admitted. This was one of the points in Ex parte Cockburn (4), and the Lord Chancellor in his judgment (p. 20) says, "Again, the creditors whose names and debts are not set forth in the schedule are under a great disadvantage in this respect, namely, that there is no admission by the debtor of the debts due to them respectively. Even, therefore, if any one of such creditors could now come in and execute the deed and sue upon the covenant, he would be under the necessity of proving the fact and amount of his debt." The deed contains an absolute release, and there is no cessio bonorum, no relief in bankruptcy, no remitter to the old debt in case of the non-payment of the composition, but a mere right of suing on the deed; and it ought, therefore, to be perfectly manifest that one creditor has no advantage over the other creditors. Here the creditors who have executed the deed have the advantage of suing for their composition, and the existence and amounts of their debts are admitted in the schedule to the deed; the position of the two classes of creditors

Mellish (Raymond with him), for the defendant.—There is no dispute as to the general rule of law, that no person can bring an action on a deed who is not a party to it, but there may be different modes of applying the rule. If the intention of the parties to the deed be clear that some one else should be a party in addition to those named as parties in the commencement, the rule is not so irreversible that such other person should not be considered a party. Suppose the last clause of the deed had in terms expressly provided for this, could it then be said that the persons named in the commencement should alone be parties? No words could shew more clearly than those in the last clause of this deed that it was the intention of the actual parties that the other creditors should also be considered as parties. The general rule of construction, too, is, that the whole instrument shall be read together; not that the commencement shall govern all the rest. In Ex parte Cockburn (4), Lord Westbury seems to have thought that "creditor" was too general a description to make a man a party to a deed; but though the case has been cited frequently, it has never been acted on in a court of law. Stone v. Jellicoe (12) and Deuhurst v. Jones (13), where "creditors" was held to be a sufficient description, are in conflict with Ex parte Cockburn (4). All the cases cited on the other side come within the category of those where the question is, whether the agent or trustee is to sue. No case goes the length of saying that, where it is intended that other persons besides the actual parties are to have all the advantages of being parties, the mere circumstance of their not being mentioned in the commencement is to override the plainly expressed intention. Berkeley v. Hardy (6), per Holroyd, J., leaves the question open as to what is necessary to make a man a party. So Cook v. Child (14) and Metcalf v. Rycroft (8). In Spitzer v. Chaffers (15), which was a case decided on the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, Erle, C.J. said, "It is not necessary that all the creditors should sign the deed; if it were, section 224. of that act would be inoperative," and in Dingwell v. Edwards (16) the creditors are simply described as such, no particular mention of them being made in the schedule. Blackburn, J. there speaks of a deed which "does not expressly or by necessary inference include all" the creditors. Secondly, on the true construction of the 192nd section, the person who appears on the face of the deed to have been intended to be a party is a party by virtue of the statute. If he is to be "bound by" the deed, he is also to take advantage of it. The words of the section are "it shall be as valid and effectual," &c. as well as "it shall be binding," and this is equivalent to saying that the creditors shall be parties whether they execute or assent to the deed or not. As to the deed being bad because there is no provision for its becoming void on the failure of payment of the composition, the objection might avail if the agreement was that on payment it would be accepted in satisfaction; but that is not so, for there is an immediate release of the debtor from all claims, the remedies against the sureties being reserved, which is perfectly reasonable.

Cohen, in reply.—The argument on the other side as to intention would apply to every case of a deed unskilfully framed. Here the release is in consideration of the covenant, and there is no proviso that, if default be made in payment, the deed shall be void. In the other cases it does not matter whether the creditor can sue or not, because if the composition be not paid, the deed is void, and the creditor can sue for the original debt.

(He was then stopped by the Court.)

Cur. adv. vult.

MARTIN, B. now (May 3) delivered the judgment of Pollock, C.B. and himself.—The question in this cause is the now very common one, whether a composition-deed is effectual to bar a non-assenting creditor? An objection to it is taken upon the case Ex parte Cockburn (4), which seems to us to be fatal. Ex parte Cockburn (4) was twice argued, and two deliberate judgments were delivered by the Lord Chancellor upon it, and he lays down in the most plain and direct terms, "that a deed to bind creditors who have not assented must be one which places the creditors who do assent and the creditors who do not assent precisely upon an equal footing in point of law." The scope of the present deed is, that the creditors should release the debtor, and that in consideration thereof they should have covenants by the debtor and two sureties to pay a composition of 10s. in the pound by two instalments of 5s. each at future days, and unless the non-assenting creditors have secured to them these covenants and legal rights of action upon them, then according to the above rule they are not bound. Now, it is true that the words of the covenants themselves are such as to embrace not only the assenting creditors but the non-assenting ones; but a technical rule of law is invoked on behalf of the plaintiffs.

A technical rule is one which is established by authority and precedent, which does not depend upon reasoning or argument, but is a fixed, established rule, to be acted upon, and only discussed as regards its application; in truth, it is "the law." The alleged rule is, that where a deed is made inter partes, no one except parties properly so called can sue upon a covenant contained in it, and the contention on the part of the plaintiffs is, that the parties to this deed are such of the creditors as have executed or assented to or approved of it, and those only, and that non-assenting creditors are not parties, and inasmuch as they cannot maintain actions upon the covenants to pay the composition, which in truth is the only legal right created by the deed in lieu of the released debts, they are not upon an equal footing in point of law with the assenting creditors. The rule and distinction as to deeds inter partes and deeds not of that character is very old, and is to be found in the ancient legal authorities, but it is impossible to state or illustrate it more clearly than is done by Lord Tenterden in his book on Shipping, p. 170. This is part of the original text. The book has gone through, I believe, a dozen editions, several edited by Lord Tenterden himself, and the original passage is still continued. He states the rule to be a technical one, and thus illustrates it: "If a charter-party under seal is expressed to be made between certain parties, as between A. and B, owners of a ship whereof C. is master, of the one part, and D. and E. of the other part, and purports to contain covenants with C, nevertheless C. cannot bring an action in his own name upon the covenant, and this even although he sealed and delivered the instrument; but if the charter-party is not expressed to be made between parties, but is written thus, 'This charter-party indented witnesseth' it is otherwise." He adds, "This latter is the most proper form." In the case of Berkeley v. Hardy (6) the same rule is laid down, and in the judgment it is stated to be a long-established technical rule, and one believed to be peculiar to the law of England.

The deed now in question is made between the several persons whose names and seals are subscribed and affixed in the schedule, being creditors executing, assenting to or approving of these presents, of the first part; the defendant, the debtor, of the second part; and the two sureties of the third part. The parties, therefore, who alone can sue are the creditors executing or assenting to or approving of the deed; and inasmuch as the plaintiffs dissent from and disapprove of it, and seek to recover the entire debt of 20s. in the pound, they cannot sue; and if so, they are not upon an equal footing with the executing or assenting creditors, who can. It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, and during the argument I was inclined to think so, that the rule was one of construction only, and must yield to the plainly expressed intention of the covenants; but I am now satisfied this is not the true nature and character of the rule, and that it is one of positive law. It was also forcibly contended that the rule had no application to a deed whose operation was created, as regards the plaintiffs, not by their agreement to it, but by an act of parliament. I would have lent a willing mind to this argument had I not felt constrained by the case Ex parte Cockburn (4). But the Lord Chancellor there affirms the application of the rule to composition-deeds, and states that when a composition-deed is made inter partes, creditors not named or described cannot sue. He adds, the covenants are with the parties to the deed of the second and third parts, and as the deed is between parties, no person who is not a party can sue upon them. This (he adds) clearly follows from the settled principles of law. The objection, therefore, seems to me fatal, and if it is to be overruled, in my judgment, it must be overruled by a Court of error. I have read the report of the case of Benham v. Broadhurst (11), in error, and I think that the Court of Exchequer Chamber in their judgment, as delivered by my Brother Crompton, adopt this view. Speaking for myself, I very much regret our decision. It seems to me that the deed is a fair and reasonable one, and its object is only defeated by a technical objection.

BRAMWELL, B.—I concur in the judgment of the Court. My Lord and my Brother Martin say that Ex parte Cockburn (4) is in point. I accept their view of that case, and therefore I concur. They being of opinion that Ex parte Cockburn (4) is in point, it is not worth while that I should critically examine the judgment in that case. I concur also for another reason. I do not think it becoming in any Court to say of the judgment of another Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction that they must decline to accept it as an authority, which I should have to do, if I refused to be bound by the decision in Ex parte Cockburn (4).

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.)—Composition-Deed—Parties.

A composition-deed was made between certain persons, whose names were subscribed and seals affixed in the schedule thereunder written, on behalf of themselves and all and every other the creditors of the defendant of the first part, and the defendant of the second part, which, after reciting that the defendant was indebted to the said persons parties thereto of the first part in the several sums set opposite to their respective names in the said schedule thereunder written, and was also indebted to other persons in divers sums of money, and being unable to discharge his said debts in full, had agreed to pay a composition of 5s. in the pound, such payment or composition to be made and paid to all and every the creditors of the defendant, whether executing the deed or not, to be paid and payable on the 22nd of September 1865, and to be in full discharge of all and every the debts due and owing at the time of the executing of the said deed, provided that the said parties of the first part thereby did accept the said composition and release the debts:—Held, that the non-assenting creditors were not bound, as the release was absolute, and the deed did not provide any means by which these creditors could obtain their composition.

Declaration on a bill of exchange for 18l. 10s., drawn by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant; and also for goods sold and delivered, and goods bargained and sold, and for money due on accounts stated.

Plea.—That after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th of October 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons in divers sums of money, and thereupon and whilst he was so indebted a deed, bearing date the 22nd of September 1864, was made and entered into, by and between the several persons whose names were and are subscribed and seals affixed in the schedule thereunder written, being respectively, either individually or in co-partnership with others, creditors of the defendant, on behalf of themselves and all and every other the creditors of the defendant, of the first part, and the defendant of the second part, relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendant and his release therefrom; whereby,—after reciting that the defendant was indebted to the said several persons parties thereto of the first part, in the several sums of money set opposite to their respective names in the said schedule thereunder written, and was also indebted to other persons in divers sums of money, and being unable to discharge his said debts in full, had agreed to pay a composition of 5s.

in the pound; such payment or composition to be made and paid to all and every the creditors of the defendant, whether executing the said deed or not, to be paid and payable on the 22nd of September 1865, at the office of Mr. E. Lewis, 22, Great Marlborough Street, and to be in full discharge of all and every the debts of the defendant due and owing at the time of the executing of the said deed,—in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the payment by the defendant to his said several creditors of such composition as aforesaid, they, the said several persons parties thereto of the first part, for themselves and their several and respective partners, did thereby accept the said composition in full satisfaction and discharge of their respective debts, and did by the said indenture release and for ever quit claim unto the defendant, his heirs, executors and administrators, all and all manner of action and actions, suit and suits, debts and sums of money, accounts, costs, reckonings, agreements, judgments, extents, executors' claims and demands whatsoever which they, the said several persons parties thereto of the first part and their several and respective partners, then had or at any time theretofore had, against the defendant; and it was thereby, lastly, agreed and declared that the said indenture was intended to operate and should (so far as lawfully might be) operate as a deed of composition within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that so soon as a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, should have executed or in writing assented to the said indenture, it was intended that the same should be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy, under the 192nd section of the said act, in order that the defendant might obtain the protection of the Court as provided by the 198th section. That a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts respectively amounted to 10l. and upwards, did in writing assent to and approve of the said deed and execute the same, and the execution of the said deed by the defendant was attested by an attorney, and within twenty-eight days from the day of the execution of the said deed by the defendant the same was produced and left (having been first duly stamped) at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and was duly registered as aforesaid; and together with such deed there was delivered to the said Chief Registrar an affidavit by the defendant that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, had in writing assented to and approved of the said deed, and also stating (as the fact was) that no property or credits of the defendant were comprised in the said deed, and that the said deed did before the registration thereof bear such ordinary and ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf. That at the time of the execution of the said deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the claim herein pleaded to, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and had due notice of the said deed, and the plaintiff always could and might have executed the same and have had the benefit thereof as a creditor of the defendant, and still can and may do so; and all conditions having been performed and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became and was, and is, bound by the deed as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Gough, in support of the demurrer.—The deed is not binding on the non-assenting creditors. It contains no covenant to pay the composition, but an absolute release; and it does not place the creditors who assent and those who do not assent on the same footing.

[BRAMWELL, B.—Ex parte Cockburn (1) and Benham v. Broadhurst (2) are authorities that the deed is invalid to bind the non-assenting creditors.]

White Meadows, in support of the plea.—The deed provides that at a particular place and on a particular time a composition will be paid to all the creditors, those who execute and those who do not; it is, therefore, manifestly intended to operate for the benefit of all the creditors. Clapham v. Atkinson (3) decides that it is not necessary that all the creditors should be parties to the deed, if it gives them all the same rights and the same remedies.

[MARTIN, B.—This deed contains no covenant to pay the composition; how are the non-assenting creditors to get it?]

It is not necessary to the validity of the deed that it should contain a covenant to pay the composition. There was no such covenant in Clapham v. Atkinson (3). He referred to Garrod v. Simpson (4), Wells v. Hacon (5), Good v. Cheeseman (6) and Norman v. Thompson (7).

[BRAMWELL, B. referred to Evans v. Pouis (8).]

Gough, in reply, pointed out that the release was absolute, and that the plea contained no averment of tender, nor was the amount of composition paid into court.

MARTIN, B.—I think if a non-assenting creditor sued upon the deed, he would be met with a demurrer. I think this deed is bad, on the authority of The Chesterfield and Midland Silkstone Colliery Company v. Hawkins (9). It seems to me that the non-assenting creditor has no action upon this deed. It is very difficult to see what his rights are.

PICOTT, B.—It is difficult to see what rights the non-assenting creditors have under this deed, or how they can be enforced. Unless the debtor volunteered to pay 5*s.* in the pound, they would get nothing.

POLLOCK, C.B. and BRAMWELL, B. delivered no judgment.

 April 21. } BURBIDGE v. MORRIS.

Joint-Stock Company—Projected Company—Liability of Director—Preliminary Expenses.

The defendant authorized his name to be inserted as a director in the prospectus of a joint-stock company, limited. The prospectus was sent to the defendant, who suggested alterations in it. The secretary gave orders to the plaintiff to advertise the prospectus, which was done at an expense of 236l. The company was never registered:—Held, in an action by the plaintiff against the defendant, to recover the expenses of the advertisements, that the defendant, by consenting to act as a director, had not authorized the secretary of the company to pledge his credit, and that he was not liable to the plaintiff.

Declaration for work done and materials provided, and for money paid for the defendant, and money due on accounts stated. The defendant pleaded, except as to 2l. 16s. never indebted, and payment of that sum into court. The plaintiff accepted the money paid into court, and joined issue on the first plea.

The cause was tried, at the London Sitings after last Hilary Term, before Martin, B. and a special jury. The action was brought to recover the sum of 236l. 4s. for advertising a prospectus of the Trelech Lead Mining Company, Limited. It appeared from the plaintiff's evidence, that he was an advertising agent, and that the defendant was a solicitor carrying on business at Carmarthen. That about the month of April 1864, one Reid was the promoter of a company called the Trelech Lead Mining Company, Limited. That a person named Greenhill was appointed secretary, and that John Lewis and the defendant had authorized Sanders, the captain of the mine, to put down their names as directors, and Greenhill had done so on Sanders's authority. That Greenhill sent for the plaintiff and asked him to advertise the company, and at the same time shewing him a prospectus. Plaintiff inquired whether all the directors named in it had consented to act, and was assured by Greenhill that they had. The plaintiff, however, stated to Greenhill that as the directors were all strangers to him, and the cost of advertising might be considerable, he should like to have, as it was his invariable custom, some one to look to directly for the amount of his account, as the directors might repudiate their liability: thereupon Reid said he would be personally responsible, and gave the plaintiff a letter to that effect. That Greenhill, as the secretary, from time to time gave orders for advertising the company, and the plaintiff caused the advertisement to be inserted as directed.

On the 9th of April, Greenhill, the secretary, wrote to the defendant as follows—
 "By book-post I send you, as requested by Capt. Sanders, of the Trelech mines, two prospectuses, in which you will perceive your name appears as one of the directors of the new company. A meeting of the directors will shortly be called at the above address, at which your presence would be very desirable if you can possibly make it convenient to attend. Yours, &c.

"J. R. Greenhill."

To which the defendant replied as follows—

"Carmarthen, April 11, 1864.

"Trelech Mining Company, Limited.

"Sir—You have inserted my name as one of the directors as L. E. W. Morris. You must get this altered, as no one knows me in this county otherwise than by the name of Lewis Morris, you had therefore better alter it immediately. You had also better describe Mr. John Lewis as timber-merchant, as he is best known by that description. You had better insert the advertisement in the Welshman newspaper, published in this town, immediately, as they will make favourable mention of the company when they see Mr. Lewis's and my name. I am &c.

"Lewis Morris."

It was also proved that the defendant had acted as, and had once attended at a meeting of, directors in London.

The projected company was not successful, as a sufficient number of shares were not subscribed for, and it was never registered.

Reid became a bankrupt, and Greenhill being unable to pay the amount of the plaintiff's bill, he brought this action against the defendant.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the learned Judge was of opinion that there was no evidence that the defendant authorized Greenhill to pledge his credit, nor was there any evidence of the defendant's liability. He therefore directed a nonsuit to be entered.

H. Giffard moved for a rule to set aside the nonsuit, and for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—He contended that the defendant's letter of the 11th of April to Greenhill was a positive authority from the defendant to hold him out as a director, and to render him liable for such things as were necessary to the formation of the company. He cited Maddick v. Marshall (1).

[MARTIN, B.—Some years ago the evidence given at the trial would have been sufficient to make the defendant liable. It was formerly held that any evidence that the provisional director knew that his name was published as one of the committee, or that he had attended meetings, was sufficient to render him liable for preliminary expenses, but the House of Lords (2) have decided the contrary.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think that there ought to be no rule. There are certain questions which I think ought always to be left to the jury, but the present case involved a question of law, and was for the Judge. The defendant was not a director, but he was to become a director when the company was established. The case Mr. Giffard relied on was very different from the present: there the directors by a resolution ordered the company to be advertised. There is no such evidence in this case. I think my Brother Martin was quite right in directing a nonsuit.

BRAMWELL, B.—I also think that my Brother Martin was right, and that the rule should be refused. I confess I think it is right, in actions like this, that the plaintiff should not recover, because the difficulty as to who should be liable is easily removed by the plaintiff taking the trouble to inquire who were the persons who intended to pledge their credit and become responsible. It is a strange thing that men will not make such inquiries beforehand. I am told by men of business, that if they put too many questions on taking an order, they would not do any business. Well, I say then, do not do any business. I have not the least doubt in the world that the defendant never had the slightest intention of pledging his credit, and that he never intended to say to anybody, "You may advertise the company upon my responsibility. Employ this man." And yet it is said there is sufficient evidence to render him liable. In my judgment there is not. The case cited by Mr. Giffard is very different from the present. In that case the defendant was held to be liable because there was an order of the board of directors to advertise the company, and when the plaintiff asked the secretary whether he had such an order from the directors, he could truly answer, Yes, he had; and he shewed the plaintiff the authority. But in the present case the facts are these: Somebody in London is getting up a company; somebody is doing everything that is necessary for the purpose of forwarding the object of the promoters; somebody, perhaps the secretary or the solicitor who expected to make some profit out of the undertaking, asks the defendant if he will be a director; the defendant assents, he takes no share in getting up the company, no part in advertising it; but when the prospectus is sent to him he writes to the secretary, "Get my name altered," I am better known as Lewis Morris, "you had better insert an advertisement in the Welshman." To my mind that is not any evidence that he intended the secretary to pledge his credit. I think the whole tenor of the letter is one of wonder and surprise at the mode in which the prospectus was drawn up, and this shews that the persons who ordered the advertisement were acting without the defendant's knowledge or authority.

PIGOTT, B.—I also think that the nonsuit was quite right. The evidence certainly shews the getting up of the company, and shews that the company was to be incorporated, and that the defendant intended to be a director; and it also shews that the defendant knew that the proposed company was being advertised, and that after the advertisements were inserted he made some suggestions respecting them to the secretary; but to my mind there is not a tittle of evidence to shew that he intended to pledge his credit or that he believed that his credit was being pledged, nor has he done anything which could authorize the secretary to pledge his credit to the plaintiff.

MARTIN, B.—The truth is, this question has been concluded, I may say, fifteen years ago. The point has been decided by the House of Lords. In the present case, a company was projected and the defendant was in the position of what was formerly called a "provisional director." He was to be a director if the scheme succeeded and the company was registered. The point as to whether under such circumstances the defendant is liable for preliminary expenses has been decided over and over again. It was decided very recently in the Exchequer Chamber, and some years ago in the House of Lords. It is quite clear that in this case there is no evidence that the defendant ever gave any one any authority to pledge his credit. Then, there is a letter written by the defendant to the secretary; the question is, is that letter any evidence to go to the jury that the defendant meant to pledge his credit for the advertisements? It is not the slightest evidence. It amounts to nothing more than the defendant saying, "You have put down my name wrong, alter it; put it down right, and I will not object to your inserting the advertisement in the Welshman." That letter was not written to the plaintiff; it was never communicated to him. I see nothing in that letter authorizing the secretary to pledge the defendant's credit. It was not written with that intention. The hardship on the plaintiff is apparent rather than real. There is no ground for the claim, and therefore the nonsuit was right.

Rule refused.

1865. } THE UNION BANK OF MAN-
May 1. } CHESTER (LIMITED) v. BEECH.

Guarantie — Principal and Surety; Discharge of, by Release of the Principal Debtor.

The defendant covenanted with the plaintiffs that, in consideration that the plaintiffs would give credit to one Taylor, he would be surety to the extent of 100l. for any sum which might from time to time be owing by Taylor. The deed provided that no indulgence, time, credit or forbearance given or shewn to, or security taken from, or composition with Taylor, should be any discharge of any liability under the deed, or should release the defendant from observing the provisions thereof. Taylor entered into a deed of composition with his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which contained an unconditional release, which the plaintiffs executed.—Held, on the authority of Cowper v. Smith (1), that the composition-deed was no defence to the plaintiffs' claim for 100l., as by the terms of the guarantee the surety was not discharged by the release of the principal debtor.

The declaration stated that, by deed, made on the 9th of July 1863,—after reciting that one T. Taylor had opened a current account with the Union Bank of Manchester (Limited), and had been and was accommodated by, and was then indebted and under liabilities to the said bank, and that he might have occasion from time to time thereafter to overdraw his account with the said bank, and to be accommodated by the said bank in any of the other modes in which bankers are in the habit of accommodating their customers, and the said T. Taylor, either alone or together with some other person or persons, might thereby or from some other cause, be from time to time indebted to the said bank, and that the defendant had, at the request of the said T. Taylor and for the satisfaction of the said bank, agreed to enter into the covenants thereafter contained,—the defendant did covenant and agree with the said bank, their successors and assigns, that he would on demand by the said bank, or by one of the attornies of the said bank, or by the manager, sub-manager or any director of the said bank for the time being, well and truly pay, or cause to be paid to the said bank, all and every such sum and sums of money as shall at any time thereafter for the time being be due to the said bank from the said T. Taylor, his executors or administrators, either separately or jointly with any person or persons, on the balance of account for money paid, lent or advanced by the said bank unto or for the use, or at the request of the said T. Taylor, his executors or administrators, either separately or jointly with any other person or persons, or upon or in respect of any bills of exchange or promissory notes drawn or accepted, indorsed or negotiated by the said T. Taylor, or which he, his executors or administrators, either separately or jointly with any other person or persons, might be liable to pay, together with discount, interest, postage of letters, common and other charges, and according to the usage and course of business, or upon any other account whatsoever. And it was by the said deed provided that not more than the sum of 100*l.* should be recoverable or receivable under or by virtue of the said deed, but that the said deed should be a continuing security to the amount of 100*l.* for the sum of money which for the time being shall be owing as aforesaid to the said bank, notwithstanding any settlements of accounts or discharge of the subsisting balance due at any time to the said bank, or any other matter or thing whatsoever; and it was by the said deed provided and declared that no indulgence, time, credits or forbearance given or shewn to or security taken from, or agreement to give, or shew indulgence, time or forbearance to or composition with the principal debtor or debtors, whose debt or debts might be for the time being secured by the said deed, should be any discharge of the debts or of any liability under or by virtue of the said deed, or otherwise howsoever, or should release him from observing or performing the conditions and provisions therein contained, notwithstanding that the defendant, either separately or jointly with any other person or persons, might not be privy to, or might refuse consent, or might object to, or protest against the giving or shewing such indulgence, time, credit or forbearance, or the making of such agreement or composition; and the said bank might in all respects deal with the principal debtor or debtors for the time being, his or their executors, administrators and assigns, at their discretion, without discharging any such liability as last aforesaid, or releasing the defendant from observing or performing the conditions and provisions therein contained or any of them. That after the making of the said deed there became and was due and owing from the said T. Taylor to the plaintiffs, on such balance of account as aforesaid, a large sum of money, exceeding the sum of 100*l.*; that such demand as is by the said deed provided, was made upon the defendant, and that all things had been done and had happened and existed, and all times had elapsed, and all conditions had been fulfilled, necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to be paid by the defendant the sum of 100*l.*, yet the defendant had not paid the same.

Plea—That after the accruing due by the said T. Taylor to the plaintiffs of the said balance in the declaration mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, the plaintiffs, by deed, released the said T. Taylor from the said balance, and all claims and demands in respect thereof.

Replication—That the deed in the plea mentioned was a deed of arrangement for the benefit of creditors, and was an indenture, made the 27th day of July 1864, between T. Taylor, thereafter called the said debtor, of the first part, and J. G. T. Child, of &c., thereafter called the said trustee on behalf of the creditors of the debtor, of the second part, and the creditors of the said debtor, hereinafter called the said creditors of the third part. That after reciting that the said debtor was indebted to his creditors in several sums of money which he was unable fully to discharge, and had therefore agreed to execute the conveyance and assignment thereafter contained, the deed witnessed that the debtor granted and assigned to the trustee all his real, leasehold and personal estate, and all other property, to sell and dispose of the same, and to stand possessed of the money which should arise and be received under the deed, in trust to apply and administer the same for the benefit of the said creditors in like manner as if the debtor had been duly adjudged a bankrupt. And the deed further witnessed, that in consideration of the conveyance and assignment hereinbefore contained, the said creditors did release and for ever discharge the said debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators, from all and singular the debts, sums of money, bonds, bills, notes, accounts, reckonings, costs, charges, damages, expenses, judgments, executions, actions, suits, claims and demands whatsoever, either at law or in equity, which they the said creditors respectively now have or hath, or shall or may or otherwise could or might hereafter have, claim, challenge, or demand of, from or against the said debtor, his heirs, executors or administrators, or his or their lands or tenements, goods or chattels, estate or effects, or any of them, for or by reason or on account of debts, claims, or demands of them the said creditors, or any of them, now due or owing from the said debtor, and all interest and arrears of interest for or in respect of the same several debts, claims and demands, or any of them, or for or by reason of any other matter or thing whatsoever relating thereto. And the plaintiffs say that they did not release the said T. Taylor otherwise than by executing the said deed.

Harington, in support of the demurrer, admitted that, at first sight, Couper v. Smith (1) was in point, but he contended that it might be distinguished on the ground that, in the present case, the guarantie related to an account current which was constantly varying in amount, whereas in the former case the debt was an ascertained sum.

Cleasby (R. G. Williams with him) was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The case, which has been very properly mentioned to the Court by Mr. Harington, is an express authority that the release of the principal is no discharge of the surety, where the surety has expressly contracted that he shall continue liable. The only question is, whether there is any distinction between that case and the present. I think there is none.

BRAMWELL, B.—I do not see what distinction there is between the present case and Couper v. Smith (1). The only distinction pointed out is, that in that case there was a guarantie for a fixed sum for goods sold and delivered; here there was a guarantie for a current account. I cannot see that that makes any difference. The question is one of contract; the surety is not affected by what took place between the principal and his creditors; he has expressly contracted that his liability shall continue.

Injunction—Action for Nuisance—Costs
—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854
(17 & 18 Vict. c. 125.)—Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126).

Where the plaintiff in an action for a nuisance, under section 82. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, obtained an order for an injunction, ex parte, which was silent as to costs, and the writ issued to restrain the nuisance, and also, under section 32. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, for the payment of the costs,—Held, that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to proceed to recover the costs of the injunction before the trial.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why all further proceedings on a writ of injunction, issued under an order of Pigott, B., made on an ex parte application, should not be stayed until after the trial of the cause.

The facts appeared to be that the plaintiff brought the action for a nuisance occasioned by the defendant boiling horse-flesh for dogs near the plaintiff's dwelling-house. Immediately after the declaration was delivered the plaintiff applied to the learned Judge at chambers for an injunction under section 82. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), which enacts, "that it shall be lawful for the plaintiff at any time after the commencement of the action, and whether before or after judgment, to apply ex parte to a Court or a Judge for a writ of injunction to restrain the defendant from the repetition or continuance of the wrongful act complained of, . . . and such writ may be granted or denied by the Court or Judge upon such terms as to the duration of the writ, keeping an account, giving security, or otherwise, as to such Court or Judge shall seem reasonable and just. . . . Provided always, that any order for a writ of injunction made by a Judge, or any writ issued by virtue thereof, may be discharged or varied or set aside by the Court on application made thereto by any party dissatisfied with such order." The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), by section 32, enacts, that in all cases in which a writ of mandamus or injunction is issued under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, such writ shall, unless otherwise ordered by the Court or a Judge, in addition to the matter directed to be inserted therein, command the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the costs of preparing, issuing and serving such writ, and payment of such costs may be enforced in the same manner as costs payable under a rule of Court are now by law enforceable.

The learned Judge in making the order for an injunction neither imposed terms nor mentioned costs. A writ of injunction was thereupon issued and served upon the defendant, which commanded him to pay the costs in conformity with the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860.

Notice of trial was given for Shrewsbury Assizes, but the plaintiff countermanded it. Two days after the notice of countermand the defendant took out a summons before Erle, C.J., calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the order and writ of injunction should not be set aside. That learned Judge, doubting whether he had power to entertain the application, ordered that all further proceedings should be stayed until after the first four days of Easter Term.

The Court having granted a rule nisi, Staveley Hill now shewed cause.—The plaintiff's affidavits shew that there is a most unbearable nuisance, and this appears to be admitted by the affidavits on the other side. The form of the rule is unusual, and if made absolute its effect will be to set aside the injunction.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The defendant complains of the delay. How long is the injunction to be in force? Why did not the plaintiff try the cause?]

The delay is explained by the affidavits to have arisen from the illness of a surgeon, who was a material witness.

Underhill, in support of the rule.—The defendant merely wished to suspend the operation of the injunction until after it shall have been ascertained by a verdict whether a nuisance did exist.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Assume that a nuisance does exist, if this rule be made absolute the defendant may recommence the nuisance.]

The object of the present application substantially is to obtain relief from the payment of costs. If the jury find a verdict for the defendant, although he will be successful in the action, yet he will have been restrained from carrying on his business and made to pay the costs of an injunction to which the plaintiff was not entitled. The rule may be so moulded as not to allow the nuisance to be resumed, but to leave the costs in abeyance until the cause has been tried.

Per Curiam (1).—It would certainly be a hardship on the defendant to compel him to pay these costs, when perhaps the jury may find a verdict in his favour. The rule may be made absolute in the terms suggested by Mr. Underhill.

Rule absolute to stay all further proceedings in respect of the costs of the writ of injunction, until after the cause has been tried.

Landlord and Tenant—Expiration of Lease—Holding over—Tenancy from Year to Year.

Where a tenant is allowed to hold over after the expiration of his lease, it is a question of fact for the jury on what terms he continues to hold.

Where a tenant for life granted a lease, containing (among others) a covenant that the lessor should, at the expiration of the term, pay and allow for all fruit-trees upon the premises planted by the lessee at a fair valuation, and at the expiration of the term the lessee held over as tenant from year to year, and on the death of the tenant for life the tenant from year to year continued the occupation of the land, paying the same rent to the remainderman, the latter being ignorant of the existence of the covenant,—Held, that the receipt of rent by the remainderman, under the circumstances, was no evidence of a holding over under the terms of the lease.

This action was brought, by the plaintiff, as administrator of the estate and effects of Henry Oakley, who died intestate.

The plaintiff declared—For that the defendant demised to the said Henry Oakley, and the said Henry Oakley became and was tenant to the defendant, of a close of land of the defendant, upon the terms, amongst others, that the defendant should, at the determination of the said tenancy, pay and allow the said Henry Oakley, his executors or administrators, for all fruit-trees and shrubs then growing and being in or upon the said demised premises which should have been planted by the said Henry Oakley, his executors or administrators, at a fair valuation, to be made by two indifferent persons, one to be chosen by each party, and, in case of their disagreement, by a third person, to be chosen by them jointly, whose decision should be conclusive and binding upon each of the said parties; and that the said tenancy was duly determined after the death of the said Henry Oakley, and at the time of the said determination of the said tenancy there were certain fruit-trees and shrubs growing and being in and upon the said demised premises, which had been planted by the said Henry Oakley in his lifetime, and by the plaintiff, as administrator as aforesaid, since his death, and every condition has been performed, and everything has happened and occurred to enable the plaintiff to bring this action; yet the defendant did not pay and allow, and has not paid and allowed the plaintiff, as administrator as aforesaid, for the said fruit-trees and shrubs, at such valuation as aforesaid, but has wholly refused so to do.

And, also, for that the defendant demised to the said Henry Oakley, and the said Henry Oakley became and was tenant to the defendant of the said close in the first count mentioned, upon the said terms, amongst others, in that count mentioned, and that the said tenancy was duly determined after the death of the said H. Oakley; and at the time of the said determination of the said tenancy there were certain fruit-trees and shrubs of great value growing and being in and upon the said demised premises, which had been planted by the said Henry Oakley in his lifetime, and by the plaintiff, as administrator, since his death; and every condition has been performed, and everything has happened and occurred, to enable the plaintiff to bring this action, and the plaintiff has been always ready and willing to choose on his part an indifferent person to make a fair valuation of the said fruit-trees and shrubs, and requested the defendant to appoint on her part an indifferent person to make such valuation, and to ascertain the value of the said fruit-trees and shrubs, according to the terms of the said tenancy, and a reasonable time for the defendant so to do had elapsed before the commencement of this suit; and yet the defendant did not nor would appoint such indifferent person on his part as aforesaid, and has always wholly refused so to do, whereby, and by reason of the premises, the plaintiff, as administrator as aforesaid, has been prevented from ascertaining the fair valuation of the said fruit-trees and shrubs, and has incurred great costs and expenses in seeking to enforce the said terms of the said tenancy in that behalf, and hath been otherwise injured.

The defendant pleaded that she did not demise to the said Henry Oakley the said close upon the terms alleged.

This cause came on for trial, before Crompton, J., at Cambridge, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, subject to the opinion of the Court on the following

CASE.

(1) In the year 1826 one W. Stephens the younger was, under the will of one Richard Stephens, tenant for life of the locus in quo, with remainder to his eldest son and other issue in fee tail; and in default of such issue, to the defendant for life, with certain remainders over.

W. Stephens the younger had a power to lease the locus in quo, under the following clause in the said will:

"I do hereby further declare that it shall be lawful for any person who, by virtue of this my will, shall be tenant for life in possession of the hereditaments and premises lastly hereinbefore devised or entitled to the rents and profits thereof, and who shall have attained his or her age of twenty-one years, to demise or lease the hereditaments and premises lastly hereinbefore devised, or any part or parts thereof, to any person or persons whomsoever for any terms of years, not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, and not in reversion, at the best yearly rent that can be reasonably had for the same, without taking any fine or foregift for the making thereof, and so that there be contained in every such lease a condition of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved, and so that the lessee or lessees execute a counterpart thereof, and thereby covenant for the payment of the rent."

W. Stephens the elder had no interest in the locus in quo, and died in the year 1829.

(2) By a lease, dated the 9th of December 1826, W. Stephens the elder and W. Stephens the younger jointly demised unto the said H. Oakley the locus in quo for the term of twenty-one years, at a yearly rent of 14*l.* 14*s.* In this lease is contained the following clause: "And also that they the said lessors, their heirs or assigns, or their or his incoming tenant, shall and will at the expiration, or other sooner determination of the said term of twenty-one years, pay and allow the said H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, for all fruit-trees and shrubs then growing and being in or upon the said demised premises, which shall have been planted by the said (1) H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, at a fair valuation, to be made by two indifferent persons, one to be chosen by each party, and, in case of their disagreement, by a third person, to be chosen by them jointly, whose decision shall be conclusive and binding upon each of the said parties.

4. The said lease expired at Michaelmas, 1847. Upon the expiration of the lease the said H. Oakley applied to the said W. Stephens the younger for a fresh lease of the locus in quo, on the same terms as before. The said W. Stephens the younger said, "There is no occasion for another lease, you can go on from year to year;" nothing further was said about terms. A piece of land was at that time added, and the rent altered from 11*l.* to 13*l.*, which last sum continued to be paid yearly until Michaelmas, 1850, when the piece of land which had been added was taken from the holding and sold by the said W. Stephens the younger to a waterworks company. The subsequent payment of rent was at the rate of 11*l.* a year.

5. The said W. Stephens the younger died in April 1856, without issue, and when the limitation to the defendant Mrs. Monck for life enured, nothing passed between the said H. Oakley and the defendant as to the terms on which the occupation was to continue; but he paid the rent to the defendant at the rate of 11*l.* a year ending each Michaelmas.

6. The said H. Oakley died intestate in the year 1859, when the plaintiff took out letters of administration to his estate and effects. Nothing was said between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the terms of occupation; but the plaintiff likewise

(1) During the argument it was agreed that the case should be amended by stating that H. Oakley and the plaintiff were nurserymen, and that the trees had been planted by them in the way of their trade as nurserymen.

paid rent to the defendant at the rate of 11*l.* a year ending each Michaelmas.

7. In March 1862 the defendant gave to the plaintiff a notice to quit at the ensuing Michaelmas. As the defendant did not require the locus in quo till the spring of 1863, the plaintiff was allowed to continue in possession after Michaelmas 1862 and during the ensuing winter.

8. In February 1863 the plaintiff called the attention of J. B. Monck, the son of the defendant, to the clause set out in the lease of 1826. Until then neither the defendant nor her son was aware of the existence of such clause.

9. On the 24th of February 1863 the defendant received the following notice, signed by the plaintiff and W. H. Lawrence: "Whereas, by indenture of lease, dated the 9th of September 1826, and expressed to be made between W. Stephens the elder, therein described as of Padworth, in the county of Berks, common brewer, and W. Stephens the younger, therein described as of Reading, common brewer, of the one part, both now deceased, and H. Oakley, therein also described as of Reading aforesaid, gardener, also now deceased, of the other part, a certain piece of ground in the parish of St. Mary, in Reading, containing by admeasurement 2*a.* 3*r.* 8*p.*, more or less, bounded as in the said indenture particularly mentioned, and now known as the Brunswick Nursery, in Reading aforesaid, and now in my occupation, was, with the appurtenances, except as therein is excepted, demised unto the said H. Oakley, his executors, administrators and assigns, from the 29th of September then instant, for the term of twenty-one years thence next ensuing, determinable nevertheless, as is therein mentioned, at the rent therein reserved; and in the said indenture is contained, among other matters and things, a covenant on the part of the said H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, with the said W. Stephens the elder and W. Stephens the younger, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, that they the said W. Stephens the elder and W. Stephens the younger, their heirs or assigns, should have the option or privilege of purchasing all erections and buildings, or any of them, which, at the expiration or other sooner determination of the said term, should stand or be upon the said demised premises, and which should have been put up by and at the expense of the said H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, at a fair valuation, to be made in manner therein mentioned, upon giving to the said H. Oakley notice in writing of their or his wish so to do, two calendar months before the expiration or other sooner determination of the said term; and if no such notice should be given, the said H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, shall be at liberty, and he and they were thereby empowered, to take down and remove such erections and buildings for his or their own use and benefit; and also a covenant on the part of the said W. Stephens the elder and W. Stephens the younger, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with the said H. Oakley, his executors and administrators, that they, the lessors, their heirs or assigns, or their or his incoming tenant, should at the expiration or other sooner determination of the said term, pay and allow the said H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, for all fruit-trees and shrubs then growing and being in or upon the said demised premises, which should have been planted by the said H. Oakley, his executors or administrators, at a fair valuation to be made by two indifferent persons, one to be chosen by each party, and in case of their disagreement by a third person, to be chosen by them jointly, whose decision should be conclusive and binding upon each of the said parties; and whereas the said premises were held by the said H. Oakley up to the time of his death as yearly tenant, but upon the same terms and conditions as were contained in the said lease; and at the death of the said H. Oakley, I took the said premises as his administrator upon the like conditions, and the same are now held by me, the undersigned W. Oakley, as administrator of the said H. Oakley, as yearly tenant, but subject to the same provisos, covenants and agreements reserved and contained by and in the said indenture of lease; and the goods and effects now being upon the said premises belonging to me are subject to a bill of sale given by him to W. H. Lawrence, of Green Street, in the borough of Cambridge, attorney's clerk, and dated the 19th of July 1860 and filed the 20th of the same month; now I, the said W. Oakley, on behalf of myself and by the direction of the said W. H. Lawrence, do hereby give you notice that, under and by virtue of the said covenants, I claim compensation for the fruit-trees, shrubs, and other things now being in or upon the said premises, the amount of such compensation to be ascertained by a valuation of the same as aforesaid; and pursuant to the covenant contained in the said lease, I have, with the concurrence of the said W. H. Lawrence testified by his signing this notice, appointed Stephen Hunt, of Woolhampton, in the county of Berks, nurseryman, as the valuer on my behalf to make the valuation of the effects now being upon the said premises under the covenants hereinbefore referred to; and I hereby require you forthwith, upon the service upon you or some or one of you of this notice, to appoint some person to be the valuer on your behalf, in accordance with the terms of the covenants hereinbefore referred to, to make such valuation jointly with the said Stephen Hunt; and I hereby give you further notice that, unless you forthwith upon the service of this notice on you or some or one of you, nominate some person on your behalf to concur with the said Stephen Hunt in making such valuation as aforesaid, I shall take such steps as may be necessary to complete the said arbitration and valuation, as witness," &c.

10. The defendant did not appoint a valuer, and the plaintiff in the month of March 1863 appointed two persons to the office, who valued the stock submitted to their notice at a particular sum. The whole of the stock so submitted to valuation had been planted by the said H. Oakley or by the plaintiff during their respective occupations as aforesaid.

11. In the month of August 1863 the plaintiff was ejected by county court process from the locus in quo.

12. In the month of October 1863 the stock on the locus in quo was sold by auction by the direction of the defendant and realized at the sale 175*l.* 15*s.*, less 22*l.* 9*s.* for auctioneer's expenses. The balance still remains in the hands of the auctioneers.

13. It is agreed between the parties that a copy of the lease of 1826 shall form a part of this special case. Also, that the Court shall be at liberty to draw any inference of fact, or find any facts which in the opinion of the Court a jury ought to have drawn or found. The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, amongst the terms of the tenancy determined by the said notice to quit, was engrafted the covenant in the lease of 1826, or a term to the same effect, obliging the defendant to take the stock in the locus in quo at a valuation. If the Court shall be of opinion that such a term did attach to the tenancy between the plaintiff and the defendant, then the said verdict shall be affirmed, and the Court shall say on what principle the damages shall be assessed, the amount of damages to be settled out of court. But if the Court shall be of opinion that no such term did attach to the tenancy between the plaintiff and the defendant, then the verdict shall be entered for the defendant.

O'Malley (Markby with him), for the plaintiff, contended that the tenant by holding over after the determination of his lease, and continuing a tenant from year to year, held over subject to all the terms of the lease, so far as they were consistent with a tenancy from year to year; and that the payment of rent to the remainderman and his acceptance of it shewed that it was the clear intention of the parties that the relation of landlord and tenant should continue on the terms of the lease. He cited Roe v. Ward (2) and Wardall v. Usher (3). He also contended that the fact that the remainderman was ignorant of the terms of the lease was immaterial, that he was bound to know his own title, and that he could not be permitted to avail himself of his ignorance to the prejudice of the defendant, and to say that because he did not examine his own title. He cited Doe d. Martin v. Watts (4).

Keane (Douglas Brown with him) contended that the question was one of fact for a jury, and that the Court, having power to draw inferences from the facts, were in the position of a jury—Hyatt v. Griffiths (5); that it was absurd to suppose that the remainderman, who was only tenant for life, ever intended that the tenancy should continue upon terms most onerous to herself; that no jury would ever find that because the defendant, the tenant for life, received rent from the plaintiff without any notice of the terms under which he held, the defendant was bound to buy whatever trees the plaintiff might leave, the defendant having no option in the matter. He cited Doe d. Prudeauz (6).

O'Malley, in reply, referred to Walker v. Godé (7).

POLLOCK, C.B.—We have already intimated that we are all of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendant. It was established by Walker v. Godé (6) that the question is one of fact for the jury. In that case my Brother Martin differed from my Brother Bramwell and from Sir James Wilde, who at that time was a member of this Court. The difference of opinion arose upon the very same point. In that case I observe my Brother Martin said, "I regret the difference of opinion which exists, because I feel the judgment of the majority of the Court will create a new source of litigation in very many cases, and a question for a jury, which would frequently be a temptation rather to decide upon feeling and prejudice than on reason and truth, a matter always to be regretted, and, if possible, avoided." I agree with my Brother Martin that as much as possible we ought to keep certain questions entirely within the province of the Court, and not leave them to the jury. As, for instance, the question of reasonable and probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution is a question which had better always be kept in the hands of the Court, though I am aware that a great authority, Lord Denman, always maintained it was a question for a jury, and that he adhered to that opinion notwithstanding the known opinions of every other member of the Bench. At the same time, it cannot be denied that the jury do frequently decide that which the Court cannot decide so well, and that their findings are highly beneficial. But on the present occasion what we have to decide is a question of fact, and we ought not, I think, to find that a tenant for life coming into possession ought to be bound by the covenants of his predecessor merely because he has received rent; there ought to be more than that; there ought to be some evidence that the person in remainder whom it is proposed to bind by the covenants had some knowledge of their existence. I need not repeat that I think a great hardship would arise if we held that a tenant for life by coming into possession and receiving rent, amounting it may be only to a few pence or a few shillings, is thereby rendered liable to pay more than 100*l.* for that which is no benefit to her at all. I think we ought to decide, viewing it as a question of fact to be found by us, that unless there were more evidence of assent on her part than in the present case, she is not bound by the covenants; not being bound by the covenants, the plaintiff, who sues upon the covenants, is not entitled to recover, and the defendant is entitled to judgment.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. In this case, it seems to me upon the state of facts that the plaintiff, or his intestate, being nurserymen, might have removed the trees in question. They were trade fixtures, and as such might be removed, and so they might have been if the lease had been granted without the clause in question. It may be that as the lessor has thought fit to enter into such an agreement, the annual tenancy between him and the nurseryman was continued upon the same terms. However, we need not trouble ourselves to consider whether he would have been liable to such a covenant as this. It may be assumed, even after the commencement of the annual tenancy, that the original lessor would have been liable to pay for these trees according to his covenant. Then arises the title of Mrs. Monck, the defendant. She does not claim under the lessor, but she is tenant for life, under the will of the testator, and therefore not bound by any of the lessor's agreements not made in pursuance of the power. It is said that the occupation goes on, the payment of rent goes on; and that is all we know about it, except that as a matter of fact she did not know of the stipulation of the first tenant for life, and therefore did not intend to be bound by it, and there is no undertaking on her part to pay for these trees. Then it is further said, because she lets the plaintiff continue at the same rent, she, by implication, undertakes to pay for the trees. To my mind nothing could be more unreasonable. Because the tenant would have had a right to remove the trees as long as he continued the business of a nurseryman. If he turned the place into a private garden, he would have had no right to remove the trees. When she succeeded, the condition of things would be the same, and yet, if she was liable as tenant for life, she would be bound to pay for them when the tenant went out, and then the succeeding tenant for life might say to her representatives, "It is true that the defendant has paid for the trees, but you must leave them in the garden, because they are no longer trade fixtures, and we shall not pay you." So the defendant would have to pay nearly sixteen times the annual rent of the premises, of which at her death her representatives would not be reimbursed a penny. It seems to me that, whether we treat this as a matter of law or fact, we may say that there is no evidence that she agreed to the tenancy continuing on the terms of paying for these trees. There is no evidence, because it should be borne in mind that this is not a natural or ordinary or common covenant or agreement; the natural and ordinary agreement is, that a person shall have a right to remove trees which he has planted. I am, therefore, of opinion, whether I treat this as a matter of law or fact, it ought to be determined in favour of the defendant.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that a tenancy from year to year is created by the receipt of rent under the circumstances in question. Then the question is, whether the stipulation for taking the trees and paying for them at a valuation at the end of the term is a stipulation annexed by implication. If so, it is because there is an implied agreement. But what is the implied contract? It is to be implied from the presumed assent of the parties. Is there any evidence of any assent of Mrs. Monck? It is conceded that she knew nothing about it; she had no means of finding it out, and was not informed of it. It might as well be said that if the deceased tenant for life agreed to pay a guinea a piece for those trees, she would be bound by such agreement.

Judgment for the defendant.

1865. } BOSTOCK v. JARDINE AND May 10. } ANOTHER.

Contract—Principal and Agent—Failure of Consideration—Money Had and Received.

*The plaintiff instructed the defendants, who were brokers, to purchase for him 50 bales of cotton, and paid to the defendants 800*l., part of the purchase-money. The defendants made a contract in their own names for the purchase of a much larger quantity, viz., 300 bales, on account of the plaintiff and other principals:—Held, in an action for money had and received, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the money paid, as the defendants had not made a contract on which the plaintiff could sue as a principal.

This action was commenced on the 24th of December 1864, and the declaration contained the common counts for money received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiff, for interest, and for money due on accounts stated; the particulars claimed 800*l.* for money received, and 10*l.* 11*s.* for interest from the 19th of September 1864.

The pleas were, the general issue, payment and set-off; upon which issues were joined.

The cause was tried, at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1865, before Mellor, J. and a special jury, when evidence was given to the following effect: The defendants carried on business as brokers at Liverpool, and in July 1864 were instructed by the plaintiff to buy for him 50 bales of cotton. The plaintiff dealt as a speculator. On the 9th of July, in their own names, they entered into a contract in writing with certain persons trading under the name of Marriott & Co. for the purchase of 300 bales of Surat cotton, guaranteed fair new

Oomrawattee, and on board the Duncairn, then homeward bound from Bombay. A clause was inserted providing that in case of any dispute arising out of the contract the matter should be referred to two respectable brokers for settlement, who should decide as to quality and the allowance, if any, to be made; it was further stipulated that the 300 bales should be delivered in merchantable condition to the buyer, and that the damaged, if any, should be rejected provided they could not be made merchantable. The defendants on the same day sent the plaintiff notice that they had bought for him 50 bales of Surat cotton at 23½d. per lb., and informed him accurately of the terms in their contract with Messrs. Marriott, except that they did not intimate to him that the 50 bales were to be taken from a larger number. The defendants bought the remaining 250 bales on behalf of other principals. It was shewn to be customary among cotton-brokers in Liverpool, when buying for a principal who purchases on speculation, to deal in their own names. The vessel Duncairn reached Liverpool on the 7th of September, having a cargo of 500 bales. Shortly after her arrival the plaintiff paid to the defendants the sum of 800*l.* and accepted an undated bill for 1,100*l.* drawn by them. The cotton proved to be of inferior quality and mixed with short staple; of this the defendants informed the plaintiff subsequently to the payment of the 800*l.* On the 27th of September the plaintiff gave the defendants notice that he wished the 50 bales to be rejected, as they were bad, to which on the next day they replied, stating that by the contract of the 9th of July he was bound to submit the question of the quality of the cotton to arbitration. Arbitrators were accordingly appointed by the vendors and by the defendants respectively. It was determined by them that all the mixed bales in the cargo of the Duncairn should be rejected, and an allowance of ½d. per pound on the contract price should be made on the remainder. Of this arrangement the defendants gave the plaintiff notice. The arbitration was proceeded with, Messrs. Marriott and the defendants having agreed to reject 63 out of the 500 bales; the arbitrators rejected 79 others, making 142 rejected bales; of the remainder the proportionate part for the plaintiff was 35, on which an allowance of ½d. per lb. was to be made. This decision was arrived at on the 27th of November, and the arbitrators' certificate was dated the 6th of December. Meanwhile a correspondence, commencing on the 2nd of November, took place between the plaintiff and the defendants, in which the former required the latter to reject all the bales, and ultimately to return the 800*l.*; he refused to submit the matter to arbitration or to accept the 35 bales. After the arbitrators had given their decision, the defendants, under threat of legal proceedings, paid over to the vendors the 800*l.* which they had received from the plaintiff. Ultimately the 35 bales were re-sold, by Messrs. Marriott, at 14½d. per lb. after the action was commenced. It was proved that the defendants could have obtained 15 other bales, which would have made up the number of 50 that they were to deliver to the plaintiff. On these facts the learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of 792*l.*, being the 800*l.* paid to the defendants less the brokerage, and reserved leave to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for the defendants, the Court of Exchequer having power to draw inferences of fact which a jury would have found if they had been put to them.

Edward James (April 21) obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict found for the plaintiff should not be set aside and a verdict for the defendants or a nonsuit entered, on the ground that, on the facts proved, the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict.

Brett (Herschel with him) now shewed cause.—This is an action to recover a sum of money paid by a principal to his brokers, to enable them to carry out a contract which at the time of such payment he believed them to have entered into on his account; in truth, no such contract as he contemplated had ever been made, or, at least, if it had ever existed it wholly failed; the contract pursuant to which the 800*l.* was paid was, that they should enter upon a contract on which he could sue as principal. The defendants never made such a contract; the plaintiff is therefore entitled to retain the verdict, the consideration for the 800*l.* having failed.

The COURT here called on Edward James (Baylis with him).—The instructions to the defendants were, that they should buy cotton for the plaintiff, not that they should make a contract for the plaintiff; it is not the less the plaintiff's contract because the defendants when buying for him bought also for other persons. The plaintiff did not say, "Make for me a contract on which I can sue;" he has repudiated a contract made for him; his remedy is by an action for negligence against the defendants. When an authority given to an agent has been partially acted on by him, so that he has incurred a responsibility, it cannot be revoked. The declaration being for money received for the plaintiff's use, he cannot recover unless there has been a complete failure of consideration.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The question is, was there a contract at all? The plaintiff could not come forward and sue the sellers: how can it be said that there is a contract according to the plaintiff's instructions? MARTIN, B.—Blackburn, J., on the last occasion when he went the Northern Circuit, nonsuited a plaintiff who, having been instructed to buy 20 shares in a company, bought 50 instead. POLLOCK, C.B.—If a man, from whom a broker acting for several persons has bought goods in his own name, could be sued by that broker's principals, he would be liable to several actions instead of one. It is different from a case where a man knows himself to be contracting with an agent acting for several principals, and consequently is aware of his liability to be sued by more persons than one. Have you any authority to shew that in the latter case which I have alluded to the contractor can be sued by the principals? I never heard before of such a point.]

It is a novel point; there was evidence that the defendants acted according to the usual course of their business.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There was no evidence of a custom (it was not left to the jury) that a man who sells 500 articles to a broker buying in his own name can be sued by one principal in respect of one of the 500 articles; by another in respect of two, and so on. If the jury had found that there was such a custom, I should have said that its absurdity and inconvenience made it bad.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I believe we are all of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the money, and that therefore this rule must be discharged. To me, when the rule was moved, the point was quite new. I do not recollect any such case before. My Brother Martin remembers a decision upon the subject, and I own I should have expected no other when the point did arise. The defendants were authorized to buy a certain quantity of cotton for the plaintiff; instead of complying with their instructions, they bought a much larger quantity for the plaintiff and divers other people, and the plaintiff was prevented from coming forward and protecting his own rights. I think, therefore, that though a contract was made, it was not the contract the plaintiff authorized the defendants to make; and therefore, as he paid the money on the faith that a contract had been entered into, which turns out never to have existed, he is entitled to have it returned.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action to recover back the sum of 800*l.*, and the plaintiff must make out that there was no consideration whatever for paying it, or that the consideration entirely failed; one of these alternatives he must establish to entitle himself to succeed. The consideration for paying the 800*l.* was a contract supposed to have been made on the 9th of July, "for 50 bales of Surat cotton, at 23½*d.*" I understand that what the plaintiff thought he was about to contest at the trial was, whether or not the clause contained in the contract between Messrs. Marriott and the defendants, providing that if a dispute arose the matter should be referred to two respectable brokers, was binding upon him. Upon this point I do not wish to give any opinion, though my impression is the plaintiff would have been bound by the proviso. But what was the consideration for the money? What was the contract? If no such contract ever existed as the defendants had been authorized to enter into, there was a total failure of consideration. It is perfectly clear that it never did, because the contract of the 9th of July, between the defendants and Messrs. Marriott, was for the purchase of 300 bales of Surat cotton. Suppose Jardine & Co. had become bankrupt, and Bostock thought fit to enforce the contract, he must have failed at common law because it was no agreement to purchase the 50 bales at all, but, on the contrary, one for 300 bales; and even if the contract could have been sued on by the plaintiff at common law, it is clear, under the Statute of Frauds, it absolutely and necessarily must fail; and therefore Messrs. Jardine never did deliver to Mr. Bostock, any consideration for the money; they totally and absolutely omitted to do so. In my judgment the consideration entirely fails, because no contract such as the plaintiff contemplated was ever made by the defendants; and he is entitled to recover for money received.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons that have been so fully stated by my Brother Martin and the Lord Chief Baron; and I need not repeat them.

Succession Duty—16 & 17 Vict. c. 51.
s. 2.—“Entitled upon the Death of any Person.”

The 2nd section of the Succession Duty Act applies not merely to cases where the title accrues at death, but also to cases where the title has accrued before the act, but is made an interest in possession at once, or after an interval on a death occurring after the act.

P. G., the testator, devised certain property to his daughter for life if she survived her then husband, and after her death to such child or children by a second husband as she should appoint, and to them equally in default of appointment. If his daughter died before her then husband, or without having children by a second husband, then the trustees were to convey the estate to the use of E. S. C. Pole for life, with remainder to such child of E. S. C. Pole, other than the eldest, (if more than one) as he should appoint, and for default of appointment to his second and other sons in tail. The testator further directed that the rents and profits of his estate during the joint lives of his daughter and her then husband should accumulate for twenty-one years if the daughter and her then husband should so long live, and be added to the corpus, and if they lived beyond twenty-one years then during the remainder of the joint lives the rents and profits should be paid to the person or persons who would have been entitled to the corpus if the daughter were dead without a child by her then husband. E. S. C. Pole died on the 19th of January 1863 without making any appointment, and the defendant was his second son. The twenty-one years expired on the 25th of January 1863:—Held, that the defendant was a person who had become beneficially entitled to the income of property upon the death of a person dying after the commencement of the Succession Duty Act, within the meaning of section 2. of that act, and that the Crown was entitled to succession duty.

Information filed by the Attorney General for succession duty as follows :

1. The object of this information is to obtain payment of the duty which has become payable to Her Majesty in respect of the succession of the above-named defendant in the real and personal property devised and bequeathed by the will of Philip Gell, Esq., deceased, as hereinafter stated.

2. The said Philip Gell, Esq., formerly of Hopton, in the county of Derby, but now long since deceased (and who is hereinafter referred to as the testator), by his last will and testament, in writing, dated the 17th of February 1839, and duly executed as by law is required, appointed Edward Sacheverell C. Pole, Esq. and J. Crusoe the younger, gentleman, to be trustees and executors of his last will, and after making divers specific and pecuniary bequests (including a life annuity of 300*l.* a year) and giving to his gamekeeper T. Taylor a life annuity of 20*l.* payable out of his real estate in the township of Hopton, the testator devised and bequeathed unto and to the use of the said E. Sacheverell C. Pole and J. Crusoe the younger, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, all his real and personal estate upon certain trusts in the said bill mentioned, and which are, in effect, as follows: (that is to say) upon trust to convert all his personal estate (except as therein mentioned) into money, and thereout to pay his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and a certain legacy thereinbefore mentioned, and to purchase and appropriate sufficient stock to answer the said annuity of 300*l.*, and to apply the surplus of such money, and also the stock so purchased and appropriated after the determination of the said annuity, and all other money falling into his general personal estate, to the like uses as the overplus of the rents of his real estate, and the accumulations thereof were thereafter directed to be applied, with power (if necessary) to raise money out of his real estate in aid of his personal estate, for the purposes aforesaid. And upon further trust during the joint lives of W. P. Thornhill, the husband of his only surviving child Isabella, and of the said Isabella his wife, to apply the rents of his real estate in keeping down interest upon mortgages and paying off the principal, and to accumulate the surplus and place it out at interest, together with any surplus of his personal estate, until an eligible purchase could be found of manors or hereditaments in England as near to Hopton as might be, with a direction that the same when purchased should be conveyed and settled to the uses of his will, and that in the mean time the interest of the money applicable to purchases should be applied in the same manner as the rents of the property so to be purchased would be applicable. And he declared that it was his will and intention that all the income of his real estate as well original as purchased, and all the income of his real surplus personal estate, and of all other the property vested for the time being in the trustees of his will should accumulate by way of compound interest during the joint lives of the said W. P. Thornhill and Isabella his wife, subject, nevertheless, to the proviso of cesser thereafter contained, and should with all accumulations thereon respectively be laid out in such purchases of manor and hereditaments as aforesaid, and should in the mean time be considered as converted into real estate; and the testator directed that immediately after the death of either of them the said W. P. Thornhill and Isabella his wife, all his real estate, both original and purchased, should be subject to the trusts thereafter declared, that is to say, in case his said daughter Isabella should survive the said W. P. Thornhill, he directed his said trustees, after paying the interest upon any existing mortgages, and subject to the said annuity of 20*l.* (if continuing), to pay the residue of the rents of his estate from the decease of the said W. P. Thornhill, and thenceforth during the natural life of his said daughter Isabella, unto and for the benefit of his said daughter for her separate use without power of anticipation; and in case she should marry again, and should leave any child or children by any after-taken husband surviving her, the testator empowered his said daughter by deed or will to appoint and dispose of his real estate unto and amongst such child or children in such manner as she should think fit, and directed his said trustees to convey his said real estate to the use of the child or children of his said daughter, by any such after-taken husband, equally amongst them if more than one, as tenants in common in tail, with cross-remainders over amongst them in tail. And in case his said daughter Isabella should die in the lifetime of the said W. P. Thornhill, or in case there should be a failure of all her children by her after-taken husband, to whom cross-remainders in tail were thereinbefore directed to be limited, then and in either of those cases the testator directed his said trustees to convey his real estate unto and to the use of the said E. Sacheverell C. Pole, or his assigns, during his life, with remainder to the use of any one or more of his child or children, (except his eldest son,) unless being his only child, as he should by deed or will appoint; with remainder after the decease of the said E. Sacheverell C. Pole, as to all such part of the said real estate as should not be disposed of by him in manner aforesaid, unto the use of the second and every other son of the said E. Sacheverell C. Pole, (except his eldest son,) severally and successively in remainder one after another, and the heirs of their several and respective bodies in manner in the said will mentioned, with other remainders over, to which it is unnecessary for the purposes of this suit more particularly to refer. And the testator directed that the person who should become entitled to the possession of the said real estate under the directions thereinbefore contained, should within the space of three calendar months after coming into such possession, take upon himself the surname and use and bear the arms of Gell. And the will contains a proviso in the following terms, that is to say, "Provided always, and I direct and declare, that in case, at the expiration of the term of twenty-one years from the day of my decease, the said W. P. Thornhill and my said daughter Isabella Thornhill shall both be living, then and in such case the accumulation of the rents, issues and profits of the real estate hereinbefore devised and of the real estate purchased by my said trustees or trustee under the directions herein contained, and all other the accumulations hereby directed shall cease; and such rents, issues and profits, or the overplus thereof, after payment of the interest of any mortgages or other incumbrances then remaining a charge thereon, and all other the income of the estate and effects subject to be invested in the purchase of hereditaments under the trusts of this my will shall from and after the expiration of the said term of twenty-one years, and thenceforth during the remainder of the joint lives of the said W. P. Thornhill and my said daughter Isabella, or the overplus thereof, after keeping down the interest on all mortgages and all other outgoings or incumbrances, be paid by my said trustees or trustee for the time being to and for the benefit of the person or persons who for the time being under the directions hereinbefore contained would have been entitled to such rents, issues and profits and income in case my said daughter Isabella were then dead, without having had any child by any after-taken husband as aforesaid. But, nevertheless from and immediately after the decease of the said W. P. Thornhill, in case my said daughter Isabella shall survive him, my said trustees or trustee for the time being shall pay to and for the separate use of my said daughter, the said rents, issues and profits thenceforth during her life according to the trust and direction in her favour hereinbefore contained; and the said real estates, as well original as purchased under the directions hereinbefore contained, shall be subject to such trusts over as hereinbefore directed in favour of her issue by any after-taken husband, and to all such trusts in remainder over as aforesaid, the directness as to the said property lastly hereinbefore contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding, it being my will and intention only to prevent the income of my property from being paid to my said daughter Isabella during the life of W. P. Thornhill, in case they should jointly live beyond the term for which accumulation is by law permitted, and to provide for the payment thereof in the mean time to the persons entitled in remainder, but not further to affect her interests or those of my other devisees in case she should happen to survive the said W. P. Thornhill," as by the said will or the probate or an office copy thereof will more fully appear.

3. The testator made a codicil to his said will dated the 31st of December 1841, and thereby bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies, but did not otherwise alter the disposition of his real and personal property made by his said will; and on the 25th of January 1842 the testator died, and his said will and codicil were shortly afterwards duly proved by the executors thereof in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

4. The said Edward Sacheverell Chandos Pole died on the 19th day of January 1863, after the time appointed for the commencement of "The Succession Duty Act, 1853," without having in any manner exercised the power of appointment in favour of his children given to him by the said will, and leaving the above-named defendant, his second son, surviving him, who upon the death of his said father became beneficially entitled by reason of the disposition made by the said will as hereinbefore stated to the real and personal property comprised in such disposition subject to the trust for accumulation in the said will contained, and subject also to the trusts thereby declared in favour of the said Isabella Thornhill, and her child or children by any after-taken husband as aforesaid in the event of such trusts taking effect.

5. The said W. P. Thornhill and Isabella Thornhill are both still living.

6. The term of twenty-one years from the day of the testator's death expired on the 25th of January 1863, and thereupon the above-named defendant (who has assumed the surname of "Gell," pursuant to the direction in the said will in that behalf contained) became entitled to have the rents and income of the real and personal property comprised in the disposition made by the testator's will as before stated, paid to him by the trustees or trustee thereof for the time being and the same have since then been paid to him by Mr. J. Cruso (who is the surviving trustee of the said will) accordingly, and inasmuch as the defendant is a stranger in blood to the testator, by whom the before-stated disposition was made, a duty at the rate of 10*l.* per cent. upon the value of the defendant's succession has become payable by him to Her Majesty in respect thereof, but he declines to pay the same or any other duty, and denies that any duty is in fact payable.

It was prayed that it might be declared that the defendant was chargeable with duty at the rate of 10*l.* per cent., or at some other rate, in respect of the real and personal property, or the income thereof, to which he had become beneficially entitled under the disposition made by the before-stated will of the testator Philip Gell as aforesaid, and that the particulars of such property or income and the amount of duty payable in respect thereof might be ascertained if necessary under the direction of the Court, and that the defendant might be decreed to pay such duty to the Receiver General of Inland Revenue on behalf of Her Majesty; and that for the purposes aforesaid all proper accounts and inquiries might be taken and made.

The answer of the defendant admitted the statements in the information to be true, but stated that the defendant declined to pay any duty whatever in respect of the interest to which he had become entitled under the disposition made by the said will, and he so declined upon the ground that he was not, within the meaning of the "Succession Duty Act, 1853," a successor in respect of such interest; that he had not become so entitled upon the death of any person dying after the commencement of that act.

The Attorney General, the Solicitor General, Locke and Hanson, for the Crown.—E. Sacheverell C. Pole died on the 19th of January 1863, which was six days before the expiration of the twenty-one years during which the accumulation was to continue. That time expired on the 25th of January 1863, and the defendant became entitled to the immediate possession and enjoyment under the limitations of the testator's will. It is contended, therefore, on behalf of the Crown, and the case comes directly and distinctly within the express and positive words of the Succession Duty Act, and fulfils every condition that may be necessary to be fulfilled under that act according to the definition of "a taxable succession" contained in the 2nd section. The words of that section are, "Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, . . . shall be deemed to have conferred . . . a succession." The facts of this case may be read into the clause with the most perfect facility: "A past disposition of property," viz., that which the testator made on the 17th of February 1839, and which took effect upon his death in 1842, "by reason whereof any person," that is, the defendant, "became beneficially entitled to" the income of that property upon the death of his father, E. Sacheverell C. Pole, who died on the 19th of January 1863, after the act came into operation—not "immediately after"—but "after an interval" of five days, continuing till the term should run out and expire; and not "certainly" but "contingently" upon the continuance of that term during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill.

As an absolute interest. Every interest, whether a fee simple interest or a fee tail interest, is valued as if it was an estate for life. This interest, therefore, would be dealt with as a life interest; but as there is a clause in the will which would determine its enjoyment in case Isabella should survive her husband, the defendant would be entitled under section 36. to so much of the duty paid by him as would reduce the duty to such an amount as would have been payable by him if such duty had been assessed in respect of the actual duration or extent of his interest. The other side will have to contend that because the defendant's father died, not indeed before the passing of the act, but five days before the period of twenty-one years had expired, therefore that is not a succession; but it is as if to meet such an argument that these words are inserted in the act, "shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently." If the act was drawn to meet this particular case, it could not have been more accurately framed. Did not the defendant, by the death of his father, become, what he would not have been if his father had lived, entitled to the income of the fund after an interval of five days contingently upon the continuance at that time of the joint lives? And if his father had not so died, he would not have been so entitled. It was upon the death of his father that the interest vested in him as the first person entitled at the end of the term, that father's life being a life which would have stood before him, and which makes his right a right accruing upon that death, whether it took place before or after the end of the twenty-one years. It may also be that the Court will be asked to enter into some subtleties of technical law as to the precise nature of the estate limited by the will, and whether it was or was not to be considered as a remainder eodem modo et formâ in a technical sense. But it has been settled by the highest authority that the act is not to be construed by the subtleties of technical law. In Saltoun v. the Advocate General (1) Lord Campbell says: "In construing the statute on which this case depends, we must bear in mind that it applies to the whole of the United Kingdom, and that the intention of the legislature must be understood to be that the like interests in property taken by succession should be subjected to the like duties, wheresoever the property may be situated. The technicalities of the laws of England and of Scotland where they differ must be disregarded, and the language of the legislature must be taken in its popular sense." By the law of Scotland, where there is an entailed estate, every successor is supposed, in contemplation of law, to have the whole fee in him, although, for the purposes of enjoyment, he is only tenant for life. It was therefore contended that the person from whom the descent of the fee took place—the feeor, as he is called—was to be regarded as the predecessor, and not the author, of the entail. Lord Campbell, after stating the technical argument, said, "At any rate, let us attend to the correspondence on this subject between Lord Hardwicke and Lord Kames, and to the decision of this House in the celebrated case of Gordon of Park (2), and we shall learn that such subtle technical rules are to give way for the purpose of doing justice and fulfilling the intention of the legislature. Without infringing the genuine principles of the Scottish feudal law, which I wish ever to hold sacred unless where they have been relaxed by the legislature, I think that the appellant may be considered in the situation of a remainderman in tail, according to the English law per formam doni, to whom I conceive that the donor, and not the last predecessor who held under the first estate tail, would be considered the predecessor." Now, is it not clear from the will that the meaning of its many provisions is, substantially, that at the end of twenty-one years, as the law does not permit the accumulations to exceed that period, the enjoyment shall be accelerated, upon the hypothesis of the death of the daughter, without leaving the described issue, but so accelerated as, if that hypothesis should not ultimately be verified, not to defer her enjoyment according to the previous intention? In Wilcox v. Smith (3) the question arose as to the effect of the death of the tenant for life, under an ordinary limitation to A. for life, remainder to his first son and other sons in tail. A. died after the act came into operation, but before it had received the royal assent. Vice Chancellor Kindersley held that the remainderman was liable to pay the succession duty; for though the estate vested in the remainderman at his birth, he did not become beneficially possessed of it until after the act came into operation.

necessary inference, as the first taker of the estate created at the end of the term of twenty-one years during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill? If the first taker of that estate is named, by expression or by reference, to be the defendant's father, then the question argued on behalf of the Crown arises. But if the defendant is the person so pointed out—if he is actually named as the person who is the first to take upon the end of the term of twenty-one years—cadit questio, there is nothing to argue, for it cannot then be said he took upon the death of his father. If the limitation in the will is "at the end of the term of twenty-one years, if Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill shall then be living, I devise my estate to the defendant," then he pays no duty. The testator died before the act came into operation, and the defendant then would not take upon the death of any person whatever. But if the taker of the estate at the end of the term of twenty-one years is the defendant's father, with remainder to the defendant, then the defendant's father having died at a certain time, before the end of the term of twenty-one years, the question would arise, whether the defendant is taking upon the death of an individual after an interval following that death. The scheme of the will appears to be this: First, there is a trust for accumulation during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill, with remainder over, occurring at the death of either. In the event of the death of Mrs. Thornhill first, it is to go in one direction; in the event of Mr. Thornhill first, it is to go in another direction. Then there is a proviso, by which, in the event of Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill surviving a period of twenty-one years, a new estate is created—it is an estate which begins at the end of the term of twenty-one years, and continues during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill. Now, who is the person first entitled to that estate? In order to ascertain this you must look at the earlier part of the will, not for the purpose of introducing into the latter part all the limitations introduced into the earlier, but for the purpose of seeing who, under the circumstances existing at the end of the twenty-one years, would be entitled to the estate. It is clear, if this be done, the defendant is the person so entitled; nothing is there given to the defendant's father. The Crown reads this latter clause as if it stated, "I desire that the estate shall, in that event, go to such and the same persons, and for such and the same estates and interests, as I have hereinbefore directed in respect of my said estates, in case my daughter should die in the lifetime of W. P. Thornhill, or should die without issue after his death." Those are not the words of the will. The words are, "shall from and after the expiration of the said term of twenty-one years, and thenceforth during the remainder of the joint lives of the said W. P. Thornhill and my said daughter Isabella, or the overplus thereof, after keeping down the interest on all mortgages and all other outgoings and incumbrances, be paid by my trustees or trustee for the time being to and for the benefit of the person or persons who for the time being, under the directions hereinbefore contained, would have been entitled to such rents, issues and profits and income in case my said daughter Isabella were then dead, &c. Then!—that means at the end of the twenty-one years. The defendant's father could not then be entitled, because he was dead. No doubt a reference must be had to the previous limitation to ascertain who would be entitled, and at Isabella's death it is clear that the defendant is the person who would be entitled to the estate. Suppose this was the case of a single limitation, and not a series of limitations, not to the defendant for life with remainder over, but "to the person or persons who for the time being would have been entitled," would there be any question as to what the words "for the time being" would mean?—would they not mean a person who at that particular time should be found to be entitled to the rents and profits? Suppose another case, that the rector "for the time being" of a parish twenty-one years hence shall be entitled to receive a capital sum of money, there would be no difficulty in ascertaining that person, because the rector for the time being would be the rector at the end of the term of twenty-one years; or suppose, instead of giving a capital sum to him, the words were "the income of it shall be paid to the rector or rectors for the time being at the end of twenty-one years," it would only be necessary for the Court to ascertain who is the rector in being at the end of that term, and the income would be payable to him. There is no distinction between that case and the present. Again, suppose a limitation to the second son for the time being of A. B., with remainder to the first and other sons of that second. A. B. has three sons, X., Y., Z. Y. is the second son, who dies before the end of the term of twenty-one years, and consequently at the end of the term of twenty-one years Z. becomes the second son for the time being. The argument for the Crown would go the length of claiming duty because the words "second son for the time being" included Y., and Z. succeeded on the death of Y. A definition of the meaning of these words is given by Lord Westbury in his judgment in Ellison v. Thomas (4): "When a future period is referred to, and it is desired to designate a person who fills a particular character at that period, the words 'for the time being' are appropriately used. If several future periods are referred to, the words are again appropriate, and may denote several different persons who may in succession fill the character at such several periods. If I say that when a particular office shall become vacant the appointment shall belong to the Prime Minister for the time being, the words denote one person only, for one period only is referred to; but if, as in the instance put by the Vice Chancellor, I direct a certain sum to be paid annually to the rector of A. for the time being, the words denote the rectors from time to time, because they refer, not to the time of one payment, but to the time of successive annual payments." Next, does the defendant succeed on the death of his father? Here there is an absolute and independent term of twenty-one years running from the testator's death, in no way connected with the defendant's father, but created for a collateral purpose, wholly extrinsic and foreign to the defendant's father, and the limitation in substance is, on the expiration of the term of twenty-one years, or on the death of the defendant's father, whichever of these two events shall last happen, to the defendant; then, if the event that last happened is the term of twenty-one years, the defendant does not, within the spirit of the Succession Duty Act, take the estate upon the death of any person.

The Attorney General replied.—He referred to the 8th, 20th and 21st sections of the act, and contended that it was a fallacy to suppose that a man does not take a succession on the death of a person unless the person on whose death he takes the succession would himself take under the same disposition; if the death introduces the defendant to the interest which he took, then the act applies.

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In delivering the judgment of the Court (5), it will be convenient to state the facts that give rise to the question in this case. Philip Gell devised certain property, as follows, to his daughter for life if she survived her then husband, and after her death to such child or children by a second husband (if any) as she should appoint, and to them equally in tail in default of appointment. But if she should die before her then husband, or without having children by a second husband, then the trustees were to convey the estate to the use of Edward Sacheverell Chandos Pole for life, with remainder to such child of Edward Sacheverell Chandos Pole, other than the eldest, if more than one, as he should appoint, and for default of appointment, to the second and other sons in tail. This left the rents and profits during the joint lives of the daughter and her then husband undisposed of. As to these, the testator directed that they should accumulate for twenty-one years if the daughter and her then husband should so long live, and be added to the corpus, and if they lived beyond twenty-one years, then during the remainder of the joint lives they should be paid to the person or persons who would have been entitled to the corpus if the daughter were dead without a child by her then husband, with a proviso for the daughter's benefit if she survived her husband. The testator died in 1842; the daughter and her husband are still living. Edward Sacheverell Chandos Pole died on the 19th of January 1863, without making any appointment, and the defendant is his second son. The twenty-one years expired on the 25th of January 1863. The question is, whether the succession duty is payable on his interest in the rents and profits after the twenty-one years?

Now here is a passed disposition of property whereby the defendant has become beneficially entitled to the income of property. Has he done so upon the death of a person dying after the commencement of the Succession Duty Act? Edward Sacheverell Chandos Pole has died since that time. The question is, what is the meaning of the words in the second section, "has or shall become entitled to any property upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the act, either immediately or after an interval, either certainly or contingently"? It seems impossible that the words "become entitled" can mean both have the right and have the enjoyment, and yet there are irresistible reasons to shew that both are meant. First, to shew that it means have the title or right, and not the enjoyment, there is in the first place the word itself "entitled." A man is entitled as soon as he has the right. In the next place, he may be entitled "after an interval"; again, he may be entitled "contingently." Further, by section 20, the duty is payable only where the successor shall become entitled in possession to the succession. On the other hand, "a passed disposition of property, by reason of which a person has become entitled on the death of a person dying after the commencement of this act, confers a succession. But in such a case it cannot mean the accrual of the title, for that has taken place, so that the words must mean here "entitled in possession." Further, if this were not so, the common case of a settlement for life with following interests would not confer a succession on the persons taking the remainder. This cannot have been intended, and indeed is contrary to several cases—The Attorney General v. Yelverton (6) and The Attorney General v. Gardiner (7). We must hold, therefore, that the section applies not merely to cases where the title accrues at death, but also to cases where the title has accrued before the act, but is made an interest in possession at once, or after an interval on a death accruing after the act. So that it applies, not only where the death is the cause, but also where it is the occasion of the successor's being entitled to possession "immediately," or "after an interval." But if so, that comprehends the present case. The death of his father did not entitle the defendant in the sense of giving him the title or right, but on that death the defendant became contingently entitled "after an interval" to possession. We must therefore give judgment for the Crown. Mr. Rolt's argument has not been lost sight of. But after all, if our construction of the statute is right, the question is whether the father's death was the occasion of the son's right. We think it was. It may be that the consequence follows that Mr. Rolt pointed out, namely, that if there were a gift for ten years and then to the rector of Dale for the time being, and A. was rector at the beginning of the ten years and died, and B. was rector at the end, that B. would be liable to the succession duty as being entitled on the death of A. It may be so. No doubt that does not seem a case in ordinary parlance of being entitled "on the death" of A.; but there is no other objection to such a law. There is no reason why such a subject of taxation should not be selected. It results in this, that when anybody gains by a death the State shares his benefit.

Judgment for the Crown.

1865. } BROWN v. THE SOMERSET AND May 10. } DORSET RAILWAY COMPANY.

Arbitration—Award—General Finding—Nominal Damages.

A dispute arose between the plaintiff and the defendants, as to whether a certain carriage archway had been constructed in conformity with an agreement entered into between them. An action having been brought, by an order of Nisi Prius the cause was referred to an arbitrator, who was empowered to direct, if he found for the plaintiff, what should be done to make the carriage archway in conformity with the agreement. The arbitrator found for the plaintiff, without awarding any damages, and directed certain alterations to be made in the archway. The plaintiff signed judgment for the amount of the damages claimed in the declaration:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled only to nominal damages.

It appeared from the affidavits that the first count of the declaration, after reciting that before and at the time of making the agreement thereafter mentioned, the Dorset Central Railway Company were about to construct a line of railway through certain lands and hereditaments of the plaintiff, and across a certain occupation-road near and leading to a certain mansion-house and pleasure-grounds of the plaintiff, and thereby to occasion damage, averred that it was agreed between the plaintiff and the Dorset Central Railway Company, that in consideration that the plaintiff would agree with the said company to refer to the award of one Henry Arthur Hunt, the amount to be paid to the plaintiff by the said company, by way of compensation for the damage aforesaid, and would also permit the said company, on payment of a certain deposit, to take possession of such portion of the said land and hereditaments of the plaintiff as they were authorized to purchase under the provisions of their act, the said company would (amongst other things) make and maintain a carriage archway of a neat character under the line of the said railway, at a certain place then agreed upon, where the said line was intended to cross the said occupation-road, and would also remove the thatch with which a certain lodge of the plaintiff's was then covered, and roof the same with tiles and slates. Averment of performance of conditions precedent. First breach, that the Dorset Central Railway Company, after the making of the agreement and before the passing of the Somerset and Dorset Company's Amalgamation Act, 1862, constructed a carriage archway in the said place of a rude, unsightly and inelegant character, and not of a neat character, and that the said archway remained from thence hitherto. Second breach, that the Dorset Central Railway Company did not nor would, prior to the passing of the Somerset and Dorset Company's Amalgamation Act, 1862, nor did nor would the defendants afterwards remove the thatch from the said lodge, or cover the same with tiles and slates. The second count was for trespass to the plaintiff's land, and the declaration claimed 1,000*l*.

The defendants to the first breach alleged in the first count pleaded performance of their agreement in this respect, and to the second, payment into court of 42*l*. 10*s*. To the second count they pleaded not guilty and not possessed.

The plaintiffs replied to the pleas of performance, not guilty and not possessed, by joining issue, and to the plea of payment into court, by accepting the said sum of 42*l*. 10*s*. in satisfaction of the second breach.

The cause was entered for trial at the Dorset Spring Assizes, 1864, when the plaintiff, having abandoned the second count, Martin, B., the presiding Judge, suggested that the matter should be referred, and accordingly Mr. Richard Hall, a surveyor, was appointed arbitrator.

By the order of Nisi Prius referring the cause, it was directed that a verdict should be found for the plaintiff for the claim in the declaration and costs 40*s*., and for the defendants on the trespass count: that the arbitrator, in the event of his finding for the plaintiff, should say what was to be done to make the carriage archway in conformity with the agreement, and should certify in writing when what he ordered to be done was properly carried out. He was empowered to direct that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiff, or the defendant, or a nonsuit entered, as he should think proper; and to him the cause and all matters in difference between the parties thereto were referred.

It was further directed that the costs of the cause should abide the event of the award, and that the costs of the reference and award should be in the discretion of the arbitrator.

On the 23rd of May 1864, the arbitrator made his award, which after certain recitals proceeded thus:

"1. I direct that the verdict shall be entered for the plaintiff in the said cause (except as to the trespass count).

"2. In order to make the carriage archway mentioned in the order of reference in conformity to the agreement, I direct the defendants to add a parapet with ashlar stringcourse and coping; also to fix an ashlar coping on wing walls, as shewn on the drawing annexed to this my award; also to take out all points of brickwork, and properly point the same in good white cement; and I further direct that the above works be properly completed before the 25th day of September next.

"3. I direct that the costs of the reference and of this award be paid by the defendants."

Thereupon the postea was drawn up by the plaintiff, and the damages were assessed therein at 957*l.* 10*s.* On the 2nd of January 1865 judgment was signed, and in the following month (February) the plaintiffs' costs were taxed at 237*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*; the postea was shewn to the clerk of the defendants' attornies, who did not object to the amount of the damages. After the taxation the defendants' attornies paid the costs by cheque; the plaintiffs' attornies replied by saying that they would place the amount of the cheque to the credit of the judgment debt, but that they had issued a writ of fiery facias for the sum of 1,195*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* The defendants, on the 2nd of March, took out a summons at chambers, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment should not be amended by the addition of words, the effect of which would reduce the damages to a nominal sum, and why the writ of fiery facias should not be set aside. Erle, C.J., at the hearing of the summons, refused to amend the judgment, but set aside the writ. The costs of the issues abandoned at the trial, amounting to more than 6*l.*, were paid to the defendants. It was alleged by the defendants, that they had fully and faithfully fulfilled the award; the plaintiffs asserted that some of the stone-work of the archway, from being made of bad materials, had come off, and that the mortar-pointing was falling off. It was also stated that the arbitrator had never certified that what he had ordered to be done had been properly carried out according to the terms of the order of Nisi Prius.

Lopes (April 21) had obtained a rule, calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why the judgment should not be set aside, with costs, on the ground that it was signed without authority.

Kingdon now shewed cause.—The damages were assessed at the proper amount; for the arbitrator, by finding for the plaintiff generally, in fact awarded him the full amount of his claim. It is not contended that execution ought to issue for the whole sum; the defendants have not complied with the arbitrator's directions.

[Lush, contra.—The archway has been altered.]

It is not to be forgotten that Erle, C.J., though he set aside the writ of fiery facias, left the judgment as it was.

Lush (Lopes with him) was not called on.

[MARTIN, B.—Under no circumstances had the plaintiff power to sign judgment for the residue of the full claim, after deducting the amount paid into court. If the defendants did not comply with the award, his remedy was by an application to this Court: he could not have honestly supposed that judgment was to be entered up for 957*l.* 10*s.*]

Per Curiam (1).—The rule must be made absolute to reduce the damages to 1*s.*, and on payment thereof all proceedings must be stayed.

Rule accordingly.

Declaration by the plaintiff as assignee of the estate and effects of Daniel Rushworth,

(1) Pollock, C.B., Martin, B. and Pigott, B.

a bankrupt, on the common money counts, and also for trover for converting the goods of the plaintiff as assignee.

Pleas, never indulted to the common counts, and not guilty and not possessed to the count in trover.

The cause was tried, at the Spring Assizes at Leeds, before Martin, B.

The action was brought to recover the value of certain goods, included in a bill of sale given by Daniel Rushworth, the bankrupt, to J. Fletcher, J. F. Easby and W. Fletcher, three of the defendants, and which goods were seized and sold by G. Poole, the other defendant.

The defendants J. Fletcher, Easby and W. Fletcher, under the firm of Fletcher & Co., carried on the business of coal-merchants, at Silsden, near Bradford.

In 1860 Fletcher & Co. employed the bankrupt Rushworth as an agent to sell coals. In October 1864 Rushworth was indebted to Fletcher & Co. to the amount of 230*l.*, and at the end of that month they applied to him for a bill of sale as a security for his debt. On the 3rd of November the bankrupt executed a bill of sale in favour of Fletcher & Co. At the time the bankrupt executed the bill of sale, his debts amounted to about 1,100*l.*, of which 600*l.* was due to the defendants and the residue to other creditors. His assets consisted of the amount of the goods comprised in the bill of sale, book debts to the amount of 50*l.*, of which only 22*l.* were good, and an equity of redemption valued at 150*l.*, and which he afterwards sold to the defendants for 110*l.* He was then in insolvent circumstances, and his insolvency was known to Fletcher & Co., and J. Fletcher had told several persons that the bankrupt could not pay 5*s.* in the pound. The property comprised in the bill of sale consisted of horses and carts valued at 130*l.* and some household furniture valued at about 30*l.* The bankrupt executed the bill of sale on the express verbal understanding and promise from J. Fletcher, that he would let him have the horses and carts, so that by their use he would be able to redeem himself and pay his other creditors, but on its afterwards turning out that the bankrupt was indebted to the firm in a larger amount than they at first expected, J. Fletcher considered he was absolved from his promise. On the 17th of November the defendant Poole was instructed to seize the property comprised in the assignment, and on the 19th he seized and advertised a sale. On the 22nd of November he was served with a notice that the bill of sale was an act of bankruptcy, and notwithstanding the notice he proceeded to sell the goods on the 23rd of November. The goods realized 125*l.* A petition for adjudication in bankruptcy against Rushworth was filed on the 28th of November, and on the 10th of December he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on the 9th of January 1865 the plaintiff was appointed official assignee.

The bill of sale purported to be made between Daniel Rushworth of the first part, Nathan Rushworth of the second part, and J. Fletcher, J. F. Easby and W. Fletcher (called the mortgagees) of the third part. After reciting that the mortgagees had required payment by D. Rushworth of the sum of 230*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, which was due from D. Rushworth to the mortgagees, and D. Rushworth being unable without inconvenience to make such payment, and requiring further credit and advances of money, it had been agreed, that in order to secure the said sum of 230*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, and the sum or sums of money which should from time to time hereafter become due from him to the said mortgagees on any account whatsoever, not exceeding in the whole with the said sum of 230*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* the sum of 300*l.*, the said D. Rushworth should execute to the said mortgagees the assignment and security thereafter mentioned, and then in consideration of the sum of 230*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* being so due from the said D. Rushworth to the said mortgagees, and also in consideration of the premises, and of the further credit intended to be given, and of the further advances of money intended to be made to the said D. Rushworth by the mortgagees, D. Rushworth assigned and transferred unto the said mortgagees all and singular the horses, mares, building materials, cart gears, household furniture, and household effects, and all other the goods, chattels and things and other personal property enumerated in the schedule thereunder written, and all and singular other the household furniture and other effects and things (if any) now being in and about the dwelling-house and premises of the said D. Rushworth, in Westgate, Bradford, aforesaid, and all the estate and interest of him D. Rushworth therein or thereto (except from the grant and assignment hereby made the necessary wearing apparel of the said D. Rushworth and his family), and also all or any goods, chattels and effects substituted by the said D. Rushworth for those which were enumerated or comprised therein, and all or any other goods, chattels or effects then or thereafter belonging to D. Rushworth, which might be in and upon the dwelling-house, trade or other premises occupied by D. Rushworth at the time of demand of payment of any monies due thereunder, it being thereby agreed that such goods, chattels and effects as should be thereafter brought in and upon the said premises, or any of them, should thereby in pursuance of the assignment thereby made become the property and effects of the mortgagees, and such assignment shall be deemed complete and effectual for the purposes therein set forth without any further or other transfer, delivery of possession, or other act or deed on the part of D. Rushworth.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the defendants' counsel submitted to the learned Judge, that on the authority of Smith v. Timms (1), the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited. The learned Judge, however, declined to nonsuit the plaintiff, and at the conclusion of the defendants' case, in summing up to the jury, said: "The question is, whether the bill of sale given by Rushworth to the firm of Fletcher & Easby is a fraudulent conveyance of his goods and chattels within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act? It has long been held, that if a debtor conveys the whole of his property to a creditor in respect of a pre-existing debt, that is a fraudulent conveyance with intent to defeat and delay his other creditors, because it necessarily has that effect; it takes away and gives to one creditor the whole of his debtor's property and that creditor gets it all, and it essentially prevents any of the other creditors from getting any portion of it. The law has, for many years, stamped such a transaction as being of itself a fraudulent conveyance, within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act. Therefore, if this bill of sale had comprised the whole of the debtor's property, however honest the transaction might be, it would be an act of bankruptcy. It would appear that over and above the property which was comprised in the bill of sale, the debtor Rushworth had an equity of redemption, which was worth as much as 140*l.* or 150*l.*; he had further book debts due to him, amounting to from 50*l.* to 60*l.*; and he had also a sum of 26*l.* odd, due from the corporation of Bradford. And the question which I propose to leave to you is this: whether, taking into consideration that the debtor Rushworth possessed the property I have mentioned to you, did the property comprised in the bill of sale substantially comprise all the property of the bankrupt available in order to enable him to carry on his trade, and did the defendants know that the consequence of putting the bill of sale into force would be to prevent, and in effect to stop his trade, and to disable him from carrying it on? If you are of opinion that was the true operation of this bill of sale, in my judgment that is an act of bankruptcy, and you ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff. If you find it not to be the fact, then you will find a verdict for the defendant." His Lordship further stated: "The question is, if a debtor, by a conveyance of his property, puts himself in the condition that he cannot carry on his business or his trade, and gives to a creditor the power of putting an entire end to it, so as to prevent his other creditors from getting anything; and if the person who takes a conveyance of this kind knows such to be the consequence of the transaction, in my opinion that is a fraudulent conveyance within the bankrupt law and an act of bankruptcy. If you believe this transaction had the effect and was of the character I have mentioned to you under the circumstances of this bankruptcy, you will find your verdict for the plaintiff." The jury found their verdict for the plaintiff.

Field, in the present term, obtained a rule for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection in not directing a nonsuit, and also in directing the jury, that the deed of the 3rd of November 1864 was an act of bankruptcy in the terms stated by the learned Baron.

Manisty and Kemplay shewed cause, and contended that the direction of the learned Judge was right. That whether the deed comprised the whole of the trader's property or not, was a question for the jury, and which the jury had rightly decided by their verdict. That the effect of the deed was to defeat and delay the bankrupt's creditors; that there might be cases in which an assignment of a trader's chattels might stop his business without delaying and defeating his creditors; but here the trader was so hopelessly insolvent at the time he executed the deed, and that to the knowledge of the creditors, that the assignment could have no other effect than to defeat and delay his creditors. They cited Smith v. Timms (1), Pennel v. Reynolds (2), Graham v. Chapman (3), Ex parte Bailey (4), Goodricke v. Taylor (5), Ex parte Wensley (6).

Field and Wills, in support of the rule, contended, that, on the authority of Smith v. Timms (1), the learned Judge ought to have nonsuited the plaintiff, and that the learned Judge was wrong in telling the jury that if the trader, by reason of the assignment, was prevented from carrying on his business, then that the making of the deed was an act of bankruptcy. They cited and relied on Young v. Waud (7), Smith v. Cannon (8), Worsley v. De Mattos (9), Wilson v. Day (10).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. Considering the length of the discussion which took place upon the rule, I do not think it necessary to say more than this, that it appears to me Smith v. Cannon (8) establishes this proposition, that where a trader being in insolvent circumstances makes an assignment of his property, which if acted on would prevent him from carrying on his trade, he thereby commits an act of bankruptcy. I think it quite plain, according to what passed between the parties at the time the assignment was made, the debtor who took the assignment was aware that the trader was insolvent, because the trader informed him that if he conveyed his goods to him he could not carry on his business. The transaction contains two distinct elements which make it an act of bankruptcy irrespective of any fraud. The ground upon which I put the case is this: at the time of the conveyance the party taking the assignment was aware the trader was insolvent, and was aware that the assignment would if acted on break up the concern, and that must necessarily delay and defeat the creditors.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. This is not a case where a trader conveys all his property, or all with a colourable exception, which I take to be the same thing as conveying all; but it is a case where he conveys his property, stock-in-trade, and all that shall come upon the premises, including his horses and waggons with which he carried on his trade, with the exception of the value of an equity of redemption, and I think about 50*l.* worth of book debts, with this addition, that he conveys also everything that should come upon the premises after the execution of the deed; and therefore the question is, whether the assignment is an act of bankruptcy. It was proved that the bankrupt knew perfectly well, and the defendants knew perfectly well, that if this deed was put in force he would be at once unable to carry on his business any longer. Those are the facts, and upon those facts my learned Brother left to the jury the question, did that deed comprise all the property of the bankrupt available to enable him to carry on his trade, and would the effect of putting it in force be to stop his business and thereby defeat the creditors? That that would necessarily be the case the bankrupt knew; the defendants also knew that that would be its effect. Now I cannot see any objection that can be taken to that direction. The section of the act of parliament under which the question arises, is section 67. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and that section, as I will read it shortly, says, that if a trader makes a fraudulent transfer of any of his goods with intent to defeat his creditors that shall be an act of bankruptcy. Now, there was here, in point of fact, a transfer. What was the necessary effect of it? Why the necessary effect was to defeat creditors. Then a man, in law, is taken to contemplate the necessary consequence of his own act. I think that, therefore, you get that ingredient added, that there is an act of transfer with the intent to do that which is the necessary consequence of the act, and that is to stop his trade and necessarily to delay his creditors. Then having all those ingredients at present the only question remains, was it a fraudulent transfer? The word "fraudulent" Mr. Field presses upon us as the important point in the case, and we have to say what is the meaning of the word "fraudulent" in the section of the act of parliament. It seems to me that all the authorities almost are uniform upon that subject, and it is not necessary that there should be moral fraud. The great point to look at is this, would it have the effect of defeating and delaying the creditors? and if so, it is fraudulent within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act, the object of which is, that the goods of the debtor shall be divided rateably among his creditors. Mansfield, C.J. lays it down in Morgan v. Horseman (12), that "a conveyance either of all or part of a man's property in favour of fewer than all the creditors is an act of bankruptcy, because it is the means whereby the creditors may be defeated and delayed;" and that case is followed up by numerous other cases, down to the late case of Smith v. Cannon (8). Parke, B. there again says, "The test is, whether the result and necessary effect is to delay and defeat the creditors." I take it, therefore, if that is its effect, it is fraudulent within the meaning of this section of the act. I think with that view of the act of parliament, in association with all the authorities, the learned Judge could not have left it to the jury in any other way.

MARTIN, B.—I think, assuming that the cases cited from the Courts of equity are correct, if the verdict had been the other way, there would have been ground to move for misdirection. If the cases of Ex parte Bailey (4), Ex parte Wensley (5) and Goodricke v. Taylor (6) be law, they go much beyond my direction in this matter. The question in this case is, whether an act of bankruptcy was committed by the execution of the deed of the 3rd of November 1864; and the first thing to ascertain is, what were the circumstances of the bankrupt at that time? His circumstances were these: that he was a man possessed of a number of carts and horses, and some little stock-in-trade; that he used the carts and horses for the purpose of carting goods for hire, and he also was an agent for the sale of coals, and upon that day his own account of the matter, which was wholly undisputed, was, "I executed this bill of sale, which includes all the tangible property I possessed." "But at that time," he says, "I had some land, but it was mortgaged, and there were about 50*l.* of book debts due to me, 22*l.* of which were good, and the rest was doubtful." That was the state of things, and he tells us one of the defendants, who were relatives of his, applied to him for payment of his debt; and he further states, "I knew if the bill of sale was enforced, it would stop my business at once." That is his own account, and his son says the same thing, and it is proved by both himself and his son that the defendant knew that the debtor was not able to pay 5*s.* in the pound. In that state of things he executed this bill of sale, and he says, if the bill of sale is put in force it was calculated to stop his business. It was put in force, and it did stop his business that very moment. Mr. Field, in his argument, contends that we are to ascertain what proportion the property conveyed by the deed bears to the whole of the property of the assignor, and the amount of the property excepted from the deed is the test whether the deed is an act of bankruptcy or not, and if that mode were adopted here the conveyance would not be a conveyance of all the trader's property. All the property the man really had was the equity of redemption, and I am not aware of any mode by which that was available to the creditors, short of paying off the debt or filing a bill in equity. That is a very different thing from a man having available property with which he may go into the market. With respect to the verdict, I think no other verdict could be expected.

Rule discharged (13).

(13) The learned counsel for the defendants asked for leave to appeal, stating that he had applied to the learned Judge for leave to move the Court; but the Court refused to grant leave to appeal, Martin, B. stating that the learned counsel ought to have tendered a bill of exceptions to his ruling.

1865. } KERSHAW v. OGDEN AND
May 8. } OTHERS.

Statute of Frauds—Sale of Specific Goods—Acceptance and Actual Receipt.

The defendants agreed by parol to purchase of the plaintiff four specific stacks of cotton waste at 1s. 9d. per pound. They sent their own packer with their sacks and their own carts to fetch it; their packer packed the waste into eighty-one sacks, twenty-one of which were weighed and then loaded on the defendants' cart and taken to the defendants' premises; the rest of the sacks were not weighed. On arrival of the twenty-one sacks at the defendants' premises they refused to accept any portion of the waste, on the ground that it was of inferior quality:—Held, that the property in the waste passed to the defendants, and that there was sufficient evidence of an acceptance and receipt to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

Declaration contained a special count for not accepting certain cotton waste, and a count for goods bargained and sold, and goods sold and delivered, and money due on accounts stated.

Pleas: First, that the defendants did not buy the goods; secondly, that the defendants were ready and willing to accept, but that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to deliver; fourthly, to the common count, never indebted.

The cause was tried, at Leeds, before Mellor, J. The facts as found by the jury were, that in December 1863, one Greenhalgh, an agent of the defendants, went to the plaintiff's warehouse, where he saw five stacks of cotton waste; one of them being of inferior quality, he negotiated with the plaintiff for the purchase of the other four. He asked for a sample. The plaintiff declined to sell by sample, but told him, "You see the waste, examine it as much as you please, and take a sample yourself." Greenhalgh took a sample and asked for a guarantee that the bulk was equal to sample. The plaintiff refused to give any guarantee, but stated that the waste was all alike, for it was made from one description of cotton. After some negotiation the defendants' agent agreed to purchase the four specific stacks at 1s. 9d. per pound, the defendants to send their own packer and sacks and their carts to remove it. On the 3rd of January following the defendants sent their packer with eighty-one sacks to pack the waste, and he, assisted by the plaintiff's men, packed the four stacks purchased into the eighty-one sacks. On the 5th of January twenty-one sacks were weighed, put into the defendants' cart and, with a delivery order stating the weights, taken to the defendants' premises. The rest of the sacks were not weighed. The same day the twenty-one sacks were returned to the plaintiff by the defendants with a note, stating that the waste was of an inferior description to that purchased by the defendants. The cart loaded with the waste was left at the plaintiff's warehouse, who, to prevent it from spoiling, gave directions to place it under shelter, and the next day it was taken back into the plaintiff's warehouse. The learned Judge left the question to the jury, whether the defendants did accept and actually receive part of the goods; that if so their verdict must be for the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 784*l.*, the price of the cotton waste; and the learned Judge reserved leave to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit on two grounds: First, that there was no evidence of an acceptance and actual receipt of the goods, so as to constitute a binding contract under the Statute of Frauds; and, secondly, that the property in the goods did not pass to the defendants.

Brett having obtained a rule accordingly, E. James and Holkar shewed cause.—First, the defendants purchased certain ascertained goods, viz., four specific stacks of cotton waste, and when the defendants' packer put the waste into the sacks there was an acceptance of the goods. The Statute of Frauds, however, requires an actual receipt as well as acceptance; here the two concurred, for when the defendants' servants put the waste into the cart and took it away, there was an actual receipt; and it was held in Cusack v. Robinson (1), that the acceptance may precede the receipt. Next, it will be said, on the other side, that the whole of the sacks were not weighed; and that, as something remained to be done, in order to ascertain the price to be paid for the waste, the property did not pass until the sacks were weighed, and Simmons

(1) 1 B. & S. 209; s.c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 261.

v. Swift (2) will be relied on; but that case is explained in Furley v. Bates (3), and the Court in their judgment lay down a principle which governs the present case; it is there said, "It is clear that this rule does not apply if the parties have made it sufficiently clear whether or not they intend that the property should pass or not, and that their intention must be looked at in every case." Here the parties intended that the property in the waste should pass when the defendants' own men put it into the sacks.

Brett and T. Jones, contra.—The plaintiff has recovered in this action for the whole price of the goods sold, and he can, therefore, only retain his verdict on the count for goods bargained and sold. Now there is no evidence of any contract under the Statute of Frauds; to constitute such a contract there must be an acceptance of part and an actual receipt of the goods. In Bill v. Baiment (4), Lord Wensleydale, then Parke, B., said, "To take the case out of the 17th section there must be both delivery and acceptance; and the question is whether they have been proved in the present case. I think they have not. I agree that there was evidence for the jury of acceptance, or rather of intended acceptance. The direction to mark the goods was evidence to go to the jury quo animo the defendants took possession of them. But there must also be a delivery; and to constitute that, the possession must have been parted with by the owner, so as to deprive him of his right of lien." Now, here there was neither a delivery nor an acceptance. The defendants' packer was not an agent to accept, and immediately the goods arrived on the defendants' premises they sent them back to the plaintiff because they were of inferior quality. The facts shew that there was no intention on the part of the defendants to accept the goods.—They also referred to Castle v. Swoorden (5).

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are both of opinion, and as far as the argument had proceeded, my Brother Bramwell was of the same opinion, that this rule ought to be discharged (6). I think the case is not distinguishable in principle from the case cited of Furley v. Bates (3), and it really was a question for the jury, what was the character of the delivery to the defendants, the taking the goods to the defendants' place of business, and the plaintiff afterwards housing the goods to prevent mischief from accruing to them. The jury have decided those facts in favour of the plaintiff. I own I do not see any reason to question the propriety of what the jury have found, and so I think the rule must be discharged. With respect to the question of nonsuit. I think the direction of the Judge to the jury was perfectly right; the question was properly left to the jury, and the Judge does not disagree with the finding of the jury. I think the rule should be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question depends upon what was the contract, and the jury have found the contract was, that the defendants agreed to buy from the plaintiff four stacks of cotton waste specifically mentioned, more or less, taking them for better or worse. If the finding is, as I have no doubt it was, right, the result was, the property in the four stacks became the property of the buyers, the defendants, and the plaintiff became entitled to the price in an action for goods bargained and sold, if the Statute of Frauds was satisfied. The Statute of Frauds requires that there shall be an acceptance of part of the goods so sold and an actual receipt; and if the contract is as I have here stated, the defendants sent their own man, and their own cart, and their own packer to pack their own goods and bring them away, and the moment they were put into the cart and taken away, I should say before, but certainly when they were put into the cart for the purpose of bringing them away, there was evidence to go to the jury of an acceptance and receipt; and if the jury had found that there was not, I should have been prepared to set aside the verdict as being a verdict against evidence. I am therefore clearly of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

1865. } COOPER AND OTHERS v. BILL
 April 28. } AND ANOTHER.

Contract—Sale of Goods—Transfer of Possession—Stoppage in Transitu—Unpaid Vendor's Lien.

The defendants entered into a contract with G. as follows: "21st of September 1864. Sold to G. the oak timber offered to him at the prices stated in his letter of the 12th of September, viz., trees of 60 feet and upwards at 2s. 8d. per foot; trees under 60 feet 2s. 5d. per foot, delivered to boats. The above to be 12 inches girth and upwards; and two coffin logs, at 4s. per foot. Payment 100*l.* by bill at one month, and balance by bill at four months from measurement." The timber had been brought by the defendants to certain wharves belonging to the Herefordshire Canal Company. On the 7th of October G.'s agent measured the timber, marked it and had it "squared," paying 5*l.* to the persons employed. On the 15th of October G. gave 100*l.* bill at one month, which was paid, and two other bills, one for 100*l.* and the other for 75*l.* at four months. While these last bills were running G. became insolvent and made an assignment of his estate to the plaintiffs as trustees for the benefit of creditors; the defendants took possession of the timber and claimed to retain it as unpaid vendors:—Held, in an action by the plaintiffs, the Court having power to draw inferences of fact, that there was a transfer of the possession of the timber to G. the vendee, and that the vendors had no lien for the price.

The plaintiffs sued—as trustees of the estate and effects of H. Gurney, a debtor, for and on behalf of his creditors, under a deed made between H. Gurney and the plaintiffs, relating to the administration of his estate according to the clauses of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861,—for the detention of certain timber.

The defendants pleaded—First, non detinet. Secondly, not possessed. Thirdly, that before the alleged detention and before the execution of the alleged deed, the defendants agreed to sell to H. Gurney, and H. Gurney agreed to buy of the defendants, the timber in the declaration mentioned, at certain prices and on certain terms, amongst others, to be delivered by the defendants to boats, payment of 100*l.* by bill at one month and balance by bill at four months from measurement; and thereupon afterwards the defendants consigned and lodged the said timber at certain wharves and into the possession of certain wharfingers, preparatory to delivery thereof to boats, in pursuance of the contract, and H. Gurney delivered to the defendants a promissory note for the said 100*l.* at one month, and two other promissory notes at four months for 100*l.* and 75*l.* respectively, being the price of the balance of the timber, which promissory notes were respectively made by H. Gurney and payable to the defendants' order: and that before payment of the two last-mentioned promissory notes for 100*l.* and 75*l.* H. Gurney stopped payment, and became insolvent and unable to meet his engagements; and whilst H. Gurney was insolvent, and whilst the timber was so lodged at the said wharves and in possession of the said wharfingers, and whilst the same was in course of transit from the defendants to H. Gurney, and before the delivery of the same or any part thereof to boats, or to H. Gurney, and before the same or any part thereof had come into the possession or control of H. Gurney, or of the plaintiffs as trustees as aforesaid, and whilst the two promissory notes for 100*l.* and 75*l.* for the balance of the price of the timber were wholly unpaid, and whilst the defendants were unpaid vendors of the timber, they, the defendants, on account of the insolvency, then stopped the said timber in transitu, and caused the wharfingers to retain the same, and the defendants afterwards refused to deliver the same to H. Gurney or the plaintiffs as trustees as aforesaid, which is the alleged detention.

Fourth plea—That the defendants repeat the allegations contained in the third plea relating to the sale by the defendants and purchase by H. Gurney of the timber and the terms thereof, and the making and delivering by H. Gurney to the defendants of the promissory notes for and on account of the price; and that before the said goods or any part thereof had been delivered to boats, or had come into the possession or control of H. Gurney, or of the plaintiffs as trustees, and before payment of the two promissory notes for 100*l.* and 75*l.*, and before the defendants ever parted with the possession of the goods or any of them, H. Gurney stopped payment, and became insolvent and unable to meet his engagements; and thereupon, whilst H. Gurney was insolvent, the defendants, as unpaid vendors, detained and still detain the said goods as a lien for the unpaid part of the purchase-money, which is the alleged detention.

At the trial, before Keating, J., at the Hereford Assizes, the following facts were proved: H. Gurney was a timber-merchant, residing at Birmingham, who, on the 21st of December 1864, made an assignment of his estate and effects to the plaintiffs, as trustees on behalf of his creditors, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The defendants Benjamin Bill and Edward Bill were timber-dealers at Ledbury. In the summer of 1864 E. Bill offered to sell Gurney some oak timber. Gurney directed his agent, one Firmer, to examine and report upon it. At that time part of the timber was lying at the old wharf at Ledbury, part at the wharf at Canon Froome, and a large tree was in a field about a mile and half from Ledbury. Firmer saw the timber and reported favourably to Gurney. The following correspondence then took place between Gurney and the defendants.

" Birmingham, September 12th, 1864.

" Dear Sirs,—I will agree to purchase your oak timber of 12 inches girth and upwards, on the following terms, at Ledbury and Canon Froome, to be delivered free to boats when required. Trees of 60 feet and upwards at 2*s.* 8*d.* per foot. Under 60 feet, 2*s.* 5*d.*; a fair abatement to be made in measurement for any defects. No quarter inches to be taken in the girths, and no half feet in the whole lengths of the trees. There is one red butt which I cannot take. I will try and deal for some of the smaller trees when I measure the others. Payment by my acceptance at four months date from measurement. If this is all fully agreed, and I suppose it is, as they are the terms you named here, I will send and measure as soon as I am in receipt of your reply.

" Ledbury, September 13th, 1864.

" Dear Sir,—We are in receipt of your letter, and in reply we accept your offer for the oak timber, but, with regard to payment, we shall want 100*l.* paid when it is measured, or on the 30th of September next (as we have two heavy accounts to pay on the 1st and 2nd of October), the remainder a four months' bill from date of measurement. Please let us know whether these terms will suit you.

" Bill & Son."

" Birmingham, 14th September 1864.

" Dear Sirs,—You agreed to the four months' bill when you were here. I should not get enough out of it to make it worth while to pay 100*l.* cash, as that would be nearly half the amount, and you can pay my bill into the bank to meet your engagements. You must not depart from the terms you agreed to when here.

" H. Gurney."

After some negotiation the following contract was entered into.

" 21st September 1864.—Sold to H. Gurney the oak timber offered to him at the prices stated in his letter of the 12th of September, viz., trees of 60 feet and upwards at 2*s.* 8*d.* per foot, trees under 60 feet at 2*s.* 5*d.* per foot, delivered to boats. The above to be 12 inches girth and upwards; and two coffin logs, at 4*s.* per foot. Payment 100*l.* by bill at one month, and balance by bill at four months from measurement.

Bill & Son."

After this contract was entered into, Gurney sent his agent Firmer to measure the timber, which the agent did on the 7th of October. At this time the tree in the field had been removed to Ledbury Wharf, and the measurement took place at the Canon Froome and Ledbury Wharves. On measuring the timber Gurney's agent "scribed" or cut out the initials of H. Gurney, and also numbered each tree; H. G. was also marked with a hammer and punch on each tree. After the timber had been measured and marked, the agent gave orders to two of Gurney's men, whom he had brought with him to assist in the measurement, to "square" the timber. This occupied about ten days, and cost 5*l.*, which Gurney paid. On the 15th of October Gurney sent the promissory notes to the defendants, one for 100*l.* at one month, and two at four months for 100*l.* and 75*l.* respectively, and wrote to the defendants, "You have to deliver the timber to the boats according to the agreement. I forget whether you wish to freight the timber here when it is required. Please say, and your lowest rate per foot." The defendants replied, "As regards carrying the timber we should like to carry it, but cannot quote the rate unless we know where it is to go to." Upon which Gurney informed them "that the timber would have to be delivered at Birmingham, and at the Saltley works." The defendants wrote to Gurney in reply that their terms were 4d. per foot to Birmingham, and 4½d. per foot to the Saltley works.

The Ledbury and Canon Froome Wharves are the property of the Herefordshire Canal Company, and are termed "free wharves." They were used by the defendants for the purpose of depositing their timber until it was sold, when it was conveyed to its destination by canal. The timber in question was not placed on the wharves at the water's edge, but would require labour to bring it to the water's edge, and in some cases horse labour. The bill for 100l. at one month's date was duly paid at maturity. But before the other two bills fell due, and while the timber still remained at the wharves, Gurney became insolvent, and on the 21st of December 1864, made an assignment of his estate to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The plaintiffs, as trustees, demanded the timber, and the defendants gave up a portion sufficient to cover the amount of the promissory note which had been paid, but refused to deliver up the rest.

On these facts being proved it was agreed between the parties, with the sanction of the learned Judge, that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs for 175l., and that the defendants should have leave reserved to move to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit, upon the ground that the defendants were entitled to stop the timber in transitu: the defendants admitting that the property in the timber vested in the plaintiffs before action, and the Court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact if necessary.

Powell having obtained a rule accordingly,—

was at an end when the timber was placed on the wharves ready to be put into the boats, and that the expression "free to boats" did not mean that the timber was to be delivered free on board the boats, but was to be placed near the boats so as to be convenient for loading. Secondly, they contended that the acts of measuring, marking and "squaring" the timber, and the fact that the promissory notes in payment were to be given from the measurement of the timber, was sufficient evidence to shew that it was the intention of the parties that the right of possession passed to Gurney, and that the defendants' lien as unpaid vendors was gone.

Powell and Matthews, contra, contended that by the contract the defendants were to deliver the timber "free to boats," that is, that the timber would have to be carried from where it was placed to the water's edge, and that it would require labour to do so; and that until the timber was removed from the wharf to a place convenient for loading, the transitus was not at an end, and that the defendants were entitled to stop it in transitu; but, at all events, they had a right to retain possession of the timber for their lien as unpaid vendors. That the acts of measuring, marking and squaring the timbers were done for the purpose of ascertaining the price to be paid and in order to complete the bargain; but they were not done with the intention of taking possession. They cited Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), Gibson v. Carruthers (2), Whitehead v. Anderson (3) and Dixon v. Yates (4).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. It appears to me that this is just one of those cases where the use of the term "stoppage in transitu" is very much calculated to mislead. The question is not one of stoppage in transitu; but it is whether the lien of the vendors has ceased by their allowing the vendee to take possession of the goods, which were not in the possession either of the plaintiff or of the defendant, but of a third person, a wharfinger. I own, it appears to me, it is very much more a question of fact than of law; the question being whether the vendor had allowed the vendee to take actual possession of the goods for which he had given three bills, one of which for 100*l.* was duly paid. In point of fact, it appears to me the vendee had taken actual possession of the timber. The vendor allowed the vendee to go to the place where the timber was, to mark it with his initials, and to expend money in having the timber "squared," as the expression is. I think these facts shew that the vendee actually took possession of the timber, and preclude the vendor from afterwards setting up a lien upon the goods. It seems to me the defendants' case is answered by saying, not that the transit was at an end, but by saying that the vendor had parted with his lien by allowing the vendee to take possession of the goods, the goods being out of the possession of the vendor and in the possession of a third person, the wharfinger. I think it is very possible that if the goods had not gone out of the actual possession of the vendors, and had not been partially paid for, the Court might have held that the defendants might have been entitled to have said The goods shall not go out of our possession till we are paid. But that is not the case here, and I therefore think the rule ought to be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—I am by no means certain that, upon the true construction of the contract, Mr. Huddleston's view is not right. But I am clearly of opinion it was a question of fact upon which the jury ought to arrive at a conclusion that there was an actual transfer of the possession of this timber from the vendor to the vendee. It would appear that the vendors were persons who, in addition to selling timber, had boats on the canal, because from some letters it clearly appears that the vendee Gurney, in the letter of the 5th of October, asks this question, "I forget whether you wish to freight the timber when it is required. Please say, and your lowest rate per foot." They were timber-dealers as well as boatmen; they had timber on the banks of this canal, which they themselves frequently carried for the vendee to such places as the vendee desired it to be brought. Under those circumstances, the defendants enter into this contract: "September 1864. Sold to H. Gurney the oak timber offered to him at the prices stated in his letter of the 12th of September, viz., trees of 60 feet and upwards at 2*s.* 8*d.* per foot, trees under 60 feet 2*s.* 5*d.* per foot, delivered to boats. The above to be 12 inches girth and upwards; and two coffin logs, at 4*s.* per foot. Payment 100*l.* by bill at one month, and balance by bill at four months from the measurement." Accordingly, the measurement took place, and after the measurement the bills were drawn, in pursuance of the contract; the first was paid, and afterwards, or about the same time, I dare say it was part of the same transaction, H. Gurney's agent marked and numbered the timber. If that were the state of things alone, I apprehend it would be a question of law and fact, whether the real meaning was not that the property in possession vested in the vendee from the time of the measurement. If Mr. Powell's argument is right, then this consequence would necessarily follow, that if after the measurement, and after the bills had been given, and after the person had agreed absolutely to pay the bills when they fall due, this timber had been burnt, it would, according to his argument, have been at the risk of the vendors, and it would have been an answer to the bill in the hands of the vendors, that the property was still in them, and there was no consideration for the bills. I apprehend it is a much more reasonable construction of the contract that the measurement was to be made, the property passing, and the possession passing, that the bills were then to be given, and would be absolutely payable, and the timber, after it was initiated and numbered and marked, should be squared at the risk of the vendee; he was to take the risk as he would have to pay the bills; and if part of the contract was "to deliver to boats," that the vendors should convey the timber to the boats was a contract wholly collateral to the main one with the vendee, and did not affect the transfer or the possession. It seems to me, upon this evidence, if we are to draw inferences of fact, no one can fail to draw the conclusion that as between these parties when once the timber was measured and paid for, and marked and numbered and then squared, it was the intention of the parties that the vendee was to take the timber. He could do what he pleased with it; he could have altered its destination. The consequence then is, that though these bills had not been paid, the vendors had no right to meddle with this timber, and are responsible to the assignees of the vendee.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think Mr. Powell has raised the right question, and argued it in the right way, but it seems to me, nevertheless, that we must decide the question of fact, which is left for us to decide, against him. I cannot doubt that but for the stipulation "free to boats," there would have been a perfect delivery, and if there had been a change of property and a change of possession, the vendors' lien would have been gone. Are we, because there is that stipulation to draw a contrary inference to what we should otherwise have drawn? There seems no reason why we should. If the goods had been left at the warehouse of the defendants themselves, and these things had been done, the defendants would have had a right to say You must not leave these things here, you must take them away. In this case the timber had actually been in the possession of the vendee for a period of twelve days, and yet it is said there is no transfer of possession. There is no difficulty in supposing possession was delivered, even if some little matter remained to be done. It is not unlike the case of a man who sells a looking-glass, undertaking at the same time to fix it: he does sell it, and the fixing remains to be done; he has parted with his lien. I think there is considerable difficulty on another point, that is to say, the defendants retain a portion of these goods only. I am not at all sure that their right as unpaid vendors when the whole of the goods are in their possession, is not to rescind the contract or to avail themselves of the power to retain the whole and return the money they have received. I think the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

May 10. } MORGAN v. GATH.

Contract—Goods Bargained and Sold—Acceptance of lesser Quantity than ordered—Statute of Frauds.

The defendant on the 14th of April signed the following bought note: "I have this day bought from you the following: 500 piculs China cotton at 17d. per lb., June or July delivery, guaranteed fair, marks to be given when cotton ready for delivery; in case of dispute arising out of this contract, the matter to be referred to two respectable brokers for settlement, who shall decide as to quality and allowance, if any, to be made; the cotton to be taken from the warehouse with customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from the date of the notice being given that the cotton is ready for delivery; to be delivered in merchantable condition to the buyer; the damaged, if any, to be rejected, provided it cannot be made merchantable." The defendant sold the cotton to Curry on the 25th of June. The plaintiff declared the marks on 420 piculs ex Queensbury, which were warehoused at the docks, and 80 piculs ex Princess Royal, but he never was in a position to deliver the latter. Owing to a dispute as to the quality of the 420 piculs of cotton, the matter was referred and an allowance made. The 420 piculs were afterwards weighed, the price ascertained, the invoice made out, and subsequently, at the defendant's request, corrected by deducting the amount of the allowance:—Held, that there was evidence that the defendant consented to take the 420 piculs, and the property in the same passed to him so that the plaintiff could maintain an action for goods bargained and sold.

The declaration contained an indebitatus count for goods bargained and sold, goods sold and delivered, money paid, money received, interest, and money due on accounts stated. The second count alleged that by a certain agreement the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant, and the defendant agreed to buy and accept from the plaintiff a large quantity, to wit, 500 piculs China cotton, of a certain quality and description at a certain price to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, and to be delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant as herein mentioned, and notice of the said cotton being ready for delivery to be given by the plaintiff to the defendant as therein mentioned. And the plaintiff says that all things on the plaintiff's part were done, and all conditions precedent happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said cotton accepted by the defendant, and to be paid the said price for the same, and to bring this action; yet the defendant did not and would not accept the said cotton from the plaintiff, and did not and would not pay to the said plaintiff the said price for the same, whereby the plaintiff has lost the price of the said cotton and has been put to great expense in keeping and taking care of the same, and has lost great sums of money upon the re-sale of the said cotton.

The defendant pleaded, to the first count, never indebted; to the second he pleaded traverses of the agreement, and of notice of the plaintiff's being ready and willing to deliver, and a plea alleging that the said contract was made between the plaintiff and the defendant subject to a condition on the part of the plaintiff that the plaintiff would deliver the said cotton in merchantable condition, and that at the time when the plaintiff was ready and willing to deliver the cotton it was not in merchantable condition; wherefore and by reason of the premises the defendant refused to accept and to pay for the said cotton. On these pleas issue was joined.

There were other pleadings, but it is unnecessary to mention them.

The cause was tried, at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1865, before Mellor, J. and a special jury, when evidence was given to the following effect: The plaintiff and the defendant were cotton-brokers in Liverpool; the former agreed to sell to the latter 500 piculs China cotton, and the following is a copy of the bought note, which was addressed to the plaintiff and signed by the defendant:

"Liverpool, 14th April, 1864.

"I have this day bought from you the following (500) five hundred piculs China cotton, at seventeen pence (17d.) per lb., June or July delivery 1864. Guaranteed fair, marks to be given when the cotton is ready for delivery. In case of dispute arising out of this contract, the matter to be referred to two respectable brokers for settlement, who shall decide as to quality and the allowance, if any, to be made. The cotton to be taken from the warehouse with customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from the date of the notice being given that the cotton is ready for delivery. To be delivered in merchantable condition to the buyer; the damaged, if any, to be rejected, provided it cannot be made merchantable. Payment within ten days from date of invoice or before delivery, if required, equal to cash in ten days and three months."

On the 24th of June the plaintiff bought from certain persons trading under the style of Whitaker & Co. 190 bales China cotton ex Queensbury; this quantity was estimated to be equivalent to about 420 piculs. On the 25th the plaintiff sent to the defendant a declaration, of which the following is a copy:

"Mr. Samuel Gath.

"I beg to declare the following as ships' names and marks against 500 piculs China cotton sold you 14th April, 1864.

[P] 420 piculs ex Queensbury.

"Liverpool, 25th June, 1864."

This declaration was unsigned and did not contain the usual words "Invoice to date from to-day"; it also omitted to state that the cotton was then ready for delivery. The defendant entered into a contract to sell to the firm of Curry & Co. the cotton which he had bought of the plaintiff. On the 4th of July the plaintiff received from Messrs. Whitaker & Co. a notice that the cotton would be weighed over, which he indorsed over and sent to the defendants. The cotton was accordingly weighed. On the same day the plaintiff met Mr. Curry, who objected that no notice that the cotton was ready for delivery had been sent; the plaintiff proposed that the notice should date from that day, to which Mr. Curry replied, "Very well," and went away. The plaintiff received a sampling order from Messrs. Whitaker and forwarded it to the defendant. The plaintiff met the defendant, and pressed for payment of the price of the cotton; he answered that when Messrs. Curry paid 1,000*l.*, which they would shortly do, he would pay it over to the plaintiff. Messrs. Curry sent through the defendant a request for an arbitration, and each party appointed a broker as arbitrator. The arbitration was proceeded with, and resulted in the allowance of one-eighth of a penny per lb., the plaintiff's arbitrator (who was called as a witness) alleging that if the cotton had been unmerchantable, it would have been rejected and no allowance would have been made. Messrs. Whitaker, not having been paid for the 190 bales by the plaintiff, on the 27th of July put a stop-order on the cotton, i.e. forbade its delivery to his order, and it was admitted that the 80 piculs ex Princess Royal were never in his possession, and that he never was in a position to deliver them. Evidence was given to shew that the damaged portions had been picked out of the 190 bales by the 1st of June, and that the residue was merchantable; it was further shewn that Curry & Co. applied for, and on the 11th of July received, samples of the cotton, which still remained, until the 1st of December, at the Albert Docks, Liverpool. The invoice was sent back to the plaintiff to have the amount of the allowance deducted from the price of the cotton; this having been done, the document was returned to and kept by the defendant. On the 24th of October the plaintiff's attornies wrote to the defendant, demanding payment. On behalf of the defendant evidence was given to shew that the cotton was unmerchantable at the time of the arbitration, and that the stop-order was not taken off until the 1st of December, after the present action had been commenced; it was elicited that the defendant had indorsed a sampling order, dated the 7th of July, and drawn by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had lodged a delivery order from Messrs. Whitaker at the docks, about the end of June.

The learned Judge, in the course of his summing up, stated that, though the contract might be for 500 piculs June or July delivery, if the defendant chose to accept the declaration of a portion of them, and to take sampling orders, to submit to an arbitration, and when he had received the invoice of the portion ex Queensbury, to send it back again to the plaintiff to have the allowance made upon the quantity therein specified, the defendant might have rendered himself liable to accept the smaller quantity, and the plaintiff would not be bound to deliver the whole, because the defendant by his conduct would have intimated his willingness to take the smaller amount, provided the cotton was fair and merchantable, and that the question seemed to be the same as if the plaintiff had offered to the defendant the 500 piculs. His Lordship left it to the jury to say whether the defendant accepted the lesser quantity mentioned in the invoice, whether the cotton was merchantable, and whether notice was given that it was ready for delivery; the jury having found all those questions in the affirmative, the verdict was entered for the plaintiff and the damages were assessed at 2,852*l.* 4*s.*, being the invoice price of the 460 piculs of cotton with the deduction of the allowance; leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or to enter a verdict for nominal damages if the Court should be of opinion that the breach occurred on the 31st of July, cotton at that date not having fallen in price, or to reduce the damages to 845*l.* 2*s.* if the Court should be of opinion that the breach occurred on the 24th of October, the date of the letter written to the defendant by the plaintiff's attornies, cotton then fetching 1*s.* per lb.

Brett had this Term (22nd of April) obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered, on the ground that the plaintiff was never ready to deliver 500 piculs of cotton in the contract mentioned, and that there was no evidence of a binding agreement by defendant to take less, and if there was there was no count in the declaration to support such contract; or, why the verdict should not be reduced to nominal damages on the ground that there was no fall in the market at the time of the breach of contract, or to 845*l.* 2*s.*

Edward James and C. Crompton shewed cause.—If the defendant did not attend the weighing over of the cotton, at least he had notice from the plaintiff that the 190 bales would be weighed: a request was made on behalf of Messrs. Curry & Co., who are in this respect identified with the defendant: moreover, Messrs. Curry applied for, and received samples. It is admitted that if samples are unfair, a purchaser is not bound; but here it is not even pretended that they were in the least unfair. The question seems to be whether the contract being for one entire quantity the plaintiff can be allowed to recover for the sale of a less number of piculs than the number stipulated for. It is submitted that the property in the cotton passed to the defendant, and if the Court be of that opinion, the plaintiff will be entitled to retain the verdict under the count for goods bargained and sold; the vendor has done all that was necessary to vest the property in the purchaser, who is therefore liable to pay the full contract price.

[MARTIN, B.—If a man agrees to sell 100 quarters of wheat, and afterwards finds that he possesses only eighty, which the buyer consents to accept, this is tantamount to a waiver of the former contract: no action could be maintained by the vendee, against the vendor for the omission to deliver the whole number of 100 quarters.]

They referred to Dixon v. Yates (1).

Brett and Arthur Peel, in support of the rule.—The Judge directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff merely as matter of form. The contract was to be performed in June or July. The question is, was the plaintiff ever willing to deliver the cotton contracted for during June or July? That he was bound to do by the written agreement. When a purchaser has contracted to take a certain quantity of goods, he is compellable to accept that quantity only, and is not bound to receive a smaller amount, but it is said that the defendant was bound to accept the 420 piculs instead of 500.

[MARTIN, B.—No; the question put was, did he accept them?]

It is submitted that the jury found only that there was an agreement to accept, and not an actual acceptance: the plaintiff is not entitled to recover on such a contract for the 420 bales, as it is not in writing, and is not declared on; the plaintiff was not ready to deliver even a part of them. The defendant could not be held liable until the end of July, and had all that time in which he could accept.

[MARTIN, B.—The parties to the suit disagree as to the inference to be drawn from the facts: on the evidence there seems to me a perfectly valid bargain and sale, if not sale and delivery. POLLOCK, C.B.—The property in the cotton which was weighed over, did pass to the defendant.]

To make this contract to accept the 420 piculs good, there must be an actual receipt of them by the defendant; owing to the stop-order he could not get possession of the cotton ex Queensbury. There never was any evidence of actual acceptance, and the property in the 420 piculs did not pass. If that be so, the plaintiff can sue only for the refusal to accept, and will be entitled only to the difference between the amount mentioned in the invoice and the price in the market at the time when the breach occurred. Although the contract was entered on 14th of April, no attempt was made to shew that the plaintiff was ready to deliver more than 420 piculs; as to them there was no acceptance to prevent the operation of the Statute of Frauds, section 17; the delivery order was worthless; owing to the stop-order the plaintiff could not pass the property in the cotton ex Queensbury; it is submitted that the defendant did not assent to the contract of sale for the 420 picula.

POLLOCK, C.B.—My Brother Martin and myself are agreed that the rule should be discharged. The jury have found that the lesser quantity was accepted, and I think there were grounds for their so finding. The learned Judge reserved leave to move to enter a nonsuit, or nominal damages, or to reduce the damages to 845*l.* 2*s.* But the verdict was given upon the fact that there was an acceptance of the lesser quantity by the defendant, and it appears to me that there was evidence on which they were entitled so to find. As to the amount of damages, on which point the learned Judge reserved two questions for this Court, it appears to me that we are not called upon, and are not entitled to disturb the verdict. The chief complaint urged during the argument on the defendant's behalf was that the verdict was against the evidence. The point was for the jury: they have found that the lesser quantity was accepted; and there was evidence on which they could legally give their verdict for the plaintiff on that ground. I am therefore of opinion, that the rule ought to be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—When this case comes to be understood, it is exceedingly clear. So far from our judgment being at variance with the opinion of my Brother Mellor, it is in complete accordance with it, and his view is stated in the most distinct terms, and it is manifest that, in his judgment, if the jury should find the verdict which they did, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the invoice price of the goods. It is as plain as it possibly can be, that that was his statement to the jury, and we entirely concur with him. The question which has been raised is, whether we are of opinion the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict in its present form. I do not entertain a doubt upon it. It seems that, upon the 14th of April 1864, Morgan agreed to sell to Gath, the defendant, 500 piculs of china cotton at 17*d.* per lb., June or July delivery 1864, guaranteed fair. There is the ordinary stipulation in all these cotton contracts, that in case of dispute the matter should be referred to two respectable brokers for settlement. It appears Morgan had not then the cotton, but he afterwards purchased a certain portion, which was in reality 420 piculs, from a person named Whitaker, and he received from Whitaker upon the 27th of June a delivery order. Now, a delivery order is familiar to most persons: it is an order from the vendor in favour of the vendee to be delivered to the warehouseman; and the delivery order was lodged at the docks, according to the evidence of the principal officer, somewhere about that time. Then, as to the sampling order; Morgan, the plaintiff, delivered it to Gath the defendant, and it was acted on and signed by him. The next step is the weighing, and at the head of the invoice the weight of each bale is separately put down, and the calculation made is 2,783*l.* 17*s.* This invoice was sent in in the ordinary course. But some objection was made to the quality of the cotton, and the defendant gave the ordinary notice to act upon the second condition of the contract: "In case of dispute arising out of this contract, the matter to be referred to two respectable brokers." The two brokers met, and they decided that an allowance should be made of 1*d.* a pound; the invoice is sent back, and a deduction is made from the original price, making a net sum of 2,852*l.* 4*s.* Afterwards the invoice is sent in to the defendant, who never makes the slightest objection to it. That is what took place about the beginning of July. Afterwards there was, upon the 27th of July, this stop order; and if the defendant or Messrs. Curry, who were the sub-vendees from him, had claimed to get these goods at any time after the stop was put on, and insisted on the delivery, and had failed to obtain it, a different question might have been raised; but nothing of the kind was done. The defendant seemed to have determined not to take this cotton from Morgan, and there it remained. The stop was taken off on the 1st of December, and no attempt had ever been made by the defendant, or by the sub-vendee, to get possession of this cotton, during that period. The Judge gave his opinion upon the state of things at the completion of the invoice; and in my judgment, the goods having been weighed, the price ascertained, the invoice having been sent in, corrected and made in accordance with the decision of the two referees, there was evidence to go to the jury that the property in this cotton had passed; and if it became vested in Gath, and ceased to be vested in Morgan, this action for goods bargained and sold can be maintained.

Now, it is said that it cannot, because, first, there was a contract for 500 piculs, and not 420. If the defendant had stood upon that, it would have been unanswerable. I apprehend that now no action could be maintained upon that contract by the plaintiff, because he was never ready and willing to deliver 500 piculs in pursuance of it. If the property passes in the portion which he has agreed to take, just as if the whole had been weighed to him, then, I am of opinion, there is no new contract at all, nothing to require a second writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. There is no doubt if there be an agreement to sell 500 piculs of cotton, and the vendee assents to take a part in performance, that is 420, of it, and if that part is weighed to him, he becomes indebted to the vendor for the goods which he so consented to take. The learned Judge upon the evidence left it to the jury: first, "was the lesser quantity accepted?" and the jury found in the affirmative; and also "was the quality merchantable?" and the jury found that it was. Therefore, it seems to me, everything has been done which was necessary for the purpose of passing the property in these 420 piculs to the defendant; and the jury have found that he actually accepted it. I think it is an exceedingly clear case, and my judgment entirely accords with that of the Judge who tried the cause.

Rule discharged.

1865. } WEBBER v. THE GREAT WESTERN April 29. } RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers by Railway—Parties—Contract to carry over another Company's Line—Evidence.

Goods were delivered to P. & Co., agents at Worcester for the Great Western Railway, to be carried to Chester "via Stafford." The goods were conveyed over the line of the Great Western Railway from Worcester to Stafford, and thence to Chester over the London and North Western Company's line, the Great Western Railway having no line between Stafford and Chester. The waggons of the Great Western Company travelled the whole journey. P. & Co. were also agents for the London and North Western Company, whom they favoured rather than the Great Western Company:—Held, that there was evidence of one contract with the Great Western Company to carry the whole journey from Worcester to Chester, and that they were therefore liable for any damage done to the goods during the journey.

This was an action for negligence in carrying the plaintiff's clock from Worcester to Chester. The question of law was—were the Great Western Railway Company properly made defendants?

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Chester Spring Assizes, 1865, evidence was given that the clock was delivered at Worcester to Pickford & Co., who in their advertisements held themselves out as agents for the defendants; that the clock was forwarded by the West Midland Railway, of which the defendants were lessees; that the plaintiff was informed of the arrival of the clock at Chester by the London and North Western Railway Company, over whose line it had travelled from Stafford to Chester, the defendants having no line between those places; that it was clearly expressed, at the time of the delivery of the clock to Pickford & Co., that it should go via Stafford; and that it travelled in the defendants' waggons all the way to Chester. It also appeared that Pickford & Co. were agents for the London and North-Western Railway as well as for the defendants, and that they favoured the London and North-Western Company. On its arrival at Chester the clock was found to be damaged, but it did not appear when or where during the journey the damage had taken place.

Blackburn, J. told the jury that if the defendants contracted to carry the clock the whole way to Chester, they were liable for the damage done; but that if they contracted to carry it a part of the way only, they would not be liable, unless the damage was done during that part of the journey. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 5*l.*, Blackburn J. reserving leave to move to set that verdict aside.

W. R. Grove having obtained a rule accordingly, on the ground that there was no evidence on which the jury ought to have found that the defendants were liable,— M'Intyre now shewed cause, contending that the London and North Western Company merely acted as agents for the defendants in carrying the goods from Stafford to Chester. On the defendants' own handbill it was stated that the goods would be sent "via Stafford," and it was by means of the production of the defendants' handbill that the consignee got possession of the goods at Chester. He cited Muschamp v. the Lancaster and Preston Railway Company (1), Scothorn v. the South Staffordshire Railway Company (2), and The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company v. Collins (3).

(3) 7 H.L. Cas. 194; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 41.

Grove (with him Horatio Lloyd), contra, contended that Pickford & Co. were acting here for the London and North Western Company, and not for the defendants, for it was shewn that they favoured the London and North Western Company, and that they had a direct interest in forwarding the goods by the line of the London and North Western Company from Stafford.

[MARTIN, B.—If the goods had been lost between Worcester and Stafford, who would have been liable?]

If the damage had happened on the defendants' line, they would have been liable whether Pickford & Co. had intervened or not. Again, Pickford & Co. are not merely agents, but large carriers themselves; therefore, either they are liable as the persons who originally took the goods from the customer, contracting to carry them the whole way, or the London and North Western Company are liable, for whom Pickford & Co. acted in receiving the goods. The test is—who was dominus stineris? Muschamp's case (1) only decided that where nothing was said about the route, there was a prima facie liability on the part of the company receiving the goods (4).

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, C.B. (May 9) delivered the judgment of the Court (5).—In this case I am of opinion, with the rest of the Court, that there was evidence to go to the jury that there was one contract only, and not two contracts. The jury have so found, and we are of opinion there was sufficient evidence to warrant their finding; and, if we take it to be a correct finding, then the judgment of the Court will follow conclusively that there was but one contract. Therefore the defendants are liable, and the verdict must stand.

Rule discharged (6).

(4) In reply to a question from the Bench, McIntyre stated that after Brown v. the London and North Western Railway Company (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 318), this action could not be brought in the County Court.

TRINITY TERM, 28 VICTORIÆ.

1865. } PRIESTLEY v. FERNIE AND
June 23. } ANOTHER.

*Ship and Shipping—Master—Owner—

A separate action cannot be maintained against the master and the owner of a ship for the same identical cause of action. The creditor has an election to sue either the one or the other; but he cannot, after he has sued the one to judgment, maintain another action against the other.

The declaration stated, that Daniel Kavanagh, master of the vessel called The Queen of Commerce, for a voyage of the said vessel from the port of Liverpool to Hobson's Bay, Port Phillip, signed the following bill of lading:

"Shipped in good order and condition, except chips and sand-cracks, by Edmund Thompson, &c., agents for Harper & Moore, in and upon the good ship or vessel called The Queen of Commerce, whereof Kavanagh is master for this present voyage, and now lying in the port of Liverpool and bound to Hobson's Bay, Port Phillip, 264 retorts, being marked and numbered and enumerated as per margin, and are to be delivered in the like order and condition, except chips and sand-cracks or breakage arising from any cause, save improper stowage, and, subject to the under-mentioned clauses, from the ship's tackle, at the aforesaid Hobson's Bay or railway pier (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, fire and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind excepted) unto the Melbourne Gas Company, or to their assigns, freight for the said goods being payable in Melbourne as per margin, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master of the said ship or vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the rest to stand void.

"Weight, contents, and value unknown, and not answerable for breakage arising from any cause except the improper stowage, nor for loss by fire, vermin, or collision. Goods for the bay or railway pier, if not taken from alongside within three days after ship's arrival, may be landed by ship's agents, and all expenses to be paid before delivery; all risk of river craft and lighterage to be borne by the shippers.

"Entries to be passed by consignees within twenty-four hours after arrival of ship, or ship's agent to do so, at consignees' expense. Dated, in Liverpool, this 24th day of November 1860.

"Daniel Kavanagh."

And the following words, being part of the said bill of lading, are printed across the said bill of lading to the left of the matter before copied :

"Freight, if payable in Liverpool, to be paid in cash on signing bills of lading. Freight, if payable abroad, to be paid in cash before delivery of goods to charterer's agents, Messrs. Swire Brothers."

And in the margin of the said bill of lading the said goods and the freight thereof, and the said primage are thus described :

264 retorts, weighing 86 tons 12 cwt., at 55s. per ton	£238 3 0
Primage 10 per cent.	23 16 8

And the said company, by their agents in that behalf, shipped and delivered such goods as are specified in the said bill of lading to the defendants, and they accepted and received of and from the said company the same on board the said vessel, in such order and condition as are mentioned in the said bill of lading, to be by the defendants conveyed in the said vessel to such place and for such purpose, and subject to such terms and conditions as are in the said bill stated and contained, and the said vessel completed the said voyage, and everything has been done and happened, and all times elapsed requisite to enable the said company to have all the said terms observed and performed, and the said goods delivered to the said company at the place in the said bill of lading specified in that behalf, and in the order and condition contracted for, and to entitle the plaintiff suing as aforesaid to recover in this action in respect of the matters in this count stated, yet the defendants, although not prevented by the said excepted dangers, accidents, causes, matters or things, or any of them, failed to deliver the said goods to the said company, in the order and condition contracted for, and wholly failed to deliver part of the said goods to the said company, and have delivered part of the said goods not in the order and condition contracted for, but in bad order and condition, and damaged otherwise than in any of the said excepted particulars, and otherwise than by or through the said excepted dangers or accidents, causes, matters and things, or any of them, and thereby the said company have lost the said goods so not delivered as aforesaid, and the said goods so delivered as aforesaid have become of less value to the said company.

Fifth plea—That the plaintiff as such secretary as in the declaration alleged, and on behalf of the said company, heretofore, in the Supreme Court of Melbourne, in the colony of Victoria, then having jurisdiction in that behalf, impleaded the said Daniel Kavanagh in the declaration mentioned as and being the master of the said ship, and signing the said bill of lading for the same identical causes of action as in the declaration alleged, and such proceedings were thereupon had in the said court that the plaintiff as such secretary recovered against the said Daniel Kavanagh 140*l.* 3*s.*, for the said cause of action, and his costs of suit in that behalf; and afterwards the plaintiff, as such secretary as aforesaid, and on behalf of the said company, in the Court of Exchequer of Pleas at Westminster, impleaded the said Daniel Kavanagh for and in respect of and upon the said judgment so recovered as aforesaid and such proceedings were thereupon had in that action that the plaintiff afterwards, by the judgment of the said last-mentioned Court, recovered against the said Daniel Kavanagh 288*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, and his costs of suit in that behalf, and after the recovery of the said last-mentioned judgment, the plaintiff, for having satisfaction thereof, caused to be duly issued out of the said Court of Exchequer of Pleas a writ of ca. sa. upon the said judgment, and by virtue of which said writ the said Daniel Kavanagh was before this suit duly taken in execution at the suit of the plaintiff, and was kept and detained in custody to satisfy the plaintiff in the said action; and that they are being sued in this action in respect of the said Daniel Kavanagh having signed the said bill of lading as master of the said ship on behalf of the defendants as owners thereof, and that they are not otherwise liable in this action.

Second replication to the fifth plea—That the said Daniel Kavanagh, being a prisoner under the said writ, became bankrupt within the meaning of the statutes in force concerning bankrupts, and thereupon was discharged from custody under the said writ of ca. sa., without the consent of the plaintiff, by act of law under and by virtue of the statutes then in force relating to bankrupts, and that such proceedings were had in the matter of the said bankruptcy that the said Daniel Kavanagh afterwards and before this suit duly obtained an order of discharge under the said statutes, and was thereby discharged of and from the said judgments, and each of them, and the said judgments are and each of them is wholly unsatisfied, and the plaintiff had not at any time before the recovery of the said judgment in the said Court of Exchequer, or before the said Daniel Kavanagh obtained his order of discharge as aforesaid, notice or knowledge that the said bill of lading and contract were made by the defendants or any of them.

The plaintiff also demurred to the fifth plea.

Rejoinder as to the said second replication—That after the said Daniel Kavanagh became and was bankrupt as in the said replication mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff was admitted to prove, and proved, in respect of the said judgment so recovered in the said Court of Exchequer as aforesaid, against the estate of the said Daniel Kavanagh, under the said bankruptcy, for the amount due upon the said judgment.

The defendants also demurred to the second replication.

Quain, in support of the demurrer to the plea.—There is an express authority against the plea. In Story on Agency, section 295, that learned writer says, "There seems, however, to be one peculiarity in the Roman law on this subject, and that is, that while it gives a right to proceed against the owner or employer, as well as against the master of the ship, for the amount of the repairs and supplies furnished for the ship and for other contracts made by him within the scope of his employment, yet if the creditor elects to proceed in a suit against either of them, he thereby discharges the other. Our law, on the other hand, while it gives an election to the creditor to sue either the master or the owner in a distinct and separate action, does not preclude the creditor by such an election from maintaining another action against the party not sued, unless in the first action he has obtained a complete satisfaction of the claim." Now, in the first action the plaintiff has not obtained a complete satisfaction. This case is like that of principal and agent; and where the contract has been made with the agent, the principal is not discharged unless it be shewn that it is unfair to sue the principal—Thompson v. Davenport (1). If this plea is good, the principal is discharged without any release, without any matter amounting to a discharge, and without being liable over to the agent. Is he discharged by bringing an action? It is submitted that he is not. Bringing an action does not conclusively shew that the plaintiff has elected to sue the master, particularly when the replication alleges that the plaintiff had not at any time before the recovery of the judgment notice or knowledge that the defendants were the owners of the vessel. In Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 161, the law is thus laid down: "The master is always personally bound by his contracts, and the person who deals with the captain in a matter relative to the usual employment of the ship, or for repairs or supplies furnished her, has a double remedy. He may sue the master on his own personal contract, and he may sue the owner on the contract made on his behalf by his agent the master." It would appear to be clear from this passage that the plaintiff has a double remedy against the master and against the owner. Then, by analogy to the rule which prevails in the cases of principal and agent, if there is a remedy against both, the owner is not discharged unless there has been a settlement of accounts between the principal or agent, or unless the day of payment is allowed to go by, so as to lead the principal into the supposition that the agent alone is held to be liable. The arrest of the master does not operate as a satisfaction of the debt; it is no such satisfaction as discharges the surety; between collateral parties, as in the present case, it is only quasi satisfaction.

R. G. Williams (Aspinall with him), in support of the plea.—The only authority that can be found in support of this action is the passage cited from Story. In Abbott on Shipping, p. 124, 8th edit., it is laid down: "It is true that the master also is answerable for his own contract; for in favour of commerce the law will not compel the merchant to seek after the owners and sue them, although it gives him the power to do so; but leaves him a two-fold remedy against the one or the other." The passage cited from Kent's Commentaries lays down the same proposition. The position of the master and the owner of a vessel is different from that of principal and agent; it is the only case in which the law gives a special privilege of suing either the master or the owner. Besides, no case has been cited in which, after the agent has been sued and arrested, an action was held to lie against the principal. Thompson v. Davenport (1) is no authority for such a proposition. In the case of principal and agent the seller has his election whether he will proceed against the one or the other, and directly he brings his action he has made his election. But there are not two contracts, and he cannot have two actions for the same identical cause of action. Here the plaintiff has elected to sue the master, and he has made no inquiry as to who the owners were. In the case of principal and agent, the proceedings against the principal must be taken within a reasonable time; here too long a time has elapsed to proceed against the owners. The action against the master at Melbourne, the action on the judgment in this country, the arrest, and proving on the estate in bankruptcy are all strong evidence of acts of election to proceed against the master, and the plaintiff having made his election to look to the master cannot now sue the owners. The replication does not allege that the master is not an owner, it only states that the present defendants were not known to be owners; it is consistent with the statement in the replication that the master was an owner and known to the plaintiff as an owner.

Quain, in reply.

BRAMWELL, B. —'The judgment I am about to deliver is the opinion of my Lord Chief Baron, my Brother Channell, and myself. My Brothers Martin and Pigott did not hear the case.

We are of opinion our judgment should be for the defendant. If this were an ordinary case of principal and agent, where the agent having made a contract in his own name, has been sued on it to judgment, there can be no doubt that no second action would be maintainable against the principal. The very expression that where a contract is so made the contractee has an election to sue agent or principal, supposes he can only sue one of them—that is to say, sue to judgment. For it may be that an action brought against one might be discontinued and fresh proceedings be well taken against the other. Further, there is abundance of authority to shew that where the situation of the principal is altered by dealings with the agent as principal, the former is no longer subject to an action. But this is not the case here. The defendants may or may not be liable to indemnify the master in respect of his costs or his imprisonment; they may or may not be, but they are clearly liable to him or his estate in respect of the damages recovered against him, and proceedings might have been taken against them as soon as judgment was recovered against the master and before any payment by or execution against him. They are now, therefore, under a liability to the master or his estate to the extent of the whole claim, and yet it is sought to bring them under a fresh liability for that to the plaintiff. If this, then, were the ordinary case we have mentioned, there could be no doubt on the subject. But it is said that the liability of the master of a vessel acting for his owners and their liability where he acts for them is different from the liabilities in ordinary cases of principal and agent, and that first one and then the others may be sued. The plaintiff's argument then is, that the present case is anomalous and exceptional. Where that is contended for, strong reasons ought to be given for it. What reason is given here? It is certain that the master's liability is founded on the same considerations as that of an ordinary agent, namely, he makes the contract in his own name—Rich v. Coe (2), Story on Agency, sect. 296. But it is said that for purposes of commerce it is convenient that both master and owner should be suable. So it is; but why to the extent contended for, more than in any other case of principal and agent? It might be hard to make a person who deals with the master run after the owner to sue him; but why, if he sues the master, should he afterwards sue the owner, merely because it is very right he should be able to sue the master or owner? In reality no reason can be given for the distinction attempted between this and other cases of principal and agent. We do not say none could be given why, in all cases of principal and agent, both should be suable, but that there is no particular reason applicable to the masters and owners of ships. The case then must rest not on principle but on authority, and that authority is limited to a passage in Story on Agency. It is remarkable that he is of opinion that there was by the Roman law an option to sue either, but not both. If so, what he lays down is peculiar to our law, and doubly anomalous. He gives no reason for it, but cites Livermore on Agency, vol. 2, 167, 169 (edit. 1818). He (Story) says, the second action may be maintained, unless "in the first action he has obtained a complete satisfaction of the claim." On reference, however, to Livermore (we say it with great respect), he really says nothing in support of such a proposition; what he says is, "Masters of merchant-vessels are personally answerable upon the contracts made by them in relation to the employment of the ship, to repairs, or to supplies furnished for the ship's use. For the law gives to the merchant who contracts with the master a twofold remedy against the owners and against the masters." For this he cites Rich v. Coe (2), which, though a very questionable decision, justifies Livermore's proposition, but not Story's. It only decides that the owners are liable upon an order by the master for necessaries though without their authority. It is true Lord Mansfield says the master, the owner, and the ship are trusted, but he says nothing to support what is contended for. It is remarkable that Story does not cite this authority so cited by Livermore. Melius est petere fontes, quam sectari rivulos. Then really there is no authority for this contention, while there is much the other way in the silence of all other writers on the subject. It is not suggested in Abbott on Shipping, 91, nor in Kent's Commentaries (see 2 Kent, 599; 3 Kent, 217), nor in Maude and Pollock, see 112; nor in MacLachlan, see p. 128; nor in 1 Parsons on Maritime Law, 37. There is one powerful consideration the other way, namely, if the master contracts under seal, no action lies on the contract against the owners. Why? If the master makes two contracts, one for himself and one for his owners, why should his contract, being under seal, prevent the owners being sued on that which he the master has made for them? Nothing. But if he makes one contract only, as in ordinary cases, where the agent contracts in his own name, which the merchant may say binds him because made in his own name, or binds his owners because made for them, then the decisions are intelligible and the expression is correct, the owners are not liable because of a technical rule that a contract under seal cannot bind a person not executing without giving authority under seal for its making—See Abbott on Shipping, edition 1856, p. 169. Leslie v. Wilson (3) is not opposed to this. Therefore we give judgment for the defendant.

June 23. } ANOTHER.

Trespass—Negligence—Escape of Water from Artificial Reservoir—Consequential Damage.

The defendants employed a competent engineer and contractor to select a site for, and to construct a reservoir on their land. During the construction, the contractor's people met with some old vertical shafts (of the existence of which the defendants were ignorant), and they failed to exercise reasonable skill and care, with reference to these shafts, to provide for the pressure the reservoir was intended to bear. The water from the reservoir escaped down the shafts, through certain old coal workings, under the defendants' land, and under land between the defendants' land and land of the plaintiff, into the plaintiff's colliery, which was thereby flooded:—Held, by Pollock, C.B. and Martin, B., that, this damage not being the immediate result of the defendants' act, there must be negligence to render them legally responsible to the plaintiff; and that the defendants, being ignorant of the existence of the circumstances requiring the exercise of unusual care on their part, were not guilty of negligence.

Held, by Bramwell, B., that, the plaintiff having the right to be free from water sent to him through any artificial course by the defendants—whether directly or indirectly,—this action was maintainable on that right being infringed; and that the defendants' knowledge or ignorance of the damage likely to result from their act was immaterial.

This action came on to be tried at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1862, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 5,000*l.* and 40*s.* costs, subject to the award of an arbitrator, who afterwards was empowered by Judge's order to state a special case instead of making an award. The material parts of the CASE were as follows.—

On the 17th of November 1849 the plaintiff became tenant of certain beds of coal lying under certain lands belonging to the Earl of Wilton, situate in the township of Ainsworth, in the county of Lancaster, with powers of winning and getting the same at a certain acreage rent for the coal gotten; and on the same day an agreement in writing was entered into, whereby the Earl of Wilton agreed to demise to the plaintiff for sixteen years, from the 24th of March 1855, all the beds of coal lying under the said last-mentioned lands, and also under certain other lands, situate in the township of Radcliffe, in the same county, at the same acreage rent as before. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff commenced boring for the coal; but finding the same would not be worth working, he obtained verbal permission from Lord Wilton to work the beds of coal lying under certain other lands lying to the north of the said first-mentioned lands, but not including the site of the reservoir hereinafter mentioned; and in or about the month of April 1850 the plaintiff commenced sinking a pit in the said other lands lying to the north of the said first-mentioned lands; and later in the same year he commenced getting, by means of that pit, the coal lying under the other lands to the north of the first-mentioned lands. The pit so sunk is hereinafter called the "Red House Pit," and the colliery worked thereby the "Red House Colliery." He continued to work the Red House Colliery until the year 1855, when he commenced also to work the coal under the lands in the township of Radcliffe mentioned in the agreement, from which time until the bursting of the defendants' reservoir, as hereinafter mentioned, he continued to work both the said collieries.

8. In the year 1860 the defendants, who were the proprietors of a mill near to the Red House Colliery, called the "Ainsworth Mill," made a reservoir, for the purpose of supplying their said mill with water, in certain other land belonging to Lord Wilton, lying to the north-west of the Red House Colliery, and separated therefrom partly by land belonging to Walker Hulton, Esq., and partly by land belonging to John Whitehead, Esq. This was done by virtue and in pursuance of an arrangement made by them for the purpose with Lord Wilton.

9. The said land of Mr. Hulton partly adjoins on its east side the land of Mr. Whitehead; on its north side the said land of Lord Wilton in which the defendants' reservoir was made; and on its south side the land under which lay the beds of coal worked by the Red House Colliery. The land of Mr. Whitehead, except where it is adjoined by the land of Mr. Hulton, is entirely surrounded by Lord Wilton's property, and on its south side is partly adjoined by the land under which lay the beds of coal worked by the Red House Colliery.

11. The beds or seams of coal in Lord Wilton's land, worked by the Red House Colliery, are continued under the lands of Mr. Hulton and Mr. Whitehead, and under the land of Lord Wilton in which the said reservoir was made. The dip of these beds or seams of coal is downwards from about north-east to south-west.

12. It was not known to the defendants, or to any of the persons employed by them in or about the selecting of the site, or the planning or constructing of the reservoir, until after the reservoir burst as hereinafter mentioned, that any coal had been worked under the reservoir, or under any of the land of Lord Wilton lying to the north of the land of Mr. Hulton; but, in point of fact, the coal under the site of the reservoir, and under the last-mentioned land of Lord Wilton lying between the site and the land of Mr. Hulton, as well as under the lands of Mr. Hulton and Mr. Whitehead, had been partially worked at some time or other beyond living memory; and when the plaintiff commenced working the Red House Colliery, and from thence until the bursting of the reservoir as hereinafter mentioned, old coal workings under the site of the reservoir communicated with old coal workings under the land of Mr. Whitehead, by means of other and intervening old coal workings under the land of Mr. Hulton and the land of Lord Wilton lying to the north of the land of Mr. Hulton.

13. Soon after the plaintiff commenced to work the Red House Colliery he made arrangements with Mr. Whitehead to get, by means of the Red House Pit, the un-gotten coal lying under the land of Mr. Whitehead; and, in pursuance of the arrangements so made, he did, accordingly, in or about the year 1851, work through from the Red House Colliery into the coal lying under the land of Mr. Whitehead, and so into the old coal workings under the last-mentioned land. This was done by the plaintiff, in the first instance, without the knowledge or permission of Lord Wilton; but afterwards, and whilst the plaintiff was employed in working the coal under Mr. Whitehead's land by means of the Red House Pit as aforesaid, it became known to Lord Wilton's agents that the plaintiff was so working that coal, and from that time the plaintiff so worked that coal without any objection on their part.

15. In consequence of the plaintiff's working through from the Red House Colliery into the old coal workings under the land of Mr. Whitehead, the old coal workings under the site of the reservoir were,—by means of the aforesaid intervening underground coal workings under the lands of Mr. Hulton and Mr. Whitehead, and the land of Lord Wilton lying to the north of the land of Mr. Hulton,—made to communicate with the plaintiff's coal workings in the Red House Colliery in such a manner that water, which found its way into the coal workings under the reservoir, would, through and by means of such underground communications, flow down to and into the plaintiff's coal workings in the Red House Colliery.

16. These underground communications were effected several years before the defendants commenced making their reservoir, and continued down to the time of the bursting thereof; but the fact of their existence was not known to the defendants, or to any agent of theirs, or to any person employed by them, until after the bursting as hereinafter mentioned.

17. In the course of constructing and excavating for the bed of the reservoir, five old shafts running vertically downwards were met with in the portion of land selected for the site of the reservoir. At the time they were so met with the sides or walls of at least three of them were constructed of timber, and were still in existence, but the shafts themselves were filled up with marl or soil of the same kind as the marl or soil which immediately surrounded them; and it was not known to or suspected by the defendants, or any of the persons employed by them in or about the planning or constructing of the reservoir that they were (as they afterwards proved to be) shafts which had been made for the purpose of getting the coal under the land in which the reservoir was made, or that they led down to coal workings under the site of the reservoir.

18. For the selection of the site of the reservoir, and for the planning and constructing thereof, it was necessary that the defendants should employ an engineer and contractors, and they did employ for those purposes a competent engineer and competent contractors by and under whom the site was selected, and the reservoir was planned and constructed; and, on the part of the defendants themselves, there was no personal negligence or default whatever in or about or in relation to the selection of the site, or in or about the planning or construction of the reservoir; but, in point of fact, reasonable and proper care and skill were not exercised by or on the part of the persons so employed by them with reference to the shafts so met with as aforesaid, to provide for the sufficiency of the reservoir, to bear the pressure of water which, when filled to the height proposed, it would have to bear.

19. The reservoir was completed about the beginning of December 1860, when the defendants caused the same to be partially filled with water; and on the morning of the 11th of December in the same year, whilst the reservoir was so partially filled, one of the shafts which had been so met with as aforesaid gave way and burst downwards; in consequence of which the water of the reservoir flowed into the old coal workings underneath, and by means of the underground communications then existing between those old coal workings and the plaintiff's coal workings in the Red House Colliery as above described, large quantities of the water so flowing from the reservoir as aforesaid found their way into the coal workings in the Red House Colliery, and by reason thereof the said colliery became and was flooded, and the working thereof was obliged to be and was for a time necessarily suspended.

20. The plaintiff took immediate steps to pump out the water so flooding the colliery, for the purpose of enabling him to proceed with the working thereof; and as soon as the water was sufficiently pumped out therefrom, he proceeded to dress up the workings thereof and to repair the damages done to them by the flooding; but whilst he was employed in dressing up and repairing the damages done to the said workings, and before the colliery was restored to a condition to admit of the working thereof being recommenced, the boiler of the steam-engine used by him in working the said colliery, and which was necessary for the purpose of pumping and keeping the colliery clear of water, exploded, in consequence of which the pumps so used by the plaintiff for keeping the colliery clear of water could not be worked, and the workings of the colliery again gradually filled with water, naturally arising and accumulating therein.

21. An inspector of coal-mines afterwards visited the Red House Colliery officially for the purpose of inquiring into the said explosion, and he was made acquainted with the fact of the water from the defendants' reservoir having escaped from the reservoir and flooded the colliery as aforesaid; and he warned the plaintiff of the danger and responsibility he would incur if he employed men in the colliery whilst the reservoir was used for storing water, unless means were taken to prevent the flooding of the colliery; and in consequence of the warning so given to him, the plaintiff abandoned and gave up the said Red House Colliery, and since the explosion of the boiler, the colliery has been entirely abandoned and given up as a working colliery.

22. At the time when the plaintiff so abandoned and gave up the colliery there was not any water in the reservoir; but the defendants, with the view and intention of again using the reservoir for storing water, were then proceeding to repair it, and taking such steps as were deemed sufficient to make the same secure for that purpose. There was reason, however, to fear, at the time when the plaintiff abandoned and gave up the colliery, that if the reservoir was again used for the storing of water, it might again burst and cause the colliery to be flooded; and in point of fact the reservoir, on being again filled with water after the defendants had so repaired it, did again burst down one of the shafts; but whether the water of the reservoir on this occasion flooded or would have flooded the Red House Colliery is not known, this colliery having been previously abandoned, and being then filled with water which had naturally arisen and accumulated therein.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from the defendants by reason of the matters stated in the case.

Manisty (J. A. Russell with him), for the plaintiff.—The defendants are liable on the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. If a man collect a dangerous element, be it fire or water, on his own land, and suffer it to escape on to mine, he is liable to me for the injury I sustain in consequence. He may collect it if he likes, but he must take care that it does not trespass on to my land. I may be bound to receive water, naturally flowing from above; but, if the watercourse be artificial, I am not so bound—Smith v. Kenrick (1) and Tenant v. Goldwin (2), both cited in Hodgkinson v. Ennor (3), and Baird v. Williamson (4).

[BRAMWELL, B. — Baird v. Williamson (4) establishes that the defendant could not do intentionally what he has done here.]

In Groucott v. Williams (5), where damage was claimed for the loss of a mare that fell down an old mine-shaft in a field, Blackburn, J. said, "Where an alteration has been made in the normal state of things, the person who makes it is the one upon whom the liability is thrown, to take care that no injury result." So, Chauntler v. Robinson (6), per Parke, B., Sutton v. Clarke (7), and Tubervil v. Stamp (8). —He also cited Alston v. Grant (9), Bagnall

v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (10), Bonomi v. Backhouse (11).

[MARTIN, B.—Chadwick v. Trower (12) is against you.]

It is not in point. There were there two adjoining houses, each with an underground vault. Besides, the dicta in that case are to be distinguished from the judgment, which proceeded on the ground that there was no allegation of any right of the plaintiffs to have their vault supported by the vault or walls of the defendant.

[MARTIN, B. referred to Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (13).]

In that case there was a statutory power to use the engine.

Mellish (T. Jones with him).—There is no decision precisely in point. The case depends on principle only. If a man does something secretly on his own land which he has a right to do, the effect being that something, which his neighbour has a right to do, becomes by the secret act dangerous; the latter not having acted negligently, cannot be held liable for the consequences of the secret act. The maxim, Sic utere tuo, &c., is not absolute in its application. It means that one is to take all reasonable care not to injure another. The essence of this case is that the danger was unknown. In all the cases cited, the danger or the probability of damage was known. This being a case of consequential damage, negligence must be proved. There is no analogy between this case and that of damage from fire; for the liability as to fire existed by virtue of the custom of the realm, as in the case of carriers and innkeepers—see Com. Dig., tit. 'Action on the Case for Negligence,' A. 6, and Filliter v. Phippard (14). The cause of the thing being dangerous here was something being done by the plaintiff on his own land secretly. Tenant v. Goldwin (2) is easily distinguishable. Lord Holt there said "it was the defendant's wall and the defendant's filth; and he was bound of common right to keep his wall so as his filth might not damnify his neighbour"; and the declaration was held good on account of the words debuit reparare. In Smith v. Kenrick (1) the act was done purposely. Cresswell, J. in that case comments on all the cases cited on the other side. In Lawrence v. the Great Northern Railway Company (15) the damage was caused by a direct act of the defendants. In Hodgkinson v. Ennor (3) foul water was turned into a running stream. In Chauntler v. Robinson (6) the only decision was that the declaration was bad. Sutton v. Clarke (7) contains a dictum only in favour of the plaintiff, and Tuberville v. Stamp (8) was a case on the custom of the realm. Trouer v. Chadwick (12) is in the defendants' favour, if negligence has to do with the case. If there was carelessness here, it was on the part of the plaintiff who had opened the old working, and not of the defendants. And even if the contractor knew of the danger, the defendants are not on that account liable—Butler v. Hunter (16).

Manisty, in reply.—The plaintiff has a right to enjoy his property without interruption from his neighbour, except so far as regards servitudes of nature and right. He is under a servitude to receive natural water in his mine, but not foreign water brought on his land by the hand of man. The defendants' misfortune is not to be visited on the plaintiff. It is the misfortune of those who, though unknown to themselves, had the defect in their own land. Neither wilfulness nor negligence is necessary, where there is a right infringed. Still, even if negligence be necessary to support the action, it has been found as a fact that there was negligence (17). The contractor delivered over the reservoir in what appeared to be a perfect state, and the plaintiff has no remedy against him.

BRAMWELL, B.—The facts on which, as it seems to me, the question here depends, are as follow: The plaintiff is the occupier of mines, which he has worked to the boundary of the property in or under which they are. The defendants have made a reservoir, and filled it with water, on the surface of property separated from the plaintiff's by property of an intervening owner. The water has escaped down old shafts into old workings on the defendants' premises, has passed through other old workings in the intermediate premises, has reached the plaintiff's workings, and done him damage. The defendants were not aware of the old underground workings, nor of the communication between them. I agree with Mr. Mellish, that the case is singularly wanting in authority, and, therefore, while it is always desirable to ascertain the principle on which a case depends, it is especially so here.

Now, what is the plaintiff's right? He had the right to work his mines to their extent, leaving no boundary between himself and the next owner. By so doing, he subjected himself to all consequences resulting from natural causes; among others, to the influx of all water naturally flowing in; but he had a right to be free from what has been called foreign water—that is, water artificially brought or sent to him directly, or indirectly by its being sent to where it would flow to him. The defendants had no right to pour or send water on to the plaintiff's works. Had they done so knowingly, it is admitted an action would lie, and that it would if they did it again, is also proved by the case of Hodgkinson v. Ennor (3). The plaintiff's right then has been infringed. The defendants, in causing water to flow to the plaintiff, have done that which they had no right to do. What difference, in point of law, does it make that they have done it unwittingly? I think none; and, consequently, that the action is maintainable. The plaintiff's case is, "You have violated my right; you have done what you had no right to do, and have done me damage." If the plaintiff has the right I mention, the action is maintainable. If he has it not, it is because his right is only to have his mines free from foreign water sent by the act of those who know what they are doing. I think this is not so. I know no case of a right so limited. As a rule, the knowledge or ignorance of the damage done is immaterial. The burthen of proof of this proposition is not on the plaintiff.

I proceed to deal with the arguments the other way. It is said, there must be a trespass or nuisance with negligence. I do not agree with that, and I think Bonomi v. Backhouse (11) shews the contrary. But why is not this a trespass?—see Gregory v. Piper (18). Wilfulness is not material—see Leame v. Bray (19). Why is it not a nuisance? The nuisance is not in the reservoir, but in the water escaping. As in Bonomi v. Backhouse (11), the act was lawful, the mischievous consequence was a wrong. Where two carriages come in collision, if there is no negligence in either, it is as much the act of the one driver as of the other that they meet. The cases of carriers and innkeepers are really cases of contract, and, though exceptional, furnish no evidence that the general law, in cases wholly independent of contract, is not what I have stated. The old common law liability for fire created a liability beyond what I contend for here. I cannot think Trower v. Chadwick (12) opposed to this view. The Court there held the count bad. They laid stress on the defendant not having notice; but I think the decision would have been, and properly, the same, had he had notice, because it was not shewn that there was any right in the plaintiff to have his vaults so built as to impose on the defendant the burthen of pulling down his premises in any particular way, or with any particular care. On the other hand, the cases of Bonomi v. Backhouse (11), Hodgkinson v. Ennor (3) and Tenant v. Goldwin (2) seem, in principle, in point for the plaintiff. It is clear that, in the latter case, the Court decided that the defendant must, at his peril, keep his filth from injuring his neighbour, for it is a charge of common right, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas.

(18) 9 B. & C. 591.

I think, therefore, on the plain ground that the defendants have caused water to flow into the plaintiff's mines, which, but for the defendants' act, would not have gone there, this action is maintainable. I think that the defendants' innocence, whatever may be its moral bearing on the case, is immaterial in point of law. But I may as well add, that if the defendants did not know what would happen, their agents knew that there were old shafts on their land; knew, therefore, that they must lead to old workings; knew that those old workings might extend in any direction, and, consequently, knew damage might happen. The defendants surely are as liable as their agents would be. Why should not both be held to act at their peril? But I own, this seems to me, rather to enforce the rule, that knowledge and wilfulness are not necessary to make the defendant liable, than to give the plaintiff a separate ground of action. My judgment is for the plaintiff.

MARTIN, B.—The circumstances of this case raise two questions: First, assuming the plaintiff and the defendants to be the owners of two adjoining closes of land, and at some time or other beyond living memory coal to have been worked under both closes, and that the workings under the close of the defendants communicated with the workings under the close of the plaintiff, but that of the existence of such workings both plaintiff and defendant were ignorant, and that the defendants, without any negligence or default whatever, made a reservoir upon their own land for the purpose of collecting water to supply a manufactory, and that the water escaped from an old shaft at the bottom of the reservoir into the old workings below the defendants' close, and thence into the plaintiff's close, and did damage there,—are the defendants responsible?

The second question is, assuming the defendants not to be responsible upon the above state of facts, does it make any difference that they employed a competent engineer and competent contractors who were ignorant of the existence of the old workings, and who selected the site of the reservoir and planned and constructed it, while on the part of the defendants themselves there was no personal negligence or default whatever, but in point of fact, reasonable and proper care and skill were not exercised by and on behalf of the persons so employed, with reference to the old shafts found at the bottom of the reservoir, to provide for the sufficiency of the reservoir to bear the pressure of the water, which, when filled to the height proposed, it would have to bear?

It has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that the first question ought to be decided in the affirmative. Several cases were cited in support of this view, but it was admitted that none of them were direct authorities. Several dicta and opinions of Judges were also cited, but it seems to me, that it cannot be affirmed, that in any one of them the Judge had clearly in his contemplation the state of things supposed by the first question to exist. If, therefore, there is no authority either way, the case must be decided upon principle and legal analogy.

First, I think there was no trespass. In the judgment of my Brother Bramwell, to which I shall hereafter refer, he seems to think the act of the defendants was a trespass; but I cannot concur, as I own it seems to me that the cases cited by him, namely, Leame v. Bray (18) and Gregory v. Piper (17), prove the contrary. I think the true criterion of trespass is laid down in the judgment in the former case, namely, that to constitute trespass, the act doing the damage must be immediate, and that if the damage be not immediate but consequential, which I think the present was, it is not trespass. Secondly, I think there was no nuisance in the ordinary and generally understood meaning of that word; that is to say, something hurtful or injurious to the senses. The making a pond for holding water is a nuisance to no one. The digging a reservoir on a man's own land is a lawful act. It does not appear that there was any embankment, or that the water in the reservoir was ever above the level of the natural surface of the land; but the water escaped from the bottom of the reservoir, and, in ordinary course, would descend by gravitation into the defendants' own land, and they did not know of the existence of the old workings. To hold the defendants liable, would therefore make them insurers against the consequence of a lawful act upon their own land, when they had no reason to believe or suspect that any damage was likely to ensue. No case was cited in which the question has arisen as to real property; but as to personal property the question arises every day, and there is no better established rule of law than that, when damage is done to personal property, or even to the person, by collision either upon land or at sea, there must be negligence in the party doing the damage to render him legally responsible; and, if there be no negligence, the party sustaining the damage must bear with it. The existence of this rule is proved by the exceptions to it, namely, the cases of the innkeeper and the common carrier of goods for hire, who are quasi insurers. These cases are said to be by the custom of the realm, treating them as exceptions from the ordinary rule of law. In the absence of authority to the contrary, I can see no reason why damage to real property should be governed by a different rule or principle than damage to personal property. There is an instance, also, of damage to real property, where the party causing it was at common law liable upon the custom of the realm as a quasi insurer; namely, in the case of the master of a house, if a fire had kindled there, and consumed the house of another. In such case the master of the house was liable at common law without proof of negligence on his part. See Comyns's Digest, tit. 'Action upon the Case for Negligence,' (A. 6.) This seems to be an exception from the ordinary rule at law; and, in my opinion, affords an argument that in other cases such as the present there must be negligence to create a liability. For these reasons, I think the first question ought to be answered in favour of the defendant.

There then arises the second question, namely, does it make any difference that reasonable and proper care and skill were not exercised by the engineer and contractors employed by the defendant (they being competent persons) with reference to the shafts, which were five old shafts running vertically downwards in that portion of the land selected for the reservoir, but which were not known or suspected by any one to be (as they afterwards proved to be) shafts which had been made for the purpose of getting coal under the land beneath the reservoir, or to lead to coal under it? Now, assuming that the want of reasonable and proper care and skill by the engineer and contractors constituted in point of law want of reasonable and proper skill by the defendants themselves (which is by no means a clear proposition), I nevertheless think that the defendants are not responsible. The assumed facts are these: The defendants dig a reservoir in their own land; they do not know or suspect that their doing it in the manner they did would do any damage to their neighbour: is there any authority to shew that the law casts upon them a liability for damage, should it occur? In my opinion there is authority to the contrary. Prima facie a man may excavate a reservoir for water in his own land. Whether he does so carefully and skilfully would seem to be his own concern; and, if he be ignorant that any fact exists which makes it dangerous to his neighbour, it is difficult to see what duty is imposed upon him to take any peculiar care, or use any particular skill in the matter. When a man does an act upon his close, which of itself is lawful, but is alleged to be wrongful towards an adjoining neighbour by reason of the existence of some underground openings between their two closes, reason and good sense would seem to require that he should know or have the means of knowledge of the existence of the openings. How can a man be said to be negligent when he is ignorant of the existence of the circumstances which require the exercise of care? But, as I have before said, I think the second question, and therefore necessarily the first, is concluded by authority.

In the case of Trower v. Chadwick (12) a cause of action alleged in the declaration was that the defendant was owner and occupier of a vault and walls, and was about to pull them down, and that it was his duty to use due care and skill in pulling them down, but that he did not do so, and thereby plaintiff's vault and walls were damaged. The Court of Common Pleas held that this duty was imposed by law, and that a breach which alleged that the defendant conducted himself so carelessly, negligently, and unskilfully in pulling down his vault and walls as thereby to injure the plaintiff's vault and walls, afforded and was a good cause of action. Error was brought, and in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was declared to be erroneous, in the most direct and express terms. Baron Parke said, "The duty alleged was to use due care and skill in pulling down the vault and walls adjoining the plaintiff's vault and walls, so that, for want of such care and skill, the plaintiff's vault and walls should not be damaged; and the breach was, that the defendant did not use such due care and skill, and that by reason thereof damage ensued." He then proceeds thus; "The question is, whether the law imposes upon the defendant an obligation to take such care in pulling down his vault and walls as that the adjoining vault shall not be injured. Supposing this to be so, when the party is cognisant of the existence of the vault, we are of opinion that no such obligation can arise, unless there be an averment that the defendant knew of its existence, for one degree of care would be required when no vault exists, but the soil is left in its natural state; another where there is a vault; and another and still greater degree of care would be required where the adjoining vault was in a weak and fragile condition; and how is the defendant to ascertain the precise degree of care and caution the law requires of him, if he has no notice of the existence or of the nature of the structure? We think that no such obligation exists in the absence of notice."

Now, substituting defendants' reservoir for defendant's vault and walls in Trower v. Chadwick (12), and plaintiff's close and coal mine for the plaintiff's vault, the cases seem to be identical. I can perceive no distinction, and I therefore think both questions ought to be answered in the negative, and that the defendants are entitled to our judgment.

I have already referred to the judgment of my Brother Bramwell, which I have carefully read and considered, but I cannot concur in it. I entertain no doubt, that if the defendants directly and by their immediate act cast water upon the plaintiff's land, it would have been a trespass, and that they would have been liable to an action for it. But this they did not do. What they did was, to dig a reservoir in their own land, and put water in it, which, by underground openings of which they were ignorant, escaped into the plaintiff's land. I think this is a very different thing from a direct casting of water upon the land, and that the legal liabilities consequent upon it are governed by a different principle. So also, I do not think the cases cited by him as in point of principle in favour of the plaintiff, really are so. In Bonomi v. Backhouse (11), the act done by the defendant was removing the natural and rightful support of his neighbour's land, which at the time, he must have known might and probably would do damage. This seems to me a very different thing from making a reservoir and filling it with water, from which no one supposed any damage would arise. As to the case of Tenant v. Goldwin (3). I cannot understand what difficulty there was in it, or how it can be an authority in the present case. Judgment had gone by default; the motion was in arrest of judgment; and the declaration contained an averment that the defendant debit et solebat to repair a wall between the plaintiff's and the defendant's closes, and that by reason of the want of repair of the wall the damage ensued. This averment was admitted to be true by the form of the proceedings, and being admitted, I cannot myself see where the difficulty was as to the defendant's liability, or how the case can be an authority where no such liability to repair is admitted to exist. It is not alleged in the present case that the defendants were under a liability to stop up the opening in their own land from the adjoining land. I therefore retain the opinion I originally formed. I think this case is governed by Trower v. Chadwick (12), and that to hold the defendants liable for any negligence, would be to constitute them insurers, which I am of opinion would be contrary to legal analogy and principle.

POLLOCK, C.B. (20).—The question in this case is, in my judgment, one of great difficulty, and therefore of much doubt. Apparently it has never before been the subject of litigation, for the Reports are without any decided case in point, and the books of authority are silent on the immediate matter, and afford only indirect assistance. The general question is, for what acts done on his own land (and apparently quite lawful) is the owner of an estate liable if it should turn out in the result that damage is thereby occasioned to the estate of another (who may be an immediate or a distant neighbour) on account of some circumstance entirely unknown to the proprietor who causes the act to be done?

I quite agree with my Brother Bramwell, that in a case like the present it is most important to ascertain the principle on which a decision should proceed. As one mode of doing so, I will assume that the communication by which the water escaped from the defendants' to the plaintiff's estate was a natural one. There are several counties in England—Derbyshire especially—where this might occur; where a natural communication might cause water to pass underground to a distant property, such communication being wholly unknown and unsuspected by either party. Now, in such a case, would the distant neighbour have a right of action if, in consequence of an attempt to form an artificial piece of water, whether for utility or ornament, the water escaped into an underground channel and did damage beyond the limits of the property on which the reservoir was formed? I see no ground on which an action could be maintained for the damage arising under such circumstances. Well, then, if the underground communication be the result of the complaining party having exercised his right to take the minerals, does that give him a better right to complain? I own I think not, and I agree with my Brother Martin that no action will lie. It appears to me that my Brother Bramwell assumes too strongly that the complainant had a right to be free from what is called foreign water. That may be so with reference to surface rights, but I am not prepared to hold that it applies to every possible way in which water may happen to come. There being therefore no authority for bringing such an action, I think the safer course is to decide in favour of the defendants.

With respect to the negligence of the engineer employed to make the reservoir, it is not stated in what it consisted, nor is it shewn that it is such as would make the owner of the land responsible; and any liability arising from the acts of the engineer is more a question of fact than of law.

Judgment for the defendants.

June 3. } CHAPMAN v. COTTRELL.

Promissory Note — Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 18.—Origin of Cause of Action—Note made Abroad, but delivered in England.

The defendant, a British subject resident in Florence, signed two promissory notes there, as joint and several maker with his brother in London, to whom he sent them by post. His brother then also signed them, and delivered them in London to the payees:—Held, in accordance with Cox v. Troy (1), that the cause of action arose when the notes were delivered to the payees in this country, and that the defendant could therefore be sued here under the 18th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

It appeared, from the affidavit of George Cottrell, the defendant's brother, that, in pursuance of an arrangement made between George Cottrell and the Union Bank of London (of which the plaintiff was one of the registered public officers), the defendant, who was resident at Florence in the kingdom of Italy, was to join his brother in giving some security to the bank for a balance due to them from George Cottrell, who accordingly wrote and sent to Florence to the defendant the two promissory notes for 300*l.* each, upon which this action was brought. The defendant there attached his signature to the notes, and returned them by the post to his brother, who afterwards signed them himself and sent them to the Union Bank. At the time the notes became due, the defendant's brother had not paid the balance due from him to the bank; and this action was therefore afterwards brought against the defendant.

The notes were in the following form:

"£300.

London, 30th Dec. 1863.

"Three months after date we jointly and severally promise to pay to the Union Bank of London three hundred pounds value received.

"Geo. E. Cottrell.

"Henry Cottrell."

A summons having been taken out at chambers to set aside the writ, &c., on the ground that the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction, but that it arose on the defendant Henry Cottrell signing the notes at Florence,—Pigott, B. referred the matter to the Court; and

Henry James now applied for a rule to shew cause why the writ and all subsequent proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity on the above ground.—The "cause of action," in the 18th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, means the whole cause of action—Sichel v. Borch (2), in which case Pollock, C.B. says that "it is not because the breach of the contract was in this country that the cause of action is within the jurisdiction." The mere writing of his name by the defendant in Florence is part of the cause of action. In Roff v. Miller (3), where the question turned on 9 & 10 Vict. c. 128. (the City Small Debts Act), the bill was accepted in Piccadilly and delivered to the plaintiffs at Billingsgate, out of the jurisdiction; and Cresswell, J. said, "The cause of action was not the delivery of the bill at Billingsgate, but its unrevoked acceptance in Piccadilly." And in Wilde v. Sheridan (4) (turning upon 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, the County Court Act), Coleridge, J. said that Roff v. Miller (3) was well decided. The contract of acceptance results from the mere writing by the acceptor on the bill without delivery; the acceptor does not deliver the bill, in the same sense as the drawer or the indorser delivers it. And the maker of a promissory note stands on the same footing as the acceptor of a bill of exchange.

(4) 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 260.

(1) 5 B. & Ald. 474.

[MARTIN, B.—But the case of these promissory notes is different; the defendant signed the notes abroad, and sent them over here to have them delivered. Cox v. Troy (1) is a direct authority that there must be something equivalent to delivery, to make the contract.]

The case only shews that the acceptance may be revoked before delivery. The mere writing on the paper is still part of the cause of action.

Lush and Shaw appeared to shew cause in the first instance, but were not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—The question here is, where was the contract made by the defendants, in London or in Florence? There can be no doubt that the contract was made in London, for there was no contract until the note was delivered to the plaintiffs by the agent of the defendant in London. The judgment in Cox v. Troy (1) proceeds entirely on the ground that the defendant did not deliver the bill after he had written his acceptance. Abbott, C.J. there said, that the finding that the defendant did accept the bill did not seem to mean more than that at one period he did write an acceptance on it; and at that time was minded to accept it; and that the question therefore was, "whether he was at liberty, on an alteration of circumstances, to erase the words before he delivered out the bill to the holder." So Bayley, J. says, "I have no difficulty in saying, from principles of common sense, that it is not the mere act of writing on the bill, but the making a communication of what is so written, that binds the acceptor." And Holroyd, J. takes the same view. I entirely agree with them; and I am therefore clear that there never was any cause of action in this case until the notes were delivered to the payees by the defendant's agent in England.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The bank had no interest whatever in this paper till it was delivered over to them by the defendant's brother in this country, and then only was there any contract by the defendant.

Debtor and Creditor—Creditors' Deed—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, sections 192, 194, 197.—Non-Assent of requisite Number of Creditors.

*The plaintiffs were trustees under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, which purported to be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and was in the form given in Schedule D. of that act. The deed was duly executed, attested, stamped and registered, according to the provisions of section 192, but was not assented to by the requisite majority of creditors. The defendants were assignees of the estate of certain bankrupt creditors of the debtor, and a fi. fa. having been issued against his property by the defendants an interpleader issue was directed:—Held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that the deed was valid to pass the property, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the verdict.*

This was an appeal by the defendants against a decision of the Court of Exchequer, discharging a rule to enter a verdict in their favour. The decision in the Court below, which will be found reported in 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 231, was upon an interpleader issue. The plaintiffs were trustees under a deed of assignment, executed by one John Cooke, for the benefit of his creditors. The deed purported to be made in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and was executed, attested, stamped and registered in accordance with section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, and possession of the property was given to the plaintiffs as trustees, immediately on the execution of the deed; but there was no evidence at the trial to shew that the deed was assented to by the requisite majority of creditors. The defendants were assignees of the estate of certain bankrupt creditors of the said John Cooke, and they issued a writ of fi. fa. on the 14th of January 1864. The Judge who tried the cause directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, with leave to move to enter it for the defendants. A rule was accordingly obtained; and was, on argument, discharged by the Court of Exchequer.

Gray (Cooke and Cleave with him), for the appellants (defendants in the Court below).—The question this Court has to decide is, whether section 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, applies to this deed. The deed is not in conformity with the provisions of section 192. of that act. It has not been assented to by the prescribed number of creditors. The deed is therefore void, and the trusts fail. If the trusts are incapable of execution, it is a conveyance without consideration, and the deed is void. It is then only a voluntary conveyance. Section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act defines what deeds shall be valid. Section 193. provides how the deeds shall be registered. Section 194. enacts that deeds shall be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy, or otherwise shall not be received in evidence. Then comes section 197, which provides that, "From and after registration of such deed the debtors, trustees and parties to such deed, or who have assented to such deed, and the effects of such debtor shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, in the same manner as if such debtor had been adjudged a bankrupt." Then, what is the meaning of the words "such deed" in this section? It is submitted it means a deed in conformity with the provisions of section 192, and this deed is not.

[BLACKBURN, J.—You have to shew us that the deed is a bad deed at common law.]

It is bad if it purports to give aids and remedies to creditors which it cannot give. Ex parte Alexander (1) is an authority that trustees and creditors under a deed which is to operate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, are to have the same powers and privileges as assignees would have in case of an adjudication in bankruptcy. A creditor who signed this deed expected to have those powers and privileges. The concluding words of section 197, "to be administered as in bankruptcy," mean that all the powers contained in the Bankruptcy Act are to be exercisable, viz. power, firstly, to examine a debtor and discover estate; secondly, to dispute the debts of creditors, if necessary. It is by no means the same thing to have this done by trustees at their option. Besides a mortgagor at common law may have his action and keep his security, but in Bankruptcy he must obtain an order to sell the security, and can only prove for the balance. There is also no remedy in case of fraudulent preference. He cited Topping v. Keysell (2).

H. Matthews, for the respondents (plaintiffs in the Court below), was not called upon.

CROMPTON, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer was right, and ought to be affirmed. We think this deed is a good deed at common law. The trusts of the deed are by no means impossible. It is no uncommon provision in deeds of this description, that the property of a debtor shall be administered as it would be in the Court of Bankruptcy. It has been said that the rights of a mortgagor would not be the same under this deed as they would be if the debtor's estate were administered in Bankruptcy; that in administering the estate in the Court of Bankruptcy a mortgagee must obtain an order to sell any security he may hold, and can only prove for the balance due to him, whereas he might under this deed retain the security, and prove for the amount of his whole debt. It is also objected that there is no power under this deed to recover back property parted with by a debtor by way of fraudulent preference. It is also said that at common law the property would pass immediately; but I do not see that the deed imposes any hardship upon any one. Any dissenting creditor may file his bill in Chancery, and obtain relief. It is objected that the trustees under this deed may, if they please, reject some claims. That would be a breach of trust, for which any person who is an object of the trust may have a remedy. I think my Brother Martin puts the judgment in the Court below upon the proper ground, viz., that a man has a right to convey his property to trustees upon such trusts as he may think fit, provided he has power to dispose of the property. I can, however, quite understand

(2) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 225.

[MARTIN, B.—But the case of these promissory notes is different; the defendant signed the notes abroad, and sent them over here to have them delivered. Cox v. Troy (1) is a direct authority that there must be something equivalent to delivery, to make the contract.]

That case only shews that the acceptance may be revoked before delivery. The mere writing on the paper is still part of the cause of action.

Lush and Shaw appeared to shew cause in the first instance, but were not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—The question here is, where was the contract made by the defendants, in London or in Florence? There can be no doubt that the contract was made in London, for there was no contract until the note was delivered to the plaintiffs by the agent of the defendant in London. The judgment in Cox v. Troy (1) proceeds entirely on the ground that the defendant did not deliver the bill after he had written his acceptance. Abbott, C.J. there said, that the finding that the defendant did accept the bill did not seem to mean more than that at one period he did write an acceptance on it, and at that time was minded to accept it; and that the question therefore was "whether he was at liberty, on an alteration of circumstances, to erase the words before he delivered out the bill to the holder." Debtor and Creditor—24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, sections 192, 194, 197.—Trust Deed—Non-Assent of requisite Number of Creditors—Control of Court of Bankruptcy.

that the deed might have been delivered as an escrow upon the condition that the provisions of section 192. should be complied with; but if that fact was in dispute, that question should have been left to the jury. We cannot take upon ourselves to decide that fact; that would be entirely a question for the jury. The deed is in the form given in Schedule D. of the Bankruptcy Act, but that form is a conventional form, which might be used without any reference whatever to the provisions of section 192. I therefore think that, as the trusts of the deed are not impossible, it is a valid deed at common law. I think the property vested in the plaintiffs immediately on the execution of the deed and for a good consideration. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below is right.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Deed of Arrangement—Release—Plea in Bar.

A deed was executed by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The deed did not contain a clause of release:—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer), that such a deed cannot be pleaded in bar to an action.

Error was brought in this case to reverse the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in favour of the plaintiff on a demurrer to a plea (1).

The declaration was for goods bargained and sold, for goods sold and delivered, for money paid and for money due on accounts stated.

Plea, that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th of October 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons; and thereupon a deed, bearing date the 30th of January 1864, was made and entered into and executed by and between the defendant W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams of the one part, and W. W. Lewis of the other part, which said deed was and is as follows: "This deed, made the 30th of January 1864, between J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams, all of &c., of the one part, and W. W. Lewis, of &c., on behalf of and with the assent of the undersigned creditors of the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams of the other part, Witnesseth that the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams hereby convey all their estate and effects to the said W. W. Lewis absolutely, to be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams, in like manner as if the said J. Williams, W. Lewis, L. Lewis, J. Lewis and J. Williams had been at the date hereof duly adjudged bankrupt." Averments, that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendants whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards did, in writing, assent to and approve of the said deed, and the said trustees appointed by the deed executed the same, and the execution of the deed by the defendant was attested by an attorney; and within twenty-eight days from the execution of the deed by the defendant, the same was produced and left, having been first duly stamped, at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and together with such deed there was delivered to the Chief Registrar an affidavit by the defendant that a majority representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards had in writing assented to and approved of the said deed, and also stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the defendants comprised in the deed, and the deed did before the registration thereof bear such ordinary and ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf, and immediately on the execution of the deed by the defendant possession of all the property comprised therein of which the defendant could give or order possession was given to the said trustees, and at the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendants in respect of the claim herein pleaded to within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and all conditions have happened and been performed, and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became and was and is bound by the deed as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer. The ground of the demurrer was, that the deed did not contain any clause of release by the plaintiff to the defendants. The Court of Exchequer delivered judgment in favour of the plaintiff on the demurrer. The case in the Court below is reported ante, Exch. 60.

Crompton, for the plaintiff in error.—The question is, whether a composition-deed containing no release clause can be pleaded in bar to an action. The point has never been decided in this court. It is true that the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Eyre v. Archer (2), held that such a deed cannot be pleaded, and the decision in that case was followed by the Court of Exchequer in The Istones Park Iron Ore Company (Limited) v. Pattinson (3), and by the Court of Queen's Bench in Jones v. Morris (4), but the point has never been decided by a Court of Error; Eyre v. Archer (2) is, therefore, the only authority against the defendant. At first a release was not considered absolutely necessary in order to render a deed pleadable in bar to an action; and Garrod v. Simpson (5) is an authority that a deed, under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, even though it contain no release, may be pleaded in bar if the composition has been tendered, as the deed might be taken as an accord and satisfaction if the plaintiff has accepted a dividend; therefore the release clause cannot be said to be absolutely necessary. This point was not raised in Eyre v. Archer (1).

[CROMPTON, J.—What is there in this deed to bar the suit? The Bankruptcy Act provides machinery for staying execution, but the deed is no bar to an action.]

The plea does not state whether the plaintiff has received a dividend or not. It is therefore consistent with the pleadings that the plaintiff has accepted a dividend under the deed, and Lord Campbell, in Whitmore v. Turquand (6), says, "Although this deed contains no release nor declaration that the dividend is to be taken in full satisfaction of the debt, the arrangement is in the nature of a cessio bonorum under the Roman Civil Law, and I think that when a dividend has been received satisfaction is to be inferred." A creditor who has assented must stand in the same position as a creditor who had proved his debt stood in under the act of 1849. (He referred to section 182. of that act.)

Hance, for the defendant in error, was not called upon.

CROMPTON, J.—There are several authorities upon the validity of such a deed by way of plea in bar to an action, and these authorities occur since the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and are founded upon that statute. The fundamental principle upon which all the cases have been decided, is that the deed is only a bar to an action if the statute makes it so. The deed would be no defence at common law. If I owe a man a debt, and assign over all my estate to trustees, the man has a right to get what he can under the assignment, and proceed for the balance. One creditor is not bound by the act of another creditor but by virtue of the provisions of the statute. There is no release clause in the deed, and there is nothing in the plea to shew a good answer to the plaintiff's claim; nor is there anything to shew that the composition was in the nature of accord and satisfaction. The only question that could be raised is under the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which provides that the debtor shall have the benefit of the act in the same manner as if the creditor had proved his debt. This would enable a debtor to come in and stay execution; but, upon the ground stated in the cases referred to, I am of opinion that such a deed cannot be pleaded in bar to an action.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

The deed is no bar to an action, unless the Bankruptcy Act renders it a bar; but this is not so. The debtor's remedy should be by motion to stay execution, unless by leave of the Bankruptcy Court under the 198th section of the act.

1865. } KEMPSON AND OTHERS v.
May 9, 10.* } BOYLE AND ANOTHER.

Contract—Broker—Bought and Sold Notes—Variance.

A contract made by the defendants, who were brokers, in their own name, for the purchase of iron for the plaintiffs, was contained in bought and sold notes. The notes differed only in these particulars, that while the bought-note delivered by the brokers to the plaintiffs had the words "Deposit 5s. per ton, brokerage 0 per cent.," the sold-note contained the words "Deposit (blank); brokerage ½ per cent.":—Held, that parol evidence was admissible to shew an arrangement between the brokers and the plaintiffs, by which they required the latter to pay a deposit of 5s. per ton, and that the apparent variance between the notes, so explained by the usage of the parties, was not material.

Declaration by the assignees of Alfred Barker and Anne Maria Barker, bankrupts, on the common indebitatus counts.

Pleas—Never indebted; payment to the bankrupts before bankruptcy, and without notice by the defendants of any prior act of bankruptcy; and set-off of money due from the bankrupts before bankruptcy. Issues thereon.

The action was tried, at the Warwickshire Spring Assizes, 1865, before Willes, J., when it appeared that the plaintiffs were assignees of Barker & Co., bankrupts, who, as metal-dealers in Birmingham, had entered into large transactions with the defendants, metal-brokers in London. The defendants used to make purchases for Barker & Co., buying in their own name, and selling to Barker & Co. in their own name, and requiring from them a standing deposit of 5s. a ton on all purchases of iron made to their order. The defendants were also occasionally authorized to sell for Barker & Co., but were not required in such case to pay any deposit.

On the 31st of December 1863 the defendants purchased from Newby & Co. in their own name for Barker & Co. 5,000 tons of iron, to be delivered in the following April. Barker & Co. being unable to pay the usual deposit, it was arranged that the defendants should hold certain copper, then in their hands, belonging to Barker & Co., as security for the amount of the deposit. The iron was re-sold by the defendants at a loss, and they repaid themselves the difference out of the proceeds of the copper, which had yielded a large profit. Barker & Co. became bankrupts on the 26th of February 1864, and the assignees sought to recover in this action the amount of the profit on the sales of copper the defendants claiming to set off against the profit on the copper the loss arising from the sale of the iron. The plaintiffs contended that there was no valid contract made by the defendants, as brokers, between the bankrupts and the sellers of the iron, and in support of their view relied on a variance between the terms of the bought and sold notes in which the contract was contained.

The defendants maintained that, as they had made a binding contract between the bankrupts and the sellers of the iron, and the plaintiffs were not ready to complete, they had a right to indemnify themselves.

The note delivered to Barker & Co. was as follows:

"Allhallows Chambers, Lombard Street,
London, 31st December 1863.

"Bought for account of Messrs. C. Barker & Son from our principals store-keeper's warrants for 5,000 tons (five thousand) of Scotch pig-iron, f. o. b. "Discount 0.

"Brokerage 0 per cent.

"Pelly, Boyle & Co.,

"Sworn metal-brokers."

* Decided in Easter Term.

The sold note, which corresponded with the above with the exception of the deposit being nothing and the brokerage being $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., was as follows :

"Allhallows Chambers, Lombard Street,
London, 31st December 1863.

"Sold for account of Messrs. Newby & Co. to our principals storekeeper's warrants for 5,000 tons (five thousand) of Scotch pig-iron, f. o. b. Glasgow, at 70/6 per ton net cash in Glasgow on 12th March 1864, or before in buyer's option, on seven days' notice being given against said documents.

"Prompt as above.

"Deposit.

"Discount 0.

"Brokerage $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

(Signed) "Pelly, Boyle & Co."

The jury found a verdict for the defendants, the Judge reserving leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs for 2,850*l.*, the amount of the loss on the iron bought on the 31st of December 1863, on the ground that there was no binding contract as to that parcel of iron.

Macaulay having obtained a rule accordingly, citing Townend v. Drakeford (1),—

Lush, Hayes, Serj. and Beasley shewed cause, contending that there was really no variance between the notes such as to affect the validity of the contract. The defendants paid for the iron, and it was for their own security, and not for that of the sellers, that they required the deposit of 5*s.* per ton. The bankrupts being unable to pay this deposit, the arrangement was made about the copper. This arrangement was between Barker & Co. and the defendants, and had nothing to do with the contract between the defendants and the sellers. The defendants gave Barker & Co. a note describing the contract, and having attached to it a memorandum of the further arrangement between Barker & Co. and their brokers, a sort of postscript from the brokers to their principals. This can no more amount to a variance than the difference as to the brokerage, which is a matter between the broker and the seller. Townend v. Drakeford (1) is entirely different from this case, for there the broker had nothing to do with the matter, and was not liable at all. In Rogers

v. Hadley (2) parol evidence was admitted in support of an equitable plea, to shew that the bought and sold notes did not really set out the contract between the parties. So in Bold v. Rayner (3) Parke, B. said, that the variances there were all capable of being explained by mercantile usage, and that when so explained they were apparent only, and not material. That the bought note alone bound the parties here, is clear from Humfrey v. Dale (4).—(Sicowright v. Archibald (5), and Thornton v. Kempster (6), were also cited and distinguished.)

Field and Wills (Macaulay with them), in support of the rule, contended that the variance between the notes was fatal to the validity of the contract. Barker & Co. were under no liability; there was no contract with them under the Statute of Frauds; they could not have sued the sellers for not delivering the iron. Again, on the face of the contract the deposit was to go to the seller. In Townend v. Drakeford (1), Lord Denman, C.J. held that the bought and sold notes were the contract, and "not that which is written by the broker in a book which nobody sees."

POLLOCK, C.B.—The evidence shews clearly that the deposit was to go to the brokers, and there is no reason why evidence should not be given to shew that this was the case; the variance when so explained becomes immaterial. The rule must be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—The very nature of bought and sold notes is such that there may be a statement in the one which is not found in the other. I think that there is no material variance between them in this case.

PIGOTT, B.—I have not heard the argument for the plaintiffs, but I think that the notes do not differ in any material respect.

June 8. } SCOTT v. BERRY.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.)—Composition Deed—Parties—Assenting and Non-assenting Creditors—Equality.

A deed of composition made between J. B. (the debtor) of the first part, J. K. and B. B. (two sureties for securing the composition) of the second part, and the several other persons whose names are hereunto subscribed and seals affixed, of the third part, after reciting that the parties of the second and third parts, creditors of J. B. had agreed to accept a composition of 3s. in the pound, on having the same secured by the joint and several promissory notes of J. B, J. K. and B. B. payable in two equal instalments on the 20th of August and the 20th of September, and that J. B, J. K. and B. B. had made and delivered to each of the parties of the third part, their joint and several promissory notes, contained the following covenant and release: "J. B, J. K. and B. B. do and each of them doth covenant with the parties of the third part, and with each and every of them, that they, J. B, J. K. and B. B, or one of them, shall pay the several promissory notes as they shall respectively become due, and shall also make and deliver to all the other creditors of the said J. B. like joint and several promissory notes, payable at the several times and in manner aforesaid, for the like composition of 3s. in the pound upon their respective debts, and shall pay such composition to each of the last-mentioned creditors at the several times and in manner aforesaid, and the several parties of the third part and J. K. and B. B. do and each of them doth covenant with J. B. that they and each of them have accepted and will accept the said promissory notes by way of composition and payment of 3s. in the pound upon the amount of their several debts in full discharge of their debts, and that upon the payment of the said promissory notes they and each of them will execute to J. B. a general release and discharge from their debts." Three fourths in value of J. B.'s creditors had in writing assented to and approved of the deed, but the only parties who had executed the deed were the debtor and the two sureties:—Held, that as the assenting creditors had not executed the deed, and the non-assenting creditors were not parties to it, neither class of creditors could sue on the deed, and that both classes were on an equality, and that the deed was valid.

Declaration, by indorsee against maker, on a bill of exchange for 100*l.* at three months after date, and for money lent, and for interest, and for money due on accounts stated.

Plea, by way of equitable defence, that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th of October 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons, and thereupon while he was so indebted, an indenture, bearing date the 28th of June 1864, was made as follows: This indenture made the 28th of June 1864, between John Berry, of Gomersal, in the county of York, maltster, of the first part, James Knowles, of Gomersal aforesaid, merchant, and Benjamin Berry, of Leeds, in the county of York, draper, of the second part, and the several other persons whose names are hereto subscribed and seals affixed of the third part. Whereas the said John Berry being unable to pay his creditors the full amount of their debts, hath prepared to pay to the whole of his creditors a composition of 3s. in the pound upon their several debts, and whereas the parties hereto of the second and third parts, who are creditors of the said John Berry in the several sums set opposite to their respective names hereunto subscribed, have agreed to accept the said composition on having the same secured by the joint and several promissory notes of the said J. Berry, and of the said J. Knowles and Benjamin Berry as his sureties, bearing even date herewith, and payable in two equal instalments on the 20th of August and the 20th of September following, and by the grant and assignment hereinafter contained. And whereas J. Berry and J. Knowles and B. Berry have accordingly made and delivered to each of the said parties hereto of the third part, their joint and several promissory notes for payment of the said composition at the several times and in manner aforesaid. And whereas a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of J. Berry, whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, have, before or after the execution hereof by him in writing, assented to and approved, and do hereby assent to and approve of the deed which is made and intended to be executed, registered and carried into effect in pursuance of and in manner provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Now, this indenture witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said agreement, and for the considerations herein mentioned, they, the said J. Berry, J. Knowles and B. Berry, do hereby, for themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, and each of them, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, doth hereby covenant, promise and agree with and to the said parties hereto of the third part, and with and to each and every of them, that they, J. Berry, J. Knowles and B. Berry, or one of them, shall and will well and truly pay the said several promissory notes as and when they shall respectively become due, and shall and will also make and deliver to all the other creditors of the said J. Berry like joint and several promissory notes payable at the several times and in manner aforesaid for the like composition of 3*s.* in the pound upon their respective debts, or shall and will pay such composition to each of such of the last-mentioned creditors at the several times and in manner aforesaid. And the said several parties of the third part, and J. Knowles and B. Berry (so far as relates to their respective debts) for themselves severally and respectively and for their several respective heirs, executors and administrators, do and each of them doth hereby covenant with the said J. Berry, his executors and administrators, that they and each of them have accepted and will accept the said promissory notes by way of composition and payment of 3*s.* in the pound upon the amount of their several and respective debts, and in full discharge of the said J. Berry, his executors and administrators and his and their estate and effects from the same, and that, upon payment of the said promissory notes, they and each and every of them will, at the costs and charges of the said J. Berry, his executors and administrators, execute and give to him or them a general release and discharge from their several and respective debts. The deed further contained an assignment unto J. Knowles and B. Berry, of all the real estate of J. Berry; of all his stock-in-trade, book debts, ready-money, goods, chattels and personal estate, in trust to sell and realize the same, and to pay the expenses relating to the preparation and carrying into effect of the deed, and then to pay the composition of 3*s.* in the pound upon all the debts, and to take up and provide for the promissory notes as the same should become payable, and to pay the ultimate surplus (if any) of the monies to J. Berry. The deed was executed by J. Berry, J. Knowles and B. Berry.

The plea then averred that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, had, in writing, approved of, or assented to, the said deed, and the said trustees appointed by the said deed had duly executed the same, and the said deed was duly registered, and the defendant had performed all conditions precedent to make the deed valid and binding on the plaintiff, and has always been ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff the said composition of 3*s.* in the pound upon his debt, as by the deed provided, and tendered and offered to pay the same to the plaintiff at the times and in the manner in the deed provided, and the plaintiff refused to accept the same; and the defendant brought into court the sum of 15*l.*, being the amount of the composition upon the plaintiff's debt, ready to be paid to the plaintiff, and, all conditions having been performed, the plaintiff was bound by the deed as if he had been a party thereto and had executed the same.

Replication that the defendant did not make the tender and offer as in the plea alleged. Upon which issue was joined.

The cause was tried, at the first sittings in Trinity Term, in Middlesex, before Pigott, B., when it was proved that three-fourths in value of the creditors had in writing assented to or approved of the deed; but the only parties who had executed the deed were the debtor and the two trustees. It was also proved that the composition had been tendered to the plaintiff. The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

T. Jones, in the same term, obtained a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why judgment should not be entered for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the verdict found for the defendant, on the ground that the deed set forth in the plea was not binding on the plaintiff, and gave advantages to the parties thereto of the third part which it did not give to the plaintiff or other creditors not parties to the deed; that the covenant to release was conditional, and that the proviso for the surplus going to the defendant was unreasonable.

Hayes, Serj. and Kemplay shewed cause.—This is a deed between the debtor of the first part, two sureties of the second part, and the several other persons whose names are subscribed to the deed of the third part; and the deed provides for the payment of a composition of 3*s.* in the pound to the whole of the creditors of the debtor, by two instalments payable on the 20th of August and the 20th of September, and it assigns the whole of the debtor's property to the sureties. The debtor and the sureties covenant with the parties of the third part to pay the promissory notes as they become due, and the deed contains a release of the debtor by the parties of the third part upon the payment of the promissory notes. Now, it is said that this deed is not binding upon the non-assenting creditors. It will be argued that it gives greater advantages to the assenting creditors than it does to the non-assenting creditors; that the one class being parties to the deed have a remedy on the covenant in the event of the promissory notes not being paid, and that the other class, not being parties, cannot sue on the deed. But there is no inequality on this ground, because no creditor has executed the deed.

[MARTIN, B.—Is not the deed invalid as regards the non-assenting creditors because there is no direct covenant with them? How are they to get their composition? They will have to rely on the covenant with the trustees.]

The plaintiff has had a tender of the composition made to him, which he refused. The allegation in the plea is, that three-fourths of the creditors have assented to the deed; it is not necessary that they should execute the deed; the only parties who have executed are the trustees; no creditors have executed the deed, therefore all the creditors are on the same footing and there is no inequality.

[BRAMWELL, B.—It was surely intended that the creditors should execute. According to your argument, it is a good deed until some one creditor executes it.]

It is sufficient for the present argument that no creditor has executed; whether a creditor can execute the deed after registration may be considered a doubtful point. This case is distinguishable from Benham v. Broadhurst (1). They also contended that the covenant to pay the promissory note was a joint covenant. They cited Bradburne v. Botfield (2) and Anderson v. Martindale (3).

T. Jones, in support of the rule.—In Martin v. Gribble (4) this Court has adopted Ex parte Cockburn (5), and that case shews that this deed is invalid and not binding upon the non-assenting creditors. The creditors who have subscribed to the deed of the third part have had their promissory notes delivered to them. The non-executing creditors have to rely only upon the covenant that the notes shall be made and delivered. The parties who have their promissory notes may sue at once on the notes if they are unpaid; but the other creditors cannot do so; they cannot sue on the deed, or if they can it must be through third persons. It is clear also that one class of creditors could obtain judgment in a speedier mode than the other; the one could sue under the Bill of Exchange Act, while the others, if they can sue at all, must sue on the covenant. Again, the release is only a conditional release, and cannot be pleaded even by way of equitable defence.

[MARTIN, B.—The deed may not operate as a release, but the debt having been tendered and paid into court, why should it not operate as an accord and satisfaction? CHANNELL, B. referred to Garrod v. Simpson (6).]

That case only decides that if a deed be good it may be pleaded by way of accord and satisfaction. Here, if the debtor went to equity for relief he would not be entitled to an absolute injunction. He could only ask for an injunction on the condition of his paying the composition.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This is an application on the part of the plaintiff for judgment non obstante veredicto. The plaintiff has sued the defendant for a debt, and the defendant has set up as a defence a deed of composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The jury have found the issue on this plea for the defendant. The plaintiff now asks, notwithstanding the verdict in favour of the defendant, that judgment be entered for him on the ground that the deed is no answer to the action. This is the short question the Court are called on to decide, and we are all of opinion that we cannot give the plaintiff judgment, notwithstanding the verdict; in other words, that substantially the deed is an answer to the action. The plaintiff's counsel, in his argument, contended that the present case was governed by a recent decision (7) in this Court, founded upon the opinion of the Lord Chancellor in Ex parte Cockburn (5). It is argued that the creditors who do not execute have no covenant upon which they can sue, or by means of which they can obtain that which the deed meant to give them. That really is not so. It is true that there is no covenant with them; but they have a remedy in the names of others, and at law can obtain all the benefit the deed intended them to have. Upon the whole, without going further into the matter, the deed having been assented to and approved of by the requisite number of creditors, it is an answer to the present action, and the rule ought to be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I do not suppose that what I am about to say will be satisfactory upon this subject, for I myself have never given a judgment upon these deeds satisfactory to myself, and I have never read a judgment satisfactory to my mind. I therefore do not expect that anything I am about to say will be satisfactory to other people. I believe that this arises from the difficulty of the subject itself. The law with respect to composition-deeds is comprised in a very few sections of an act of parliament, which have been applied by persons in framing such deeds to objects of their own; in endeavouring to bring themselves within the provisions of the act of parliament their sole aim has been to secure an arrangement beneficial to themselves; the matter now has got beyond the reach of reason and common sense. I think that the plea, pleading the deed, may be held to be valid on a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, for I apprehend in such a case the Court is entitled to look at everything which may reasonably support the plea, and to make every intendment which will give effect to and uphold the judgment. Taking it, then, from the averments of this plea, that no single creditor has executed this deed, and that the debtor and his two sureties are the only parties who have executed it, and that three-fourths in number of the creditors have assented to and approved of the deed, and have agreed to take a composition of 3s. in the pound on the amount of their debts, payable by promissory notes,—if that be the true state of the facts, then beyond all manner of doubt there is no inequality. No creditor has signed the deed, and they are all in the same position. If this is really the transaction, the deed would be a composition-deed within the very comprehensive terms of the 192nd section. If this deed be read as a proposal by the debtor and his sureties to give all creditors a composition of 3s. in the pound, payable by promissory notes at a certain time, and all the provisions of the act have been complied with, I am not prepared to say such a deed would be void. With respect to what has been said as to the distinction between this deed and the deed we had before us in a case a short time ago (7), in which, although I gave judgment that the deed was void against non-assenting creditors, I should have been very glad to have supported the deed if I could have done so, that case turned entirely on the application of a rule of law that persons who are not made parties to a deed cannot sue on the covenants of a deed. On the whole, it seems to me the plaintiff cannot have judgment non obstante veredicto, and the rule ought to be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—I agree with my Brother Martin. I have not only never read a judgment relating to composition-deeds under section 192. at all satisfactory to myself, but, on the contrary, to my mind, all the judgments have been most unsatisfactory. I have never read, and I have never heard of, a satisfactory judgment upon the subject. I am content that our judgment should be for the defendant. I will only further say that all the creditors in a composition-deed under section 192. ought to be equally treated. Yet it seems to me that there ought to be some qualification to this rule, and if you treat the non-assenting creditors as well as they should be treated, the deed ought not to be void because you treat the assenting creditors better; that is to say, if you do your best to give the non-assenting creditors—who will not come in—a right, there is no harm in giving the assenting creditors a better right. If the debtor gives the assenting creditors a covenant for the payment of the composition, and not being able to covenant directly with the non-assenting creditors because they will not be parties to the instrument, he enters into a covenant with third parties on their behalf, and so does his best to give them the same right, they ought not to be allowed to complain that they are not on equal terms with the other creditors.

CHANNELL, B.—After what has fallen from my Lord Chief Baron and the judgments of my learned Brothers, I cannot hope that the judgment I am about to deliver will be satisfactory to any one. It proceeds upon a short ground. This is an application that judgment may be entered for the plaintiff notwithstanding the verdict found for the defendant. That depends upon the question whether the plea is an answer to this action. Now, in the shape in which this case comes before us, there is imposed upon the Court the obligation of reading the plea in a way which will make it a defence to the action, if it can possibly be so read. I am of opinion that it can. It is necessary, in order to sustain the plea as a defence to the action, that the deed should be a good deed—that is, a good deed so far as it is disclosed by the plea. The deed professes to be a deed that was intended to be executed by three different parties. The first party is the debtor; the second party are two persons who are trustees of the property, or sureties for the payment that the composition-deed was intended to secure; and the last are the persons whose names are subscribed, as of the third part. I apprehend the Court are entitled to read this as a deed which is executed only by the parties of the first and second parts, the debtor and the trustees; and there is no obligation by any person whose execution of it, if it had taken place, would have brought that person within the parties of the third part. That being so, whatever disadvantage there may be to creditors under this deed applies equally to all. They are all in the same position. No creditor has signed the deed; it is therefore free from the vice of inequality. There is no covenant upon which any of the creditors can sue; and this distinguishes the present case from Ex parte Cockburn (5) and the case (8) in this Court which followed it—a case where the deed was executed by some creditors, and where those creditors who executed had a right of action upon the covenant, which those who had not executed had not. The Court is therefore relieved from considering the point which arose in that case; and I do not see that we interfere with the Lord Chancellor's decision in Ex parte Cockburn (5), or with the case that followed it in this Court. Reading the plea as averring that the deed has not been signed by any creditor, I conceive it to be a good deed, and to afford an answer to the action. It is not set up by way of release, but by way of accord and satisfaction; and if Garrod v. Simpson (6) is a case to be questioned, it should be questioned in a Court of error; at least, this Court will act upon its own decisions, and, consistently with that case, the plea is a good plea. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

1865. }
Feb. 14, 16, 17. } PARKER v. TOOTAL

Will — Devise — Construction — Estates Tail by Implication — Gift to a Class.

C. by his will gave his estate to his grandson T. C. for life, with remainder to "the first son of the body of the said T. C. severally and successively in tail male" of the name of C; and for want of such lawful issue of that name, either by his said grandson T. C. or his son J. C, then amongst his "daughters and their children" in fee:— Held, that estates tail were given to the first and other sons of T. C, and that the gift over to the daughters and their children was a gift to a class, and that a child of a daughter who died before the date of the will was not within the gift.

Semble, that estates tail by implication were given to T. C. and J. C. after the estates tail of the sons of T. C.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber(1), affirming a judgment of the Court of Exchequer, in an action of ejectment brought by John Barrow, since deceased, against the defendant in error.

The action was brought to recover a share of a freehold estate called the "Waste," otherwise "Weaste," in the county of Lancaster, formerly the property of Thomas Chorlton, the testator hereinafter mentioned. The defendant appeared to the writ of ejectment, and defended.

The cause came on for trial, at Liverpool, at the Summer Assizes, 1859, when, by consent, a verdict was found for the defendant, subject to a SPECIAL CASE.

The said Thomas Chorlton died in the year 1799, having made his will, dated the 5th of September 1799, which will contained the following devise: "I give and devise unto my grandson Thomas Chorlton, son of the late Richard Chorlton, all that my estate where I now live, and all that other estate and premises thereto belonging, situate in Pendleton aforesaid, called or known by the name of Weaste Estate, now in the tenure or holding of

(1) 7 Hurl. & N. 962.

Thomas Walker, his assigns or under-tenants, for his own use during his natural life, with remainder to the first son of the body of the said Thomas Chorlton, lawfully begotten, severally and successively in tail male of the name of Chorlton; and for want of such lawful issue of that name, either by my said grandson Thomas Chorlton or my son James Chorlton, then I give and devise the said estate where I now live and the Weaste Estate amongst my daughters and their children, share and share alike, to hold unto them, his, her or their heirs for ever as tenants in common, but not as joint-tenants."

Thomas Chorlton the grandson, the only son of the said Richard Chorlton, survived the testator and was his heir-at-law, and died in October 1838, without having had any child (unless a child or children who died in infancy before his death).

James Chorlton, the second and only other son of the said testator, died in March 1804, having had an only son, Thomas Chorlton, who was born in October 1799, and died in October 1825, without issue.

The testator had six daughters, one of whom, named Ann, married John Barrow, and died intestate leaving several children, among whom was a son, John, her heir-at-law, who died in 1853, intestate, leaving the late plaintiff, John Barrow, his eldest son and heir-at-law.

The plaintiff John Barrow claimed a share of the said testator's estate, under the devise to the daughters of the said testator and their children, and commenced the present action on the 14th of July 1858.

The defendant claimed to be entitled to the whole estate under a feoffment made, and a recovery suffered by Thomas Chorlton, the son of Richard, and the heir-at-law of the testator, more than fifty years since, viz in the year 1810.

A special case was stated and came on for argument before the Court of Exchequer on the 30th of May 1860, when the plaintiff declining in that stage of the proceedings to argue the case, judgment was given for the defendant.

Error was thereupon brought in the Exchequer Chamber, and the plaintiff John Barrow having died, his death was duly suggested, and the proceedings were continued in the name of the present plaintiff in error, who was the legal representative of the said John Barrow.

The special case was heard before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, on the 4th of February 1862, when the Court affirmed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, on the grounds of the length of time which had elapsed, and the repeated decisions hereinafter referred to of other Courts upon the construction of the testator's will.

It appears from the reports of the cases of Rushton v. Craven (3) and Mellish v. Mellish (3), that the said Thomas Chorlton the son of Richard, after the feoffment and recovery by him in 1810, contracted to sell the estate to one William Craven, and that the said William Craven objecting to the title, on the ground that the said Thomas Chorlton had not by such feoffment and recovery acquired the fee simple in the premises, the said Thomas Chorlton filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against him for specific performance; and that on a reference to the Master a report was made in favour of the title: that exceptions to the report were thereupon taken by the defendant, and that upon the hearing of the exceptions, a case was sent from the Court of Chancery to the Court of King's Bench for its opinion, and the certificate of the Court of King's Bench was in favour of the title, viz.—That the said Thomas Chorlton took under the will of the testator an estate in tail male, and had by the feoffment and recovery acquired the fee simple, and such certificate was confirmed by Lord Eldon, who was then Lord Chancellor, and specific performance was decreed against the said William Craven.

The said William Craven having completed his purchase, mortgaged the premises to one Rushton, who filed a bill of foreclosure, Rushton v. Craven (2), in the Court of Exchequer in Equity, and by the decree made in that cause the premises were directed to be sold. William Croft, the purchaser of certain lots, part of the premises, including those the subject of the present action, objected to the title, and an order of reference as to the title was made to the Master, who certified that a good title could be made; and, thereupon, Croft filed exceptions to this report, and the exceptions were argued before the Court of Exchequer in Equity, when judgment was reserved, and, subsequently, the Chief Baron Richards delivered the judgment of the Court, overruling the exceptions and confirming the report.

Manisty and Hardy, for the appellant, contended that Thomas Chorlton, the grandson, took only an estate for life under the will, with remainder to his first son, or his first and other sons successively, in tail male, with remainder by implication to the first son of James or his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to the daughters and their children, and that the last remainder being a vested remainder was not defeated by the recovery. They cited Baker v. Tucker (4), Blackborn v. Edgley (5), Lewis v. Waters (6), Wilkinson v. Adams (7), Evans v. Astley (8), Tenny v. Agar (9) and Daintry v. Daintry (10).

Sir Hugh Cairns and Lewin, for the respondent, contended that the expression "the first son of Thomas Chorlton," was nomen collectivum, as appeared from the subsequent words "severally and successively," and that Thomas Chorlton took an estate tail by the rule in Shelley's case; and further, the words "for want of such lawful issue," must have meant "for want of male issue," as the word "issue" could not apply to an individual, which would give an estate tail to Thomas. The intention of the testator was, that estates tail should be given to Thomas and James. If no estate were devised to James or his issue, the remainder to the daughters and their children was a contingent remainder, but whether the remainder was vested or contingent it was equally destroyed by the recovery suffered by Thomas. Lastly, the gift to the daughters and their children was a gift to a class, and referred to daughters and children of daughters living at the time of the Manisty, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Westbury).—My Lords, your Lordships are now called upon to undertake a task of great difficulty, and one in which we must proceed with very great caution. You are required, on the part of the appellant, to arrive at a conclusion which would have the effect of subverting the judgment—the opinion, upon the construction of this difficult case, given by the Court of Queen's Bench about the year 1811, and which was confirmed by Lord Eldon shortly afterwards, probably in the year 1812, and which was adhered to by the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, after a long and elaborate argument, in the year 1823.

I need not point out to your Lordships that the interval of time which has elapsed since the year 1812 has of course given rise to the well-founded conclusion on the part of the owners of this estate that they have a right to rely with certainty upon the title derived from that judgment. At the same time, the law admits of the present claim being made by the appellant; and your Lordships, with the caution to which I have adverted, must undoubtedly undertake the task of determining now whether, in your judgment, those former decisions by which, notwithstanding the lapse of time, you are not bound, are or are not right and correct expositions of the meaning of this will.

It is necessary, in the first place, to state shortly, that the will which you have to construe was made in the year 1799. The testator by whom that will was made, Thomas Chorlton, appears to have had an eldest son, Richard Chorlton, who had died previously to the will, leaving a son Thomas. Thomas, therefore, claiming under the testator, was, at the time of the making of the will, his heir-at-law. The testator also appears to have had a second son of the name of James. Richard, as I collect from the case, left no other son than Thomas. Thomas, at the time of the will, was of the age of twenty-one years, and was unmarried. James, the second son of the testator, was married, and it was probable he would have issue within a very short time after the time when this will was made. In that state of things the testator devises the property now in question unto his grandson Thomas for life, in a definite and express form of limitation; and then, after that gift, follow the words which create the controversy that your Lordships have now to determine. First of all the words are, "with remainder to the first son of the body of the said Thomas Chorlton lawfully begotten severally and successively in tail male of the name of Chorlton." The sentence is defective. We are familiar, no doubt, with sentences of this description which ordinarily are the mode of expressing gifts in tail to first and other sons of any particular individual.

The first question is, whether the form of expression "to the first son" must be taken as a defective form of expression, by force of the words "severally and successively in tail male," because it is obvious that those words would not be applicable to the first son, if the words "first son" are taken as the intended form of expression, and as a designatio of one individual.

It is therefore, I think, reasonably clear, that upon the whole formula of words which we find here, you must supply, by way of addition to the words "first son," "the first and other sons in tail male," or otherwise you will refuse to give effect to the will, and will in reality strike out of the will the subsequent words, "severally and successively." That, I apprehend, is reasonably clear.

If that be so, the next point which demands the attention of your Lordships is, what is the effect of the words "for want of such lawful issue of that name"? The difficulty which here arises is, to determine whether those words are no more than the ordinary words intended to carry the son's estate, and to be expressive of the fact of the former estates having either failed of taking effect at all, or, if they did take effect, of having come to their natural expiration. Upon this there is considerable controversy. It is said, on the part of the appellant, that the referential construction is that it is the rule of interpretation which confines the word "such" to the repetition only of the antecedents as they are found in the will. It is contended, I say, by the appellant, that that rule of construction has now been firmly established, and he insists therefore that these words, "for want of such lawful issue of that name," must be limited entirely to the events of there having been no such lawful issue, or of the lawful issue comprehended within the antecedent words having ceased to exist.

On the other hand, it is contended by the respondent, with more force, that these words indicate a special intention on the part of the testator to provide for all the male issue of his loins bearing his name. And the case is put (which the respondent has a right to put) of this contingency: Suppose the testator to have a son who died in his lifetime, leaving sons, and then he made a will in which he repeats limitations such as these—uses limitations such as these—"to my first and other sons." That is the ordinary limitation, and would not comprehend or include the grandson, the son of his deceased son. Yet it is palpable, from the form of expression used to indicate the gift over, that it was the testator's desire that all the issue of his name should be provided for. The respondent therefore insists that if that case had occurred, and were now presented to the Courts, the Courts would arrive at the conclusion that the referential word "such" was entirely satisfied by the antecedent words "male issue," and that the words I am referring to, namely, "for want of such lawful issue," would, in that case, be read "for want of male lawful issue."

Now, if that be the interpretation which the words reasonably bear, and it being an interpretation in aid of an object, or express intention, on the part of the testator, the effect of that mode of rendering the relative word "such" would be to annex to the special limitation to the first and other sons in tail male a general expression that the estate should not go over until there was a universal failure of male lawful issue of Thomas. Consequently, in the event I supposed, of Thomas having had a grandson born to him before the date of the will, the estate would not go over without including that grandson; and in order to include that grandson we should, upon the established rules of interpretation, give to Thomas by necessary implication, in order to affect the estate, an estate in tail male by way of remainder after the limitations to the first and other sons of Thomas.

Now I cannot but infer that that was the mode of interpretation adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench, and sanctioned and approved of by Lord Eldon. Unfortunately, it seems that this case was argued in the Court of Queen's Bench after Lord Eldon had arrived at that unfortunate conclusion that the certificate sent by the Court of common law to the Court of Chancery should contain no reasons for their determination.

It is probably an unfounded story, but still it is the story, that Lord Eldon was much in the habit of criticizing the language of the certificates that accompanied those decisions, and hence it is said that the conclusion of the Court of Queen's Bench was arrived at. I advert to that story only for the purpose of saying, that as it was confessedly Lord Eldon's habit to scrutinize with much accuracy the certificates of the Courts of common law, it is not likely that he would have acquiesced in the conclusion of the Court of Queen's Bench unless he had been satisfied that that was the fair interpretation of the will. Nay, further, he must not only have been satisfied that it was a reasonable interpretation, but that it was a proper interpretation, because he confirmed the certificate for the purpose of forcing the purchaser to take the title. That, my Lords, having regard to the established rules of the court of equity, and the forbearance from compelling a purchaser to take a doubtful title, is a sufficient indicium of Lord Eldon's satisfaction with the construction that had been put upon these words of devise.

Now, undoubtedly, it is an extremely difficult thing, after this long interval of time, to arrive at any different interpretation; but, nevertheless, it is your Lordships' duty not to accept that construction merely upon the credit due to so high an authority, unless you conscientiously believe it to be the construction which must be called for by the words and does effectuate the intention of the testator, as it is to be collected from the will.

Now there is very much to be said in favour of that construction, because you give effect to every word, though you give to the word "such," as I have already observed, a limited operation as a word of reference. But the construction by which you are able to give to Thomas an estate in tail male in remainder upon the limitations to his first and other sons, also enables you to give, by a parity of reasoning, the same estate tail in remainder to James; and, then, my Lords, we get the ultimate remainder to the daughters as a vested remainder expectant, and consequential upon a series of other remainders; and the whole scheme of the will is complete, and the intention of the testator is thus put beyond the power of being defeated except in the manner in which it was defeated, namely, that at that time of day contingent remainders were not protected if there were no trustees to preserve them, and the limitations to first and other sons of Thomas were at the mercy of Thomas; for the life estate of Thomas coalescing with the remainder given in tail enabled him to suffer a new recovery and to create a new title by the destruction, or by preventing the possibility of the remainders to his first and other sons from subsequently taking effect.

I am very much inclined, therefore, to recommend you to say that that reasonable interpretation, satisfying, as it does, the language of the will, though it does not carry the principle of referential construction to the full extent to which it has been now carried by subsequent cases, yet it is a construction that satisfies every word, and I think makes the will agree in every part, and supplies an interpretation which accounts for the antecedent decisions, and which interpretation, therefore, being recommended by those decisions, comes with great weight to the minds of your Lordships.

But if that be not the construction, then the only other construction which the subsequent words admit of would be this: If we take the words "for want of such lawful issue of that name" to be simply words, as I have said, introductory of the remainder, and expressive only of the expiration of the antecedent estates, then the words that follow, "either by my grandson Thomas Chorlton, or my son James Chorlton," can be expressive only of this: in default of such issue male by my son Thomas as would be entitled to take under the antecedent limitations of this particular will, and also in default of such issue male of my son James as would be entitled to take, under similar limitations to his first and other sons, then to my daughters; and if the words that are here found are expanded and unfolded in the manner I have expressed, the question arises, whether the defective former expression being amplified in the manner I have stated, that amplifying form of expression would or would not give to the first and other sons of James estates correspondent to those which are limited to the first and other sons of Thomas by a necessary implication, or whether they would be expressive only of a contingent event which must happen, in addition to the expiration of the antecedent limitations, before the remainder to the daughters would take effect; and, consequently, the remainder to the daughters would not be a vested remainder expectant on the determination of the estates limited to the first and other sons of Thomas, but would be a remainder that would arise and take effect only in the event of there also happening, before the limitations to the sons of James came to an end, the further contingency of there being no issue male of James.

There is the great difficulty in the case, whether these words shall be satisfied by the expression of that contingency, or whether the words be taken to express that contingency, and shall, of necessity, also receive this further construction of being not merely expressive of a contingency, but of giving estates also to the first and other sons of James correspondent to those already expressly giving to the first and other sons of Thomas.

Upon this particular point I quite agree with some remarks made at the bar, that the older cases are no longer to be regarded as safe guides in such an inquiry. The latitude so often given as to the doctrine of implication may be founded upon two grounds: either where the implication arises by a form of expression which necessarily, from the very effect of the words, involves and implies something else, or an implication may also be founded upon the form of gift, or a direction to do something which cannot be carried into effect, without, of necessity, implying and involving something else in order to give effect to that direction or something else, which is a consequence necessarily resulting from that direction. Now, two examples will illustrate sufficiently the force and meaning of that abstract proposition. If I give to my heir-at-law an estate from and after the death of A. B., the form of expression indicates that my heir-at-law shall not have the enjoyment of that estate until the life of A. B. has come to an end. But if that be so, the estate not going to my heir-at-law during that interval of time, and no other owner being provided for it, it must escape or go to A. B. during the interval; and Courts of justice have arrived at the decision that the form of expression involves this conclusion, that A. B. must be the person to enjoy the estate until that event happens, until which the right of the heir-at-law is postponed.

Another form of direction would arise upon this, which is a common one. If I give to A. B. in tail, remainder to C. D. in tail, and if A. B. and C. D. shall die without issue, then over. The form of expression is not to take effect until A. B. and C. D. are dead without issue; and if one dies without issue leaving another, there is necessarily imported a remainder from one to the other. But now the question is, whether either of those two examples is at all applicable to the case before your Lordships? Taking the amplified form of words which I have already stated, I cannot find in that form of expression anything like an indication that the first and other sons of James were to take estates in tail male correspondent with those already given to the first and other sons of Thomas. Neither can I find that such an indication is necessary in order to support the gift over. Neither can I find that the language of the gift over does, in terms, involve the necessity of the gift over waiting the termination of estates, which, by supposed implication, are to be raised in the first and other sons of James. Confining oneself, therefore, to that most wholesome rule of interpretation which we have at length arrived at, and ought rigidly to adhere to, that though we construe the language in conformity with the meaning of the words, yet the intention to be ascribed to the testator must not be an intention which we think the testator ought to have meant, because it was his duty to do so; but it must be an intention, the grounds and reasons for imputing which, the ground and reasons for clothing his mind with which, we are able to derive from the language that he does use; and if that language is satisfied by going to a certain extent, there is no obligation to go further. If the language here, speaking of the sons by implication, is satisfied by the expression of that contingency, no matter whether it appears to be an express contingency or not, there seems no warrant in the decisions of any Court of justice for any other than that particular interpretation which is sufficient to satisfy the words.

I cannot, therefore, bring myself individually to advise your Lordships that you ought here, upon this will, to infer estates limited, by a necessary implication, to the first and other sons of James, and thereby put the estate in the appellant. I put out of consideration the circumstance that this interpretation does not appear to have suggested itself to the great legal minds who have again and again attended to this will. That ought not to be conclusive upon the matter. It is true it is a circumstance which probably confirms one in the conclusion that one is disposed to arrive at upon the principles. I have stated that there is no sufficient expression of intention to give estates to the first and other sons of James as would warrant me on the foundation of what is written to raise these estates in the first and other sons of James. If that be so, then whether you regard the estate taken by Thomas, the grandson, as an estate for life only without a remainder to himself, or whether you regard it as giving the remainder to himself in tail, which coalesced with his particular estate, the title of the respondent is good; for, in the one case, the estate to the daughters would be a contingent remainder destroyed by the operation of the recovery, and in the other case, though the estate to the daughters is a vested remainder, yet it would be expectant upon the estate tail in remainder in Thomas, and the estate tail in remainder in James, and the remainder of Thomas the grandson would be equally good.

I am afraid I have detained your Lordships at unnecessary length upon this matter; but after the arguments at the bar, I think it would be inconsistent to avoid expressing any opinion upon this part of the case; but I candidly feel that the whole of that part of the case to which I have, perhaps unnecessarily, given so much time, is one not needed for the determination of this question.

The title of the appellant arises in this manner. The testator had several daughters—six in number—one of them, Ann Barrow, died in the year 1796. The testator's will, as I have already said, was made in the year 1799. She died therefore before the date of the will. She left children, and under one of those children the present appellant claims a small, undivided portion of the estate in question.

Now, it is necessary for the appellant to bring himself within the operation of the gift which is made of the remainder over, and that gift is, "to my daughters and their children share and share alike." Now, whenever there are words used in a will indicative of a class, the words must be taken to denote the class as it was constituted either at the date of the will or at the death of the testator. It is impossible to include persons except those that are found to come within the description of the words indicative of a class, either at the date of the will or at the death of the testator. Now it is perfectly clear that the words "amongst my daughters" is a gift to a class, and it is perfectly clear that Ann Barrow was not one of that class either at the date of the will, for she was dead, and of course not at the death of the testator. If that be so, then we come to the words "and her children." Now the appellant contends that the words "and her children" must not be limited to the children of the persons constituting a class in immediate connexion with which these words are used; but he reads them as if they were thus written—"amongst my daughters and the children of my daughters." Your Lordships will observe he gives to the second words, "my daughters," a different effect and extent of meaning from the extent of meaning belonging "to my daughters" in the first part. It would then run thus: "amongst my daughters," that is, those now living, "and the children of my daughters"; and under the words "my daughters," as secondly used (being identical with the first), he would include a different set of persons from those included in the first. That interpretation, I think, cannot be by possibility adopted. The words are there connecting the "children" with the persons who constitute a class, "amongst my daughters and the children of them," and that of necessity indicates and includes persons included under the words "my daughters," and none other.

Some cases were cited at the bar in support of this distributive and expansive construction; but upon examination of them, I think there is no one of them that approximates at all to the form of this expression, and each one of them is found to be based upon a different form of words, indicating a greater latitude; and they are here clearly the opposite of an intention to give to daughters' children, whether they were children of persons living at the date of the death of the testator, or children of persons coming under a certain description who had pre-deceased the testator. The principle, I believe, is perfectly clear, that it is impossible to carry these words, in immediate connexion with the class, beyond the extent of the class itself.

That would suffice for the determination of this case. It is a pity it was not more attended to by the appellant before these proceedings were commenced. I am satisfied, if the argument had been before it on that point the Court below would have arrived at the conclusion that the appellant was not entitled under this description of the persons who are to take under the gift of the ultimate remainder.

On all these grounds, I think the appellant is wrong; and I am of opinion on all these grounds I must advise your Lordships that the decision of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—With reference to this particular case I am clearly of opinion, with the Lord Chancellor, that the appeal must be dismissed. It struck me so, in an early portion of the discussion that the last point to which his Lordship has adverted is conclusive on this subject. I cannot help suspecting that the testator did mean to include the children of deceased daughters; but I think if we were to include them, we should not be construing his will, but making a new will for him which, we think, would be more consistent with his probable intentions. I think it is clear that a gift to "my daughters," which, alone, would mean, clearly, daughters living at the death, or at least at the date of the will (which are pretty nearly contemporaneous events in this case), would mean only those who were then living and not those who had pre-deceased him; and when he says, "to my daughters and their children" to be equally divided between and among them, it must mean the children of those previously described as daughters. And it may be thought, that that being conclusive against the appellant, it is unnecessary to say anything upon the construction of the will on which this case has been so frequently considered in the different Courts upon the previous occasions. But I do not think it unnecessary, after the elaborate arguments we have heard at the bar on both sides, and the numerous occasions on which this will has been brought before the Courts, first before the Court of Queen's Bench, afterwards before Lord Chancellor Eldon, afterwards before the Chief Baron Richards, and they all expressed an opinion. Upon that mere ground I think it would be somewhat disrespectful to those Judges to pass it over without making some observations upon it. But there is another reason which appears to make it the bounden duty of your Lordships to express your opinion. Although, my Lords, more than twenty years have elapsed since the death of the tenant for life—he died in 1838—I do not see any claim that has been made by other persons not coming within the category of the descendants of a deceased daughter who might afterwards set up a claim; and it is fit you should know that the grounds on which you are proceeding are not confined merely to that which has reference solely to the position of the present appellant. On that subject it is impossible to say there is not very great difficulty and doubt about it; indeed, it would be absurd and presumptuous not to express any opinion after the great discussion this case has undergone, and the conclusions which have been from time to time arrived at upon it. I do not at all hesitate to express the clear opinion that the appellant is not right in contending that Thomas took an estate for life only, at least in the first instance. Neither have I the least doubt in concurring with the Lord Chancellor in saying, that although the expression is in that imperfect manner, "with remainder to the first son of the body of the said Thomas Chorlton," although that is very imperfectly expressed, I think it is an inference that we have not only made, but must make, that it is the first and other sons severally and successively in tail male; therefore Thomas became tenant for life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male.

Now, it is to be observed that after that devise there is no gift to any one until you come to the daughters, unless by implication, to which I will presently advert. But the will goes on to say, "And for want of such lawful issue of that name, either by my said grandson Thomas Chorlton, or my son James Chorlton, then I give and devise the said estate where I now live, and the Weaste Estate amongst my daughters." Now, taking those words, without at all altering or enlarging them, the daughters clearly took only a contingent remainder upon the expiration of the estates in tail male of the sons of Thomas, contingent upon the casualty whether or not at that time there should be a total failure of issue male of Thomas, and a total failure of issue male of James. That was clearly a contingent remainder; but it was very ably argued by Mr. Manisty, and afterwards by Mr. Hardy, that this is a construction which the Court below ought not to have adopted, and which this Court ought not to sanction; for that it was reasonable—inasmuch as the estate was given to the daughters only for want of such lawful issue of that name (that is, of the first and other sons successively of Thomas)—since it was only given over for want of that lawful issue, "either by my said grandson Thomas Chorlton, or my said son James Chorlton," to infer that the testator meant to give to the children of James the same estates which he had given to the children of Thomas. Now that, my Lords, I confess, seems to me a very violent presumption. I am not fond of raising estates by implication, if it can be avoided. It too often happens that that is but a disguised way of making a will instead of interpreting it. But if I were to raise estates by implication here, the estates I should raise by implication are estates in remainder to Thomas and James. That seems to me to be what the testator meant. Suppose the testator were now living, and could tell what he meant, he would say, "I do not mean my daughters to take as long as there is any issue male of Thomas or of James"—not if there is any issue male of James's sons—that is not what he could have had in his contemplation. Therefore, the implication I should raise would be an estate tail in remainder in Thomas, with an estate tail in remainder in James. It is said, that will be at variance with the rule which has been laid down in modern times as correct, and that the words "for want of such lawful issue" are to be taken referentially, meaning the issue mentioned before, and should not be taken to enlarge the previous estate. Your Lordships will observe you do not enlarge the previous estate in the mode in which that rule of law laid down by Mr. Jarman is meant to imply. You do not say that Thomas took an estate, enlarged by these words to an estate tail. What you conclude is, if the estates are to be raised by implication, that the testator meant to say he gave an estate for life only to Thomas, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and for want of such lawful issue, that is, for want of lawful issue male (that was the particular sort of issue he was contemplating), then, not that you enlarge the prior estate, but, for the purpose of effectuating the intentions of the testator, you give that, without which his intention would be defeated; the estate tail in remainder to Thomas and to James and to the daughters; and therefore, that it is a remainder, or rather a contingent remainder barred by the recovery, the result is the same. I rather think upon the authorities, that such an estate tail may be presumed, and that Thomas would, when he suffered the recovery, be a tenant in tail in possession, and that all the remainders over were barred. If that were not so, it must have been that he was only tenant for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with a contingent remainder over which was equally barred by the recovery, so that quidcunque videt the decision was correct before, by Lord Eldon in 1812. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—I agree with my noble and learned friends in the conclusion at which they have arrived. With regard to the point in the case as to the title of the plaintiff to take as descendant of a daughter who was deceased at the time of the making of the will, I agree with my noble and learned friends that he does not come within the terms of the devise. Now I was very much struck with the way in which this was put by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack in the course of the argument.

He said, "To whom do the words 'my daughters' refer?" Clearly they can only refer to the daughters in existence at the date of the will. If this was the question as to the words of reference, "their children" must necessarily be confined to them, and it seems impossible, whatever we may conjecture as to the intention of the testator, to put any other interpretation upon the words than that suggested by my noble and learned friends, and it is conclusive against the title of the plaintiff.

The point does not appear to have been much regarded, if at all, and to have come upon the appellant rather by surprise, and therefore, I should much regret if the House were to come to a conclusion adverse to the appellant upon this point; but I agree with my two noble and learned friends with regard to their construction of the will, which construction is fatal to the title of the plaintiff.

It appears, from the statement, which was made by counsel on the argument of this case, in the case of Mellish v. Mellish (3), that Lord Eldon, and the Court of Queen's Bench upon the case submitted to them, came to the conclusion that Thomas Chorlton had an estate tail, and the counsel adds, that in the Court of Exchequer last year the Court came to the same result, acting upon the authority of Robinson v. Robinson (11). If that is so, the Lord Chief Baron must have been of opinion that the words "first son severally and successively," were words of limitation, and were equivalent to "issue male." Now, we have no account of the grounds upon which the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Queen's Bench came to the conclusion that there was an estate tail in Thomas Chorlton; but I think we must look for that estate tail in other words of the will than those upon which the Lord Chief Baron seems to have relied, because I read the will in the same way as my noble and learned friends.

I think, in the first place, Thomas Chorlton had an estate for life. Then, that the words "first son of his body severally and successively" in tail male must mean first son in order, severally and successively, or in other words, first and other sons in tail. Therefore, if the counsel were correct in saying that the Lord Chief Baron decided there was an estate tail in Thomas Chorlton, upon the authority of the case of Robinson v. Robinson (11), I cannot agree in that decision, and we must look for the estate tail which Lord Eldon and the Court of Queen's Bench seem to have held was in Thomas Chorlton to other words of the will. That can only be found in the words which precede the limitation to the daughters—in the words "and for want of such lawful issue of that name, either by my said grandson Thomas Chorlton or my son James Chorlton," and the question upon those words would be whether an estate tail by implication was raised in Thomas Chorlton. Now the appellant contends that there was no implication by these words, of an estate in Thomas Chorlton, but that by the referential word "such"—"such lawful issue of that name" of James—the will must mean the first and other sons of James in tail male. And this estate by implication to the first and other sons of James would make the limitation to the daughters a vested remainder, and consequently that remainder would not be affected by the recovery which was suffered by Thomas Chorlton. It is true that that would have been a forfeiture of his estate for life; but the persons entitled in remainder were not bound to take advantage of that forfeiture. They might wait until the determination of the preceding estate, when they would be entitled in possession. Now, as has been said by my noble and learned friend near me (Lord Cranworth), on the question whether there is an estate raised by implication or not—whether that is determined one way or the other, in the view which he has taken, would be possibly immaterial as against the plaintiff. Suppose there is no implication of an estate in James, the consequence would be that the limitation to the daughters and their children would not take effect until failure of issue of Thomas and James, and that would, therefore, be a contingent remainder, and it would be defeated by the recovery suffered by Thomas Chorlton; but I am not disposed to concur with him that there really is no implication of an estate. I will take it, in the first place, there is an implication of an estate in tail male in James Chorlton. Now, if that be so, the limitation to the daughters would be a vested remainder. But if there is also, as I think there must be, as well as an implication of an estate tail in James, an implication also of an estate tail in Thomas, then of course that estate tail in Thomas would enable him to suffer a recovery and to defeat all the limitations over.

Now, that there would be an implication of an estate tail in James, appears to me to be clear, from looking to the mode in which the testator has shewn an anxious desire that his estate should always continue in a person bearing the name of Chorlton. Now, suppose there is no implication of an estate tail in James, why, James might have had (as the ultimate limitation is not to take effect until the failure of issue male of James) sons for many generations—descendants for many generations, and during that time the estate would descend to the heir-at-law, who probably would not be a person bearing the name of Chorlton. Therefore, it appears to me that to effect the intention of the testator, there must be an estate tail by implication in James. And if there is an estate tail by implication in James, what reason can there be for saying that the very same expressions applicable to Thomas should not also raise an estate tail in him, assuming a question to have been stated under which it would be absolutely necessary, in order that the complete intention of the testator should have effect, that there should be an estate tail also in Thomas? Therefore, it appears that whichever way you take it, whether you imply estates tail in Thomas and James or not, that the result is equally unfavourable to the plaintiff. If there are no estates by implication, then, as the ultimate limitation is not to take effect until the failure of issue of Thomas and James, there would be a contingent remainder that would be defeated by the recovery; and if there are estates tail by implication to be raised in Thomas and James, then there were estates tail enabling Thomas to suffer the recovery, and to bar the subsequent limitations. Upon these grounds I agree with my noble and learned friends that the appeal must be dismissed.

Judgment of the Court below affirmed.

1865. { BROWN v. THE ACCRINGTON
Jan. 30.* { COTTON-SPINNING AND MA-NUFACTURING COMPANY
(LIMITED).

Master and Servant — Negligence — Liability of Master.

A workman cannot recover damages from his employers for injury sustained by him while at work in their mill, and resulting from the building having been originally negligently constructed, unless personal negligence be proved against his employers themselves (or against some person acting by their orders), either in having given directions how the building should be constructed, or in having knowingly entrusted the execution of the work to an incompetent person.

Declaration—That the defendants were possessed of a certain unfinished cotton spinning-mill and premises at Accrington, and although the defendants were well aware and had full knowledge that the foundations of the said mill, and the pillars which were intended to support the same, were not sufficiently strong to support an extra story or stories, the defendants had carelessly, negligently and improperly built and erected, and had caused to be built and erected, an extra story or stories, and had placed and caused the same to be placed upon the said mill without increasing the support to the said mill, and had carelessly, &c. placed a weight on the said pillars too great for the said pillars and foundations to bear, and had carelessly &c. built and erected the said mill and premises of such insufficient materials and construction that the same was dangerous and likely and liable to fall down and to fall in; and the plaintiff was a stonemason, and was employed as such by the defendants for hire and reward; and the defendants, well knowing all the premises, and the danger of what had been done as aforesaid, and the danger that any one would incur and be exposed to who was in or upon the said mill and premises, extra story or stories, wrongfully, carelessly, &c. ordered and directed and induced and permitted the plaintiff to go up into the said mill and premises and into the said extra story or stories and work there as a stonemason in his said employment, and did not give the plaintiff any warning or notice of the premises, and of the danger of being in the said mill and premises, and in the said extra story or stories, and carelessly, &c. neglected to take any precautions against accidents and for the safety and protection of persons lawfully in and upon the said mill and premises; and the plaintiff thereupon, in obedience to the said order and direction, and not knowing the premises, and believing that there was no danger in obeying the said order and direction, did go into the said mill and premises, and did go up into the said extra story or stories, and did work there as a stonemason in his said employment; and whilst the plaintiff was so working as aforesaid in the said mill and premises, and in the said extra story or stories, and whilst he was fulfilling his duty and the said order and direction of the defendants, and without any negligence or default or knowledge or want of care on his part, and by means of the said careless, &c. conduct of the defendants in that behalf, and not otherwise, the said mill and premises fell down and fell in, and by means thereof and of the careless, &c. conduct of the defendants in that behalf, the plaintiff was precipitated down and was greatly and permanently wounded, injured and damaged.

The second count was similar to the first, alleging that the defendants carelessly, &c. induced, invited, and permitted the plaintiff to enter the said mill and premises, &c.

Plea—Not guilty. Issue thereon.

The case was tried, before Blackburn, J., at the Lancashire Winter Assize, 1864, when it appeared that the injuries complained of were sustained by the plaintiff when working as a stonemason in the defendants' mill. One Dean had been employed by the defendants as their clerk of the works to superintend the building of the mill in 1862. It was originally intended that the mill should be only two stories high, and that the foundations should be of ashlar, 3 feet thick; but subsequently the defendants altered their plans, determining to have two additional stories. Before that, however, Dean had directed the foundations to be constructed of 16 feet of rubble instead of 3 feet of ashlar. In March 1863 the plaintiff was employed by Dean to work in the mill, and while occupied in the third story, the floor fell in, and he was injured. Evidence was given that some of the pillars on which the building rested had been observed to be not vertical, and that to rectify this their feet had been shifted from the centre of the rubble foundations below; it was also shewn that the rubble foundations were too weak for the weight of the two additional stories.

The Judge asked the jury, first, whether the accident was caused by the negligence of the company or any of their servants; secondly, whether the company were guilty of negligence in appointing Dean to superintend the work. The jury found for the plaintiff, damages 500*l.*, the Judge reserving leave to the defendants to move for a nonsuit, if the Court should think there was not sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.

S. Temple having obtained a rule accordingly, either for a nonsuit, or a new trial, on the grounds that there was no evidence of negligence, and that, if there were, it was the negligence of a fellow-servant of the plaintiff,—

Edward James and Holker now shewed cause, contending that, in order that a master may be free from liability for injury done to his servant through the negligence of a fellow-servant, the master must shew that he was not guilty of negligence in employing an incompetent workman. The master is bound to select sound and safe materials—Brydon v. Stewart (1), Roberts v. Smith (2), Mellors v. Shaw (3), all cited in Addison on Torts, 2nd edit. p. 156. The jury have found here want of care on the part of the defendants in not employing a proper superintendent. A master must use reasonable care that his servants are not exposed to unnecessary risk—Barton's Hill Coal Company v. Reid (4).

[MARTIN, B.—In that case there was want of reasonable care at the very time of the mischief. If I build a house as I please, and years afterwards it falls and injures some one, am I liable?]

Under such circumstances, a man by whose own negligent act the danger has been occasioned would be liable. The case is different where a man has purchased a house not knowing of its ruinous condition.

[MARTIN, B.—To whom am I under an obligation not to lay the foundation as I please?]

A landlord is responsible to the public for negligence in demising a house in a ruinous condition—Todd v. Flight (5). The defendants are liable if they were personally negligent—Ashworth v. Stanwix (6), Roberts v. Smith (2), Mellors v. Shaw (3); or, if there was no personal negligence on their part, still they are liable if Dean was negligent, unless the plaintiff was a fellow-servant of Dean—Addison on Torts, p. 324, and cases there cited. Again, supposing the plaintiff Dean's fellow-servant, then the defendants are liable for their original negligence in employing Dean, an incompetent workman, who was guilty of the negligence long before the plaintiff entered the defendants' service.

Temple and Kay, in support of the rule, contended that, even if the accident had been proved to be the result of Dean's negligence, the plaintiff could not recover, as he was Dean's fellow-servant—Gallagher v. Piper (7) and Lovegrove v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway (8); and that, even if the plaintiff was not Dean's fellow-servant, the defendants did not warrant the safety of the building; and as there was no personal negligence proved on their part, the plaintiff must, in order to make them liable, shew not only that Dean was incompetent, but also that the defendants knew that he was incompetent when they employed him—Potts v. the Port Carlisle Dock and Railway Company (9).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (10) was now (Jan. 30) delivered by—

POLLOCK, C.B.—The complaint of the plaintiff in this case is that, while he was working in the defendants' mill, one of the floors of the mill fell in, and he was injured. We are all of opinion that there was no such evidence of negligence as to enable the plaintiff to bring this action, and that therefore a nonsuit should be entered; but, as the plaintiff has the power of commencing another action if he pleases and presenting the case before a jury in a different light, and taking the opinion of a different tribunal, we think it right not to give a minute detail of the circumstances, or to reason upon the various matters so as to create any prejudice in the case of future inquiry.

Our opinion is founded on this, that there is no personal negligence brought home by the evidence before us, either to the defendants themselves or to any person acting as their servant or by their orders, for which they are responsible, either by having given directions how the work should be done, or by their having any reason to suppose that the person to whom they entrusted the charge of doing the work, was not a person competent to do the work.

Rule absolute for a nonsuit.

The Court held that the facts proved did not establish a case of negligence against the defendants.”

Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 31, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 25, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87.—Liability of Corporation.

An industrial society, formed before the passing of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862, (which provides for the incorporation of previously-existing societies on registration, and enacts that legal proceedings then pending against a trustee or public officer may be prosecuted against the society in its registered name, but omits to provide for pending claims), cannot, although subsequently registered under that act, be sued as a corporation in an action commenced after the passing of the act for a debt incurred previously thereto.—So held on the authority of Dean v. Mellard (1).

Declaration for goods sold and delivered, and on accounts stated.

Plea—never indebted. Issue thereon.

The action was tried, before Martin, B., during the Sittings in Middlesex after Easter Term, 1865, when a formal verdict was taken for the plaintiffs for 27l. 4s. 10d., subject to the opinion of the Court as to whether the defendants were liable to be sued as a body corporate or not.

It appeared at the trial that an industrial society was formed in Blakeney, called the "Blakeney Miners' Joint Co-operative Industrial Society," and that its rules were certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies in January 1862. Under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 31. and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 25, which were then in force, such societies were to sue and to be sued by their officers appointed for that purpose, or by their trustees.

By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87, which was passed in August 1862, the above-mentioned statutes were repealed, without any reservation in favour of existing societies, which were to be at liberty to register under the new act and to become bodies corporate.

The goods were supplied to the society by the plaintiffs in November 1864; the society was registered under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87. in February 1865, for the purpose of being wound up, and this action was commenced in the following March.

Macnamara having obtained a rule to set aside the verdict and to enter it for the defendants, on the ground that they were not liable in their corporate capacity, citing Dean v. Mellard (1),—

Gates now shewed cause, contending that, as 15 & 16 Vict. c. 31. and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 25, which provided public officers to sue and be sued, were repealed by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87,—the 6th section of which enacts that "the certificate of registration shall vest in the society all the property that may at the time be vested in any person in trust for the society, and that all legal proceedings then pending by or against any such trustee or other officer, on account of the society may be prosecuted by or against the society in its registered name without abatement,"—à fortiori new proceedings regarding pending claims might be brought against the society in its corporate capacity. Before the last statute, the action must have been against the public officer; and, if the certificate of registration vests in the society all the property before vested in the trustees, it also confers on the society all the rights and liabilities of the trustees. In Toutill v. Douglas (2), Cockburn, C.J. said that it was contemplated that a society formed under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 31, would acquire a new status under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87, and that it was for the purpose of registration only under the new act that such a society could be said to be in existence. The intention of the act of 1862 must have been to make provision for bringing new actions, as well as for continuing old ones; and though Dean v. Mellard (1) was held to have been well brought against the members of the society individually, yet there is nothing in it to shew that the corporate body was not also liable to be sued.

Macnamara was not called upon to support the rule.

MARTIN, B.—This case is governed by Dean v. Mellard (1). There the Court held the action to have been well brought against the individual shareholders. Williams, J. remarked that the legislature has, in 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87, confined the indulgence given by section 6. "to actions which were pending at the time the certificate of registration was obtained; and that must mean actions which were commenced before the act of 1862 was passed." The construction put on section 6. by the plaintiffs' counsel may be reasonable, but Dean v. Mellard (1) prevents us from adopting it.

(2) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 66.

BRAMWELL, B.—I admit the force of the argument on the 6th section of the act, that if an action, already commenced against a trustee, may be continued against the new corporation, it is but reasonable that a new one might be commenced against the corporation; but Dean v. Mellard (1) is in point the other way; and it may be that the legislature meant to provide only for the continuance of old actions, without providing for the commencement of new ones.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the case is governed by Dean v. Mellard (1).

{ BELDING AND ANOTHER, assignees of George King Randlesome, v. READ.

Debtor and Creditor—Bill of Sale—Assignment of after-acquired Property — Covenant to pay on Demand.

G. K., who was a trader, by a bill of sale, assigned to the defendant "all his household furniture, plate, linen, china, glass, all his stock, cattle, horses, farming implements, crops, book-debts, and all other his personal estate and effects whatsoever then being or hereafter to be upon or about his dwelling-house, farm and premises." The bill of sale also empowered the defendant, "in case the sum of 300l. and interest should not be paid on demand, to enter upon the premises which might be in the occupation of the debtor, and there distrain the goods and chattels there found for the sum of 300l. and interest." After the execution of the bill of sale, G. K. purchased goods from time to time in the way of his trade, some of which were upon and about his premises on the 8th of January 1862, on which day a formal demand of the sum of 300l. was made on G. K.'s wife, and on non-payment of the same, on the same day, the defendant entered and seized all the furniture, goods, chattels and effects found upon the premises :—Held, that the demand on the wife was not a sufficient demand, and that the property acquired by G. K. after the execution of the bill of sale did not pass to the defendant.

This action was brought for converting the bankrupt's goods after his bankruptcy.

The cause came on for trial, before Cockburn, C.J., when it was agreed between the parties to state a SPECIAL CASE for the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiffs are the assignees of George King Randlesome, who before and at the time of his bankruptcy resided and carried on the business of a grocer and draper at Reedham, in Norfolk. In the month of January 1857 the bankrupt was carrying on the business of a cattle-dealer at Reedham, under the name of George King, and being indebted to the defendant to the amount of 300l., on the 24th of January, executed to the defendant, who required the same, a bill of sale under seal. By the bill of sale the bankrupt assigned unto the defendant all his household furniture, plate, linen, china, glass, all his stock, cattle, houses, farming implements, crops, book-debts, and all other his personal estate and effects whatsoever then being or hereafter to be upon or about his dwelling-house, farm and premises situate at Reedham, or elsewhere in the kingdom of Great Britain, upon trust to convert the same into money, and to pay thereout the costs of preparing and perfecting such bill of sale, the charges and expenses attending such conversion into money of the hereby assigned premises, and all other expenses attending the execution of the trusts thereby created, and then to pay or retain to himself, the defendant, the sum of 300l. and interest, and to pay the surplus, if any, to the bankrupt.

The bill of sale empowered the defendant or any person authorized by him, to enter upon any premises upon which any part of the goods and chattels thereby assigned might happen to be, and to take possession of such goods and chattels upon the trusts aforesaid; and in case the said sum of 300*l.* and interest should not be paid upon demand, the bill of sale also empowered the defendant at any time hereafter, and from time to time, until the sum of 300*l.* and interest should be paid, to enter into and upon all and every the hereditaments and premises which might from time to time be in the occupation of the bankrupt, and there distrain the goods and chattels there found for the sum of 300*l.* and interest; and in case such sum and interest, together with the costs of taking and keeping such distress, should not be paid within one day of the making thereof, the defendant was empowered to sell such goods and chattels in order that by means of such distress and sale the sum of 300*l.*, and interest, and all costs of any distress or distresses, might be paid to the defendant. And the bankrupt did by the bill of sale authorize the defendant to plead such bill of sale as a leave and licence or a general release, in bar of any action which might be brought for breaking into or remaining in or upon such hereditaments and premises, or for distraining and selling the goods and chattels there found. And it was by the bill of sale declared that, until the defendant should think fit to take possession of the assigned premises, it should be lawful for the bankrupt to retain possession thereof.

The bill of sale was duly filed in the Queen's Bench office on the 9th of February 1857.

After the execution of the bill of sale the bankrupt continued to carry on his then trade of a cattle-dealer, and from time to time sold and disposed of his stock-in-trade as such dealer, and purchased other cattle in substitution thereof, but he was not possessed of any cattle on the 8th of January 1862.

In the month of April next after the execution of the bill of sale, the bankrupt commenced the trade of a grocer and general-shop dealer, at Reedham, and from time to time purchased goods in the way of his trade and sold some of the same, and so on from time to time until the 8th of January 1862, when he was in possession of goods constituting his stock-in-trade as such grocer and general-shop keeper, and of the horse and gig hereinafter mentioned.

The whole of such stock-in-trade was purchased after the execution of the bill of sale.

On the 8th of January 1862 all the bankrupt's goods and chattels were taken possession of and dealt with by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned; and in respect of which acts of the defendant this action has been brought.

On or about the 8th of January 1862 Samuel Aldred, of Yarmouth, auctioneer, was authorized by the defendant to distrain the furniture, goods, chattels and effects of the bankrupt, in default of payment of the sum of 245*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* due from him to the defendant under or by virtue of the bill of sale, dated the 24th of January 1857, executed by the bankrupt in favour of the defendant.

On the 8th of January 1862 Samuel Aldred proceeded to the dwelling-house and premises occupied by the bankrupt at Reedham, and where he resided, and upon inquiry, Samuel Aldred was informed that the bankrupt was from home. Samuel Aldred then stated to the wife of the bankrupt that he was authorized, as the fact was, to demand and receive payment of a sum of 245*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, due from her husband to the defendant, otherwise he should have to put into effect the provisions of the bill of sale; and he made a formal demand of the amount to the wife of the bankrupt, but the same remained unsatisfied, and Samuel Aldred, on the day and year last aforesaid, distrained the furniture, goods, chattels and effects found upon the said premises of the bankrupt pursuant to his instructions, and on the 14th day of the same month sold the same by public auction. The whole of such goods and chattels were at a value of 97*l.* 2*s.*, and such part of the last-mentioned goods and chattels as were purchased by the bankrupt after the giving of the bill of sale were of the value of 47*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.*

On the same 8th of January, the defendant entered certain livery-stables and premises at Yarmouth, not in the occupation of the bankrupt, and seized and took possession of a horse and gig of the bankrupt standing there at livery, and sold the same on the 28th of January.

The horse and gig had been purchased by the bankrupt after the giving of the bill of sale, and they were of the value of 16*l*.

On the 13th of January the bankrupt was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition, and on the 14th of January notice of the filing of the petition was given to the auctioneer.

On the 28th of January 1862 the plaintiffs were duly appointed creditors' assignees of the estate and effects of the bankrupt.

The questions for the opinion of the Court are : first, whether the bill of sale was void under the Statute of Elizabeth, or under the Bankruptcy Acts ; if not void, whether, secondly, under such bill of sale the defendant could lawfully seize and sell all or any and which of the after-acquired goods and chattels of the bankrupt. If the bill of sale was void, the verdict is to stand for the plaintiffs for the sum of 113*l*. 2*s*. If the defendant could not lawfully seize and sell any of the after-acquired goods and chattels of the bankrupt, the verdict is to stand for the plaintiffs for the sum of 62*l*. 5*s*. 8*d*. If the defendant could lawfully seize and sell such only of the after-acquired goods and chattels of the bankrupt as were found in his premises, the verdict is to stand for the sum of 16*l*. If the defendant could lawfully seize and sell all the after-acquired goods and chattels of the bankrupt, the verdict is to be entered for the defendant.

O'Malley, for the plaintiffs, conceded that the deed was a valid deed ; but he contended that the defendant could not seize and sell the horse and gig, nor the stock-in-trade purchased by the bankrupt after the execution of the bill of sale. With regard to the former the power in the deed to seize and sell was confined to the goods on the premises of King ; and with regard to the latter, the property in the after-acquired property did not pass to the defendant ; that the deed gave the defendant a power to seize and sell after a demand made for the payment of the money lent ; that the demand on the wife was not a sufficient demand, and if there was no demand the power to seize and sell could not be exercised—Brighty v. Norton (1), and Toms v. Wilson (2).

Keane (A. K. Stephenson with him) contended that although the after-acquired property did not pass at law, yet it was bound by contract, and that there was such a contract between the bankrupt and defendant as a Court of equity would enforce—Holroyd v. Marshall (3).

O'Malley was not heard in reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiffs. The bill of sale is not void under the Statute of Elizabeth, but although not void its operation is by no means that contended for by the defendant's counsel. The defendant acquired a right to the property which existed in specie at the time the bill of sale was executed, but not to the property acquired by him after the bill of sale was executed. I take it as having been long ago settled that a man cannot by deed, however solemn, assign that which is not in him ; in short, there cannot be a prophetic conveyance of any kind, and therefore the defendant did not acquire a right to the after-acquired property. It appears to me that the defendant could not lawfully seize and sell all the goods ; he could not seize and sell that which had been acquired by the bankrupt after the execution of the deed. I think that this view is not at all inconsistent with the principle laid down in Holroyd v. Marshall (3). The plaintiff having given up a portion of their claim, he is entitled to our judgment for 62*l*. 5*s*. 8*d*.

MARTIN, B.—I am also of the same opinion. The bill of sale comprises two species of securities, and they appear to be separately dealt with in the deed itself. In the first place, it conveys to the creditor all the household furniture, plate, linen, china, glass, all the stock, cattle, horses, farming implements, crops, debts, and all other the personal estate and effects of him the said George King now being, or hereafter to be, upon or about the dwelling-house, farm and premises. Now, in my opinion, the words "hereafter to be" are null ; but assuming them to be not null, and that the reasonable intention of the parties was, that there was to be an assignment, which in law could not be, of goods subsequently acquired, then according to the principle laid down in Holroyd v. Marshall (3), Read would have no legal title to these goods; but he would have a mere equitable right to them; and it is perfectly clear, as it seems to me, that no bill for specific performance could be maintained for the purpose of compelling the conveyance of the goods subsequently acquired. The reasons are very clearly pointed out by the Lord Chancellor, that the equitable title to goods is confined to some specific goods, and not merely to undetermined goods.

(1) 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 38.

In the next portion of the deed that Mr. Keane relied upon it is declared that Read (that is, the creditor), or any person authorized by him, with the aid of a peace officer, may enter on and take possession of all the chattels legally hereby assigned, and to eject and remove the bankrupt therefrom, and to enter and to continue in possession of any part of the goods and chattels hereby assigned which may happen to be in his possession, and for the purpose of taking possession, it shall be lawful to break open doors and locks without being liable to any action of trespass. I think, then, this clause relates to property which is properly at common law the subject-matter of assignment. It may be that it was never intended to give the creditors an absolute dominion over those goods, but it is proposed to give him a further power, and I think that is strictly a power to take possession of the goods assigned to him. The deed further states that he, King, shall, on demand so made for the same, pay unto Read the sum of 300*l.*, with interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum. I think no sufficient demand of payment was made. It seems to me there could not be properly a demand made by a demand made on the wife; there is nothing to shew that the husband was from home, and that there was no possibility of making a demand upon him. Now, then, what follows? "If the money shall not be paid on demand made, it shall be lawful for Read or any person authorized by him from time to time until the said sum of 300*l.* shall be paid, to enter, by any lawful means he shall think proper, on the said premises in the occupation of King, and for that purpose break open the doors and there distrain the goods and chattels there found for the sum of 300*l.*" Now the word distrain is a word not properly applicable to this matter; the meaning obviously is that he shall go and take possession of what he sees for the purpose of getting a beneficial interest by sale to pay his debt; and it seems to me that the creditor had a power to enter upon the property of the bankrupt, the premises belonging to King, and then to take possession of any goods which might be found, and if he had executed this power properly he would have been entitled by virtue of this clause to have sold them and applied the proceeds in payment of his debt. But it seems to me, as I have already said, with respect to the nature of the subsequently acquired property, that state of things never arose which would give to him this power, because no demand was ever made. And with respect to the pony and gig, it was not upon the premises, and there was no power, for that reason. The case of Holroyd v. Marshall (3) has been cited, but I do not think that case is in point. As I read the judgments of Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chancellor in Holroyd v. Marshall (3), they seem not to apply to the present case, where none of the property was of the character of fixed machinery or was ear-marked as belonging to the premises. For the reasons I have given it seems to me there was no beneficial interest in this property in Read, and that the case is not within the case of Holroyd v. Marshall (3), which I think, on reading the judgments of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford, is very clearly distinguishable from the present case.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. As to the pony and gig, they could not be taken under the general powers of the bill of sale, because they were not upon the premises. And as to the residue of the goods, they could not be taken under the general power because there was no demand. The demand which was proved was no more than a challenge; it was therefore no demand, and consequently there was no such power, and the defendant had no right to exercise the power given to him. It has been contended for the defendant that he can rely on the earlier clause that purports to convey all future property as well as the present, and he relies upon this to shew the assignees had no title to anything except that in which King was beneficially interested or entitled to, and then he says this clause conveying every thing takes away all the beneficial interest, that is to say, in all the after-acquired property. But I think this is not so, and that the interest in the goods subsequently acquired by the bankrupt did not pass to the defendant. The case of Holroyd v. Marshall (3), which was cited, does not seem to me to be an authority to shew that such property passed to the defendant, because what that case decided was, that where property not in one sense specific at the time of the deed, might become specific by its being brought into a certain described place and made a part of the machinery, that then such a covenant as this, or such a grant as this, would confer an equitable interest in the property though not in existence at the time the covenant was made. But the property which is the subject of the present inquiry has never, in a sense, become specific so as to be the subject of a decree for specific performance. It seems to me, therefore, that that case is no authority for the purpose of shewing that after-acquired property passed. And then, again, if we look at the whole of the deed it is clear that the intention of the parties is that a demand must be made before the property can be seized, so that the covenant is in effect to take possession of the "goods after demand," and a demand not having been made the result is that, looking at the whole deed together, the equitable interest intended to be conveyed by the deed in the after-acquired property had never vested in the defendant, because he had never done anything to entitle him to it. On both those grounds, it seems to me the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to our judgment as to the sum of 62*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, being the amount of the goods acquired by the bankrupt after the bill of sale; and the question seems to me, in substance, to be this, whether the property in the bankrupt in those goods had ever been divested? I think there cannot be any doubt that a bill of sale will pass the property in any goods which the vendor would have in his possession at the time he executed it. Although there may be one or two exceptions pointed out in Shep. Touch., in which some goods may be excepted, yet, as a general rule, a bill of sale would operate in conveying any property the vendor had at the time of the bill of sale. It appears to me that the House of Lords, in the case of Holroyd v. Marshall (3), only carried out and adopted a well-known rule of equity, that what is contracted to be done was to be considered as done, and they describe in the result the distinction that exists in law between a contract to do a thing and the act of doing it. But then they were dealing with goods of a specific character, and goods which had been brought on the premises after the vendor had entered into the contract, and annexed them to the machinery. There, no doubt, the property would become the property of the vendee. The House of Lords only acted on the ordinary rule. Here the contract is operative to this extent, that it gave the vendee certain rights under it; if he had exercised those rights according to the powers in the deed, then he would have been entitled, if he had performed the powers, or acted upon the condition of the powers, to vest in himself the property in those goods by his intervention, though the property would not pass by the deed itself. I agree with the rest of the Court in thinking the demand, under the circumstances stated in this case, was not an act that vested the property in the vendee as if the demand had been properly made. That, I think, prevents any difficulty arising from the supposed application of Holroyd v. Marshall (3). I understand that case established a very sound principle, though not one that would at all govern the present inquiry.

1865. } HIDSON AND ANOTHER v.
Feb. 7. } BARCLAY.*

Debtor and Creditor—Composition-Deed—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Reasonable Covenants.

By a composition-deed purporting to be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 192, it was covenanted that "no creditor who shall have executed or otherwise assented to these presents shall negotiate any bills of exchange, or other negotiable instrument on which the debtor is liable, without having first indorsed thereon a memorandum of the execution of or other accession to these presents by such creditor."

A second covenant was in these terms: "And in consideration of the premises, it is hereby declared and agreed, (but each of the creditors who shall have executed or otherwise assented to or be bound by these presents, agreeing and declaring for himself and his partners, and his and their respective heirs, executors and administrators, and so far as relates to his and their respective acts and defaults,) that if the said trustees shall, within the time aforesaid, certify under their hands to the effect hereinbefore mentioned, the creditors of the debtor who shall have executed or assented to or be bound by these presents shall not, nor shall any of them, nor shall their respective heirs, executors, or administrators, or partners or assignees, at any time (except in respect of the covenant or agreements herein contained, or any of them, or in respect of the aforesaid promissory notes, or except so far as may be necessary in order to enforce any mortgage, lien or security, or any rights or remedies against any persons other than the debtor) commence or prosecute any action or suit at law or in equity, or other proceeding, or obtain any act or adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor or his heirs, executors or administrators, or make or sue out any attachment or requisition of or upon him or them, or his or their property, credits or effects, for or on account of all or any part of the debts now due from the debtor to the said creditors who shall have executed or otherwise assented to or be bound by these presents, or any of such creditors, or for or on account of all or any claim of such creditors provable under these presents, and that this present agreement may be pleaded to any action brought contrary to this agreement as if the same were an actual release." Held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, that the first covenant was valid, as it applied to and bound those creditors only who assented to it by executing or assenting to the deed, and did not bind non-assenting creditors.

Held, further, that the second covenant was a reasonable and proper covenant.

Error was brought by the defendant to reverse the judgment of the Court of Exchequer on a demurrer.

The declaration was on a bill of exchange with the ordinary money counts.

The defendant pleaded a composition-deed under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The deed was set out in the plea. The defendant demurred to the plea on account of the insufficiency of the deed to bind him, a non-assenting creditor.

The material clauses in the deed are set out in the report below (1), and in the judgment of this Court.

The case was argued on the 2nd of December 1864, by—

Field and Murray, for the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, and by Willes, for the defendants in error, the plaintiffs below.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

BLACKBURN, J. — This was a case in error from the Court of Exchequer, argued in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, during the sittings after last Michaelmas Term, before Chief Justice Erle, and my Brothers Crompton, Keating, Mellor and myself. I am about to deliver the judgment of the Court. The question in the cause is raised by a demurrer to a plea; it is, whether a composition-deed between the defendant and his creditors is a bar to this action by a creditor who has not assented to that deed. It is averred in the plea, and admitted by the demurrer, that all the conditions in the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act have been complied with, and it was not disputed, either in the Court below or in the argument before us, that the deed was such a deed as would bar an action by any creditor bound by it. The deed is set out in the plea at length. It contains various covenants, which are numbered. By the fifth it is agreed that "No creditor who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to these presents, shall negotiate any bills of exchange, or other negotiable instrument, on which the debtor is liable, without having first indorsed thereon a memorandum of the execution of or other accession to these presents by such creditor." The eighth is in these terms: "And in consideration of the premises, it is hereby declared and agreed (but each of the creditors who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to or be bound by these presents, agreeing and declaring for himself and his partners, and his and their respective heirs, executors and administrators, and so far as relates to his and their respective acts and defaults), that if the said trustees shall, within the time aforesaid, certify under their hands to the effect hereinbefore mentioned, the creditors of the debtor who shall have executed or acceded to or be bound by these presents shall not, nor shall any of them, nor shall their respective heirs, executors or administrators, or partners or assignees, at any time (except in respect of the covenant or agreements herein contained, or any of them, or in respect of the aforesaid promissory notes, or except so far as may be necessary in order to enforce any mortgage, lien or security, or any rights or remedies against any persons other than the debtor), commence or prosecute any action or suit at law or in equity, or other proceeding, or obtain any act or adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor or his heirs, executors or administrators, or make or sue out any attachment or requisition of or upon him or them, or his or their property, credits or effects, for or on account of all or any part of the debts now due from the debtor to the said creditors who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to or be bound by these presents, or any of such creditors, or for or on account of all or any claim of such creditors provable under these presents, and that this present agreement may be pleaded to any action brought contrary to this agreement as if the same were an actual release." It was on these two covenants, and on these two only, that the judgment of the Court below in favour of the plaintiff proceeded.

* Decided in the Sittings after Hilary Term, coram Erle, C.J., Crompton, J., Blackburn, J., Keating, J. and Mellor, J.

On the argument before us some other objections were taken to the deed, as to which we expressed our opinion at the time in favour of the defendant, and which we need not now further notice. We also expressed our opinion during the argument that the objection to the deed on account of the eighth covenant was not well founded. A simple release by a creditor, given to a debtor, discharges all sureties and co-debtors, and it is, therefore, in general inexpedient to insert a simple release in a composition-deed. But a covenant not to sue the debtor, except in so far as may be necessary for the purpose of enforcing remedies against others, only bars the covenantor from suing for himself, but does not discharge sureties or co-contractors. It has the operation of a release so far as it is expedient in a composition-deed to release the debtor, and no further; and it is, therefore, as we think, a proper and reasonable provision to insert in a deed relating to the debts and liabilities of a debtor, and his release therefrom. We are not to be understood as in any way overruling the decision in Dell v. King (2), that a covenant not to sue, with a provision that the creditor infringing that covenant shall forfeit all benefit under the composition, goes too far. We decide the present point in favour of the defendant because we consider the eighth covenant in this deed as amounting to a simple covenant not to sue except so far as is necessary to prevent the discharge of third parties, and no more.

The Court below chiefly based their judgment upon the fifth covenant, and it was upon this point that we reserved our judgment. After consideration, we are of opinion that this objection to the deed also is not well founded. If the true construction of the instrument had been, that this provision applied to all the creditors, as well those dissenting from the deed, but bound by the force of the statute, as those who voluntarily executed or assented to it, we are by no means prepared to say that it would not have prevented the deed from binding those who dissented. If such were the true construction of it, the assenting creditors (who, it may be, were not the holders of any bill of exchange) would by this have imposed a peculiar burthen upon that class of non-assenting creditors who were holders of bills—see Balden v. Pell (3); and we are not to be understood as determining that a deed which is unequal in the sense that it imposes a peculiar burthen on the dissenting creditors, or any class of them, is valid. But we need not and do not determine any such point, for our judgment proceeds on the ground that this covenant does not apply to the dissenting creditors, who are bound only by the force of the Bankruptcy Act. The covenant is, in terms, expressed so as to shew that the intention was to make it bind only those who executed or otherwise assented to it, and not those who were bound by the deed by force of the Bankruptcy Act, though not assenting to it. The distinction is carefully made in the deed between the other covenants, which (like the eighth) are made to affect those who have executed or otherwise acceded to or are bound by the deed, and this covenant, which affects only those who have executed or otherwise acceded to the deed; and in this particular deed this construction is much fortified by the eleventh clause, which shews that it was intended by the parties acceding to the deed that they might be bound by provisions which did not bind the non-assenting creditors. The creditors who assent to a deed the terms of which, if the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act be properly pursued, bind all the creditors, might, by a separate deed executed at the same time, enter into a collateral arrangement with the debtor affecting themselves only. If by this separate arrangement they obtained any benefit not conferred on those who were bound by the statutable deed, it would be very objectionable, and would probably afford a defence to the non-assenting creditors, who would otherwise have been bound by the statutable deed, on the ground that this collateral agreement for a benefit which they did not share was a fraud upon them. But if the provisions of this supplemental deed were all merely onerous on the creditors executing it, no objection of this kind would arise. The creditors who were not parties to the supplemental deed could not object to an arrangement which in no way affected them. Those who were parties to that arrangement could not object to the terms of the arrangement into which they had voluntarily entered. And we do not see that the arrangement is more objectionable because it is contained in the same instrument, instead of being in a separate one. In Macnaught v. Russell (4), where the question raised related to a deed under the old Bankruptcy Act, the Court of Exchequer in their considered judgment deal thus with the points we are now considering. They say, "It was, thirdly, objected that there was a provision set out relating to creditors not proceeding at law for their debts, which was unreasonable, and which a creditor ought not to be required to enter into. We were at first much struck with this objection, but upon consideration we think it is not fatal to the plea. It is expressly confined to the creditors who are parties to the deed. The plaintiffs are in no way bound by it; they become affected by reason of six-sevenths of the creditors having executed the deed, and we do not think it is of any material consequence to them that the six-sevenths who have signed have entered into a covenant which may impose a hardship upon them. This was a matter for their consideration, and the plaintiff is in no way injured by their voluntarily choosing to take that obligation upon them. The substantial matter so far as he is concerned is his getting the largest possible dividend upon his debt, which this covenant has rather a tendency to secure for him." In this reasoning we completely concur, and we think it applicable to the present case.

(3) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 200.

(4) 1 Hurl. & N. 611; s.c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 192.

The Court below in the present case base their judgment on the proposition that a deed is not good "unless it puts all the creditors on an equal footing." We think that the judgment in Macnaught v. Russell (4) points out the sound distinction, that this position does not extend to those cases in which the executing creditors voluntarily put themselves in a worse position than those whom they seek to bind.

It was further said in the judgment below, that the plaintiffs could not have executed or assented to this deed without incurring this obligation, which is true; and the Court (impliedly) repeat what had been before said by the same Court in Dell v. King (2), that a creditor has a right to have a deed presented to him for execution which, when executed by him, will put no burthen upon him to which he ought not to be subjected. To this we cannot assent. There is no provision in the statute, nor is there anything in the nature of the transaction to render it essential that the creditors who are to be bound by the deed should have had an opportunity to execute the deed at all. It may often happen that three-fourths of the creditors assent to the instrument before notice of it is given to some creditor, either because he is resident at a distance, or because his residence is not known, or it may be to one who is not asked to sign because it is thought he would certainly refuse; yet surely such a creditor would be bound as much as any other. If the debtor so frames his deed that those who assent to it will be worse off than those who stand out, he is less likely to get three-fourths of the creditors to assent; but if (for reasons of which they are the sole judges) three-fourths do voluntarily incur this peculiar burthen, and do assent, we do not see how one of the creditors who has chosen not to incur the burthen is injured, or why he should be less bound than a creditor who has never had notice of the deed at all. For these reasons we think that the judgment below in this case must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

1865. } SCOTT v. THE LONDON DOCK
Feb. 7. } COMPANY.*

Negligence—Inference of Negligence from mere happening of Accident.

The plaintiff, a custom-house officer, while on the defendants' premises in the execution of his duty, was injured by some bags of sugar falling on him from a crane fixed over a doorway, under which he was passing:—Held, by the majority of the Court, Crompton, J., Byles, J., Blackburn, J. and Keating, J., that as the accident was such as did not in the ordinary course of things happen to those who have the management of machinery, and use proper care, it afforded reasonable evidence of negligence in the absence of any explanation by the defendants (dissentientibus Erle, C.J. and Mellor, J.).

This was an appeal by the defendants against the decision of the majority of the Court of Exchequer, making absolute a rule for a new trial in an action for an injury to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, the only witness, stated in his evidence, that as he, in the exercise of his duty as a custom-house officer, was passing under a doorway on the defendants' premises, some bags of sugar fell on him from a crane which was fixed over the doorway. The defendants offered no explanation of the cause of the bags falling. Martin, B. directed a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence; the Court of Exchequer, however, (Martin, B. dissentiente, Pollock, C.B. dubitante), granted a new trial.

Field (Murphy with him), for the appellants, the defendants.—There was no evidence of negligence to maintain the action. The accident happened not in a public street, where the public have a right of way, but on the private premises of the defendants. No doubt the plaintiff was lawfully there, and the bags of sugar were dropped by the defendants' servants. If the evidence is as consistent with the accident not being caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants as with its being caused by their negligence, there is no evidence for the jury. So if the evidence is as consistent with the fact that the plaintiff by his negligence was contributory to the accident as with his not being contributory to it, there is no evidence for the jury, even if there was some evidence of negligence on the part of the company's servants—Cotton v. Wood (1), Hammack v. White (2), Cooke v. Waring (3), Cornman v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (4), Wilkinson v. Fairrie (5) and Bolch v. Smith (6).

[CROMPTON, J.—There is great difficulty in applying the rule of evidence being equally consistent with either view to cases of negligence. How can a Judge say whether the evidence is equally consistent with negligence or no negligence? BLACKBURN, J.—Does not the nature of the accident decide whether the fact of the accident is evidence of negligence? If a ship goes down at sea, and no one can tell whether it sunk by reason of a storm or by reason of the negligence of the crew, the evidence in that case would be equally consistent with either view. But if a ship goes out of harbour, and after it has got a very short distance sinks in a perfectly smooth sea, I think this would, as it has been held, be some evidence that the ship was not seaworthy.]

There must be affirmative evidence of negligence. The plaintiff ought to have explained and detailed the circumstances more. His evidence is ambiguous. He only says the bags fell on him. The bags may have been lowered in the ordinary way, or the sudden illness of a workman might have caused the accident, or some one for whom the defendants were not responsible might have let the bags down.

[CROMPTON, J.—The plaintiff often can give little evidence how the accident was caused. The power of explanation generally lies with the defendant.]

The plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not looking about him.

[CROMPTON, J.—Is it not a question for the jury whether he was negligent?]

Byrne v. Boadle (7), relied on by two of the Judges below, is distinguishable. There the barrel rolled out of the window and into a public highway. Here the bags are not shewn to have rolled out, and the place was not a highway, where the right of the public to pass in safety is paramount to the right of the individual to use his warehouse. If Byrne v. Boadle (7) is not distinguishable, it is contended that it is bad law.

Sir R. P. Collier (Solicitor General), T. Jones with him, for the respondent, the plaintiff.—In many cases of a complicated state of facts, it is impossible for the Judge to say whether the evidence for and against negligence is equal. The facts proved here are more consistent with negligence on the part of the defendants' servants than with the absence of it. In many cases, and in this case, the very happening of the accident is evidence of negligence. It must be considered what evidence the plaintiff can be reasonably expected to give. The rule of pleading, that the party who has peculiar means of knowledge must plead with greater particularity than the other, is founded on good sense, and may guide in determining the rule with respect to the evidence to be required. In Christie v. Griggs (8), where the coach overset, Mansfield, C.J. said that, on proof being given of the accident, the plaintiff had proved enough; and that it lay on the defendant to prove that the coach was well built, and the coachman a skilful driver. So also in Skinner v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (9) it was decided that a collision between two trains of the same company was prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the company, and that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove what specific act of negligence caused the injury; and that if the accident arose from some inevitable or extraordinary cause, it lay on the defendants to prove it. Here the bags fall on the plaintiff; that is something out of the ordinary course of business. The dock company or their servants can tell, if they choose, how the bags fell: whether they rolled out of the warehouse; whether they were negligently fastened by a chain. The absence of explanation is matter for the jury. The case proved of bags suddenly and violently falling on a man from a warehouse is more consistent with the fact that they fell by negligence than that they fell without it. A machine is used for the very purpose of preventing the bags falling. (He was stopped by the Court.)

ERLE, C.J.—The majority of the Court have come to the following conclusion: that there must be reasonable evidence of negligence; that where the thing is solely under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen to those who have the management of machinery and use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care. We all assent to the principle laid down in the cases cited for the defendants, but the judgment turns upon the construction to be put on the Judge's notes. As my Brother Mellor and myself read them, we cannot find that reasonable evidence of the want of care which seems apparent to the rest of the Court. The judgment of the Court below is therefore affirmed, and the case must go down to a new trial, when the real effect of the evidence will in all probability be more correctly ascertained.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]
(Error from the Court of Exchequer.)

1865. }
Feb. 8. } HALL v. JOHNSON.*

Master and Servant—Fall of Roof of Mine—Injury by Negligence of Fellow Servant.

The plaintiff, a workman in a coal-mine of the defendants, received damage from the fall of a stone from the roof of the mine, which had lost its support by reason of the removal of the coal below in the ordinary course of working the mine. The defendants' underlooker, whose duty it was to superintend the mining operations, had negligently, though the danger had been pointed out to him, omitted to prop up the roof. The removal of the coal and the propping up of the roof ought, in the exercise of due and reasonable care, to be nearly contemporaneous operations:—Held, that as there was no evidence that the defendants had not exercised due care in the selection of their underlooker, nor in putting the mine into a proper condition before the miners were sent into it, they were not answerable for the injury caused to the plaintiff by the negligence of the underlooker, his fellow-labourer.

Error was brought in this case by the plaintiff on a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Blackburn, J.

The action was for an injury to the plaintiff: the declaration alleged that the defendants did not use reasonable care in preventing the roof of their mine falling in on the plaintiff, their servant.

The defendants were owners of a coal-mine. The plaintiff was a boy in their employment and worked in their mine, which had been opened and in regular work for five or six years. The nature of the mine required that as the coal was removed in the course of working, the roof of the mine should be propped up to prevent it falling in. The defendants did not personally superintend the working of the mine, but left it to a superior workman called an underlooker, whose duty it was to see to the proper propping up of the roof. The plaintiff, observing a stone in the roof of the mine likely to fall, pointed it out to the underlooker. The latter, however, told the plaintiff to go on with his work, and took no steps to secure the stone in the roof. On the following day as the plaintiff was engaged in his work the stone fell on him and seriously injured him. Blackburn, J. ruled that there was no evidence for the jury to support the plaintiff's claim against the defendants, no evidence having been given of any personal interference on the part of the defendants, or any knowledge by them of the state of the mine.

* Decided in the Sittings after Hilary Term, coram Erle, C.J., Crompton, J., Byles, J. and Blackburn, J.

To this ruling the bill of exceptions was tendered.

T. Jones, for the plaintiff (Feb. 7).—The ruling of the learned Judge was wrong. There was evidence for the jury that the defendants were liable in law for the injury to the plaintiff. The defendants carry on a dangerous business, and engage persons to work in it. There is an inalienable duty cast by the law on persons carrying on dangerous works to take care that everything should be done to prevent extraordinary damage. It is clear that this injury was caused by the negligence of the underlooker, but the defendants cannot relieve themselves from liability by casting the duty of keeping the mine in safety on him. It may be conceded as a general rule that a master who takes due and reasonable care in selecting proper servants, is not liable for an injury that those servants by their negligence inflict on other fellow-servants; but if the occupation is hazardous, besides using reasonable care in selecting his workmen, he is under the further obligation of seeing that the place where the men work is in a reasonably safe and sound condition—Patterson v. Wallace (1), Bryden v. Stewart (2).

[ERLE, C.J.—There the master started the mine with an unsafe shaft.]

In The Barton Hill Company v. Reid (3) the owner of the mine was held liable to one of his workmen for an injury caused by the fall of the roof of the mine.

[CROMPTON, J.—How do you make it negligence in the master if he does not know of the state of the roof?]

He is bound to inform himself of it. The negligence of the underlooker is, in a case like the present, the negligence of the master. If the defendants' liability as masters be limited to taking reasonable and proper care to keep the roof of their mine in a reasonable and proper condition, there is evidence of the defendants' liability here, for they did not take such proper care. The liabilities for injuries from the risks of the service are very different, and in the cases are carefully distinguished from the liabilities attaching on the master from risks arising out of the condition of the plant, machinery or mine—Clarke v. Holmes (4).

E. James (Crompton Hutton with him), for the defendants, was not called upon.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now (Feb. 8) delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—In this case the plaintiff was a labourer in a mine, and he received damage by the fall of a stone from the roof of that mine. The evidence clearly is, that the underlooker employed by the defendants in that mine was guilty of negligence in not propping up the roof of the mine, and that the damage to the plaintiff was caused entirely by that negligence of the underlooker. The question for us is, whether, under these circumstances, the defendants are answerable for the negligence of the underlooker. There is no evidence at all to shew that the defendants had been guilty of any want of proper care in the selection of the underlooker, nor of any want of due care in respect of putting the mine into proper order for mining operations before the miners were sent down into it; on the contrary, it appears by the evidence that the mine had been worked in the ordinary course of proper mining for the last five or six years. In the course of the mining operations of taking the coal from the bed, the coal-roof would be continually in a state requiring props, for as the coal was withdrawn below, so was it needed that the roof should be propped above from time to time;

(1) 1 Macq. 748.

(2) 2 Ibid. 980.

(3) 3 Ibid. 267, 286.

(4) 7 Hurl. & N. 937.

those two operations would be going on contemporaneously. The injury to the plaintiff was caused by the underlooker delaying for one day to prop the roof where the coal had been withdrawn. The plaintiff had given him full notice that a prop to the roof was wanted. The underlooker therefore clearly was guilty of negligence. Upon these facts we think that the position is not tenable, that the defendant, the owner of the mine, is responsible for the negligence of the underlooker. We have come to the conclusion that the underlooker, who had to see to the mining operations in this part of the mine, and the plaintiff were fellow labourers. We take the principle to be established, from a series of decisions in this empire and in America (decisions collected with great skill and clearness by Mr. Manley Smith in his book on Master and Servant), that where a labourer is damaged by the negligence of a fellow-labourer, the master is not responsible. Whether it can properly be predicated that two persons stand in the relation of fellow-labourers, is at times a question of difficulty. My Brother Williams brought the idea into prominent relief by saying, that sometimes a person called a fellow-labourer should rather be considered to stand in the position of a deputy-master, and if an act of negligence causing injury to a workman was clearly brought home to one in the position of deputy-master, it might be a question whether the real master was not responsible for his negligence. We wish to reserve our opinion in respect of that question whenever the facts of the case shall give rise to it. On the present occasion we consider it to be past all doubt that the underlooker and the plaintiff were fellow-labourers, and we cannot look on the underlooker as in the position of a deputy-master whose negligence had made his principal responsible. On these grounds we think that the nonsuit by my Brother Blackburn was right, and that the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Practice—Motion for New Trial—Rule 50. of Hilary Term, 1853.

Where a country cause was tried at Westminster on the last day but one of Hilary Term, the Court held that an application by the defendant for a new trial, made on the 4th day of the ensuing Easter Term was too late, notwithstanding that the defendant's attorney resided at Sandwich in Kent, and that his London agent lost no time either in obtaining the necessary instructions from him or in acting upon the instructions when received.

This action was tried, before Bramwell, B. at Westminster, on the 30th of January 1865, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for 55*l*.

Wordsworth, on the 22nd of April (1), moved for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence; but the Court held that the application was too late, and refused the rule.

He now (April 24) renewed his application, fortified with an affidavit of the defendant's London agent, which stated that immediately after the verdict on the 30th of January, the last day but one of Hilary Term, he wrote for instructions to the defendant's attorney, who resided at Sandwich in Kent, and who was not present at the trial, though the defendant himself was there. That the attorney replied on the 1st of February, that he had "that day received instructions to move for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against evidence," and that the London agent accordingly instructed counsel forthwith either on the evening of the 2nd or the morning of the 3rd of February. Subsequently Bramwell, B. had made an order at chambers that all proceedings should be stayed till the 5th day of this term, subject to certain provisions as to payment into court, &c., which were duly complied with.

Wordsworth contended that it was absolutely impossible that the motion could have been made in Hilary Term, as the necessary instructions could not have been received in time; and that therefore this was a case where the Court might well use their discretion in allowing the motion at any time before judgment was signed. He quoted 2 Archbold's Chitty's Practice, 11th edit., 1522, and urged that this case was stronger than Birt v. Barlow (2), there cited; and that there should be some distinction made between town and country causes.

Per Curiam.—The application comes too late: and, though the rule might be modified so as to extend the time in cases of fraud, surprise or mistake, the circumstances stated in the affidavit are not sufficient to justify the Court in departing from the ordinary rule (3).

Rule refused.

Stamp—24 & 25 Vict. c. 91. s. 25.—Notarial Instrument—21 & 22 Vict. c. 76.

A notarial instrument in the form of Schedule H. given by section 12. of the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76. is correctly stamped with a one-shilling stamp.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue,—pursuant to an act passed in the fourteenth year of the reign of Her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled 'An Act to repeal certain stamp duties and to grant others in lieu thereof, and to amend the laws relating to the stamp duties,'—the same being required by

(3) Rule 50. of Hilary Term, 1853, is as follows: "No motion for a new trial, or to enter verdict or nonsuit, motion in arrest of judgment, or for judgment non obstante veredicto, shall be allowed after the expiration of four days from the day of trial, nor in any case after the expiration of the term, if the cause be tried in term, or after the expiration of the first four days of the ensuing term, when the cause is tried out of term, unless entered in a list of postponed motions by leave of the Court."—See *Reg. or on behalf of the testamentary trustees of the late Earl of Eglinton, for enabling them to appeal to Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer against the determination of the said Commissioners as to the stamp duty chargeable on the notarial instrument hereinafter mentioned, the said parties having declared themselves dissatisfied with such determination.

The Titles to Land Act (1858), 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76. s. 1, provides that on the conveyance of lands being recorded, it shall have the same effect as if it had been followed by an instrument of sasine duly expedé and recorded at the date of recording the conveyance.

Section 2. provides that where the conveyance shall be contained in a deed granted for other purposes, such as a marriage contract, &c., it shall be sufficient to record in the register of sasines a notarial instrument setting forth the portions of the deed containing the conveyance: the notarial instrument to be in the form of Schedule B. annexed to the act.

Section 12. provides for a disponent under a general conveyance, whether by deed mortis causa or inter vivos, or a party who has acquired right to such conveyance by service, assignation, &c. completing his title by a notarial instrument. A form of the notarial instrument is given in Schedule H. (1), and the recording of the notarial instrument is declared to be equivalent to a disposition followed by sasine recorded, except in the case of heritable securities, in which case it shall be equivalent to an assignation of the heritable security recorded.

(1) SCHEDULE (H.)

Notarial Instrument in favour of a General Disponent, or his Assignee, &c.

At there was by [or on behalf of] A.B. of Z., presented to me, Notary Public subscribing, a Disposition [or other Deed or Instrument], recorded in the [specify Register of Sasines and Date of recording], by which recorded Disposition [or other Deed or Instrument] C.D. of Y. was vest in all and whole [here describe the Lands]; as also there was presented to me a general Disposition [or other Deed, or an Extract of a Deed], granted by the said C.D., and bearing Date [here insert Date], by which general Disposition the said C.D. gave, granted, and disposed [or otherwise, as the Case may be,] to the said A.B., and his Heirs and Assignees [or otherwise, as the Case may Section 14. provides for the title of an assignee, &c. to an unrecorded conveyance being completed by recording notarial instrument, Form, Schedule K.

And section 22. provides for the title of a trustee in sequestration, and liquidators of joint-stock companies completing their title to lands by recording notarial instrument, Form, Schedule M.

The Titles to Land Act, 1860, makes similar provision for completing the title of persons to burgage subjects, by recording similar notarial instruments as in the preceding act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76.

The notarial instrument in question is one prepared in terms of the 12th section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76.

The late Earl of Eglinton, who died on the 4th of October 1861, left a testamentary trust disposition and settlement, and codicils, whereby he disposed generally his whole heritable and movable property to trustees for certain purposes without special conveyances of the lands. The Earl was duly infeft in the lands specially described in the said notarial instrument conform to instrument of sasine in his favour duly recorded. The general trust disposition and settlement gave the trustees a right to the said lands, but in order to invest the trustees in the lands with the complete feudal title, the said notarial instrument was executed and recorded in the new general register of sasines, &c. The notarial instrument sets forth the instrument of sasine in favour of the Earl of Eglinton, by which the said Earl was vest in all and whole the lands of which a special description is given. It then sets forth the testamentary trust disposition and settlement, and codicils containing a general conveyance of all lands to the trustees. It concludes by stating that the trustees had be, heritably and irredeemably [or in Liferent, or otherwise, as the Case may be], all and sundry the whole Heritable Estate of which he was [or might die] possessed. [If the Deed be granted under any Real Burden or Condition or Qualification, add here, "but always under the Burden of the Real Lien, &c.;" and if the Deed be granted in trust, or for specific Purposes, add, "but always in trust or for the Uses and Purposes mentioned in said Deed." If the Party expeding the Instrument be other than the original Disponent, add, "as also there was presented to me" (here specify the Title or Series of Titles by which the Party acquired Right, and the Nature and Extent of his Right.)] taken "this instrument" in the hands of the notary public, and the notary signs it before witnesses. (A full copy of the instrument is given in the appendix.) The instrument was recorded at Edinburgh, upon the 29th of August 1862, in the new general register of sasines, &c. On such notarial instrument being recorded, the trustees are, in terms of the declaration of the statute, in the same position as if a disposition had been granted by the Earl of Eglinton, containing a conveyance in their favour of the lands, followed by an instrument of sasine duly expedite and recorded of the date of recording the notarial instrument.

In the General Stamp Act (1815), 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, Schedule, Part I., title "Seisin," the following entry occurs:

"Seisin—Instrument of seisin, given upon any charter, precept of clare constat, or precept from Chancery, or upon any wadset, heritable bond, disposition, apprising, adjudication, or otherwise, of any lands or heritable subjects in Scotland not of Burgage tenure	s. d.
2,160 words or upwards, then for every entire quantity of 1,080 over and above the first 1,080, a further progressive duty of	9 0

The act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97 (1850), Schedule, repeated the above item verbatim, with the exception of the duty, which was reduced to 5s. The entry in this latter act remains in force.

In the act 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, Schedule, Part I., there is the following entry:

"Notarial Act—Any whatsoever not otherwise charged in this Schedule	s. d.
"And for every sheet or piece of paper, &c. upon which the same shall be written, after the first, a further progressive duty of	5 0

And also under head of "Protest," the following entries occur:—

"Protest—of any bill of exchange or promissory note for any sum of money not amounting to 20l.	s. d.
"Amounting to 20l., and not amounting to 100l.	1 0
"Amounting to 100l., and not amounting to 500l.	3 0
"Amounting to 500l.	5 0
"Amounting to 500l. and upwards	10 0
"Protest of any other kind	5 0
"And for every sheet or piece of paper, &c. upon which the same shall be written, after the first, a further progressive duty of	5 0

These duties remained until the act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91. s. 25 (1861), which provides—

"In lieu of the stamp duties now payable on protests and other notarial acts, there shall be paid the duties following; that is to say, protest of any bill of exchange or promissory note, when the stamp duty on the bill or note does not exceed one shilling "Protest of any other bill of exchange or promissory note and protest of any kind, and other notarial act whatsoever "And for every sheet or piece of paper, &c. upon which the same shall be written, after the first, a further progressive duty of	The same duty as on the bill or note. s. d. 1 0 1 0"
---	---

In the instrument of seisin, the progressive duty is according to the number of words; in the notarial act, according to the number of sheets or pieces of paper.

The stamp duty on an instrument of seisin, when the act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 31. passed, was 9s. of leading duty, and 9s. of progressive duty, if 2,160 words and upwards.

The stamp duty on a notarial act, not otherwise charged, was 5s. of leading duty, and for every piece of paper on which it was written, after the first, 5s.

In 1860 the leading stamp duty for instrument of seisin was reduced to 5s. (13 & 14 Vict. c. 97), the same leading duty as notarial act not otherwise charged. The difference in progressive duty was still kept up.

The duty is imposed on notarial act not otherwise charged, but the Commissioners understand this to mean instrument of notarial act, which is the evidence of the act and not the act itself. The Commissioners also understand an instrument of sasine to be the evidence of a notarial act, and when specially charged to the leading duty of 9s. did not fall under the item of notarial act not otherwise charged. In these notarial instruments there can hardly be said to be a notarial act separate from the instruments, although notarial instruments are generally regarded as the evidence of some notarial act performed in reference to some facts, and embracing the evidence of the facts also.

The said trustees, by their agents, Messrs. Hunter, Blair & Cowan, writers to the signet, Edinburgh, on the 9th of April 1863, presented to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the said notarial instrument stamped with the duty of 1s., the duty imposed upon a notarial act, the instrument being written upon one piece of vellum, and containing less than 2,160 words, being of opinion that that was the duty to which the instrument was liable, for the following reasons :

1. Under the different acts referred to, specific duties are put on instruments of seisin, while on other notarial acts separate duties are put.

2. The notarial instrument in question is not an instrument of seisin, the distinguishing characteristic of which is, that seisin or possession of the lands is thereby given. The notarial instrument is simply a certificate under the hands of a notary that certain deeds therein recited contained certain clauses therein specified, but there is nothing whatever contained in it of the nature of delivery of seisin.

3. Notarial instruments are nothing more than forms prescribed by statute for bringing together the clauses in different deeds for the purposes of registration in a shorter form than if the deeds were themselves registered ad longum. Under the Titles to Land Act it is the registration of the deed or deeds of conveyance that has the effect of vesting the party, and the registration of selected clauses from the conveyances engrossed in an instrument under the hands of a notary has, by the statute, the like effect of vesting the party.

The trustees desired to have the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable, and paid to them the fee of 10s., in pursuance of the act of parliament in that behalf, and the Commissioners being of opinion that the instrument was chargeable under the said act of parliament with the duty of 5s., the stamp duty imposed on an instrument of sasine, the Commissioners assessed and charged the sum of 4s. as the further duty to which, in their judgment, the said instrument was liable.

Whereupon the said trustees paid to the Receiver General of Inland Revenue the said sum of 4s., as and for such further stamp duty, and the said instrument was thereupon stamped with a stamp denoting the said further duty of 4s., so assessed as aforesaid, and also with the particular stamp provided by the said Commissioners under the said act of parliament, to denote and signify that the full amount of stamp duty with which such instrument was by law chargeable had been paid. But the said trustees having declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the said Commissioners in this behalf, and having deposited with them the sum of 40s. for costs and charges, pursuant to the said last-mentioned act, have required the said Commissioners to state specially and sign the case on which the question with respect to such stamp duty arose, together with their determination thereon, which the said Commissioners do hereby state and sign accordingly.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the said notarial instrument be liable to the stamp duty of 5s. imposed upon an instrument of seisin by the act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, Schedule, or to the stamp duty of 1s. imposed on other notarial act whatsoever, by the 25th section of the act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, in which it is inserted, along with protest, "of any other bill of exchange or promissory note, and protest of any other kind."

J. Anderson (C. Gray Wotherspoon with him), for the appellants (June 10).—The determination of the Commissioners is wrong, because the notarial instrument in question is not either in name or in nature an instrument of sasine: the characteristic of an instrument of sasine was the fact of the delivery of possession or sasine it evidenced. In the year 1858, when the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76. passed, sasine or delivery of the land was in theory requisite for the competition of a feudal title to land in Scotland. That fact of delivery was declared in an instrument called an instrument of sasine to have been made by the notary who signed it; and that declaration again was the statutory substitution introduced by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 35, instead of the ceremony of actual delivery, which was previously necessary. But an entire change was wrought in Scotch conveyancing by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76; by it sasine was declared unnecessary in cases where the title was completed under its provisions, and registration of the grant or conveyance was substituted for sasine. It would be absurd, therefore, to contend that the notarial instrument here, which is the creature of this act, should be itself of that very kind which the act declared to be unnecessary. The instrument in question had, in fact, nothing whatever to do with sasine; it was but a piece of machinery or vehicle for purposes of registration. If the general conveyance to the late Lord Eglinton's trustees had contained an enumeration and description of the lands, simple registration of the conveyance would, by the terms of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76, have completed the title without any instrument of sasine. In such a case as that the lands and conveyance of them would be connected in the same document, and when registered the title would be complete. But the peculiarity of a general conveyance is, that all the grantor's lands are conveyed without their being specified; and the notarial instrument in question was, as its terms would shew, designed and intended to connect within itself the general conveyance with the specification of the particular lands. All that this notarial instrument evidenced was that the notary subscribing it had certain documents presented before him, viz., the late Lord Eglinton's title to certain specific lands, and the title of the trustees to all his lands. This notarial instrument therefore, as it were, grouped together the different titles so as to connect and distinguish the lands which by the general conveyance passed to the trustees, and on registration of the notarial instrument the act declared the title to the specific lands to be complete. This notarial instrument is therefore not an instrument of sasine; and if not, then it was only chargeable under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91. s. 25. with a duty of 1s. If, however, this view is ill-founded, a 1s. duty only was chargeable, because by the last act, when carefully construed, it will be found that the duty on an instrument of sasine is to be 1s. duty.

The Attorney General (J. Boyd Kinnear with him), for the respondents, contended that the notarial instrument operated as an instrument of sasine formerly did, for any notarial instrument which perfects the title must for this purpose be deemed equivalent to an instrument of sasine—Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland, ss. 770 and 771; it ought, therefore, to be subject to the same duty, which, it was submitted, on the construction of the Stamp Acts cited in the case, remained at 5s.

Anderson replied, and The Attorney General was afterwards heard.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 12th of June their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

POLLOCK, C.B.—This was an appeal from a decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against the trustees of the late Lord Eglinton. I believe we are all of opinion that the appeal ought to prevail. The question is, whether a certain instrument is liable to a stamp as an instrument of seisin or sasine; whether the liability is to a 5s. stamp or whether it is liable only to a 1s. stamp, as a notarial act. It appears to me on a careful consideration of the various statutes which relate to the matter, that they make the case tolerably clear. I own, in the first instance, that the meeting with cases of Scotch conveyance, and the strangeness of some of the terms used, and also the acts of parliament with which the Court is not generally familiar, might well raise some doubt, which induced the Attorney General to argue the case. But it appears to me, upon a very short and plain principle, that the appeal ought to prevail. Originally the practice was, in Scotland, as apparently it was in England, to have what, here, we call a delivery of seisin, and what, there, they call simply seisin, by going on the land and actually putting the party in to whom the land is to be conveyed, as it were in possession of the land, conveying it to him on the spot, or delivering to him something which is symbolical of his being put in possession of the land by taking a part of it in his hand. That seems to have been universally practised; and whatever might have been the benefit and advantage of that in a less civilized state of the community when estates were divided into large portions, as soon as ever the division of landed property into smaller parcels became common, it was manifest that that was a most inconvenient circumstance, because, in very early times, there was substituted for that a process before a notary public, where the party attended and where the deed was executed, which is called the instrument of seisin, and then instead of being a ceremony performed on the land itself, it was performed in the presence of a notary in his office, and he certified to it; and that was not the only ceremony, for there was a certificate of it by the notary; and it was called an instrument of seisin, and it was registered. By the old Stamp Act, not the parent of all the others, but the most important act, which I believe was passed in the year 1815, the 53 Geo. 3. c. 184, under the title of seisin, the instrument of seisin is made liable to a stamp, I think, of 9s. By a subsequent statute, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, that is reduced to 5s., and then subsequently came the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76, and that statute by the 1st section declares, that it shall not be necessary to have this instrument of seisin. That useless ceremony has gone out by degrees. First, instead of performing it on the land it was done before a notary, and then it was discovered that it was of no use to perform it before a notary. It merely created a useless expense and the very title of the act is, in effect, to simplify the process of transferring estates, and to reduce the expense of the transfer. I think that one of the modes of reducing the expenses was to render superfluous any instrument of seisin at all; and by the 1st section it is expressly enacted that it shall not be necessary to have any instrument of seisin at all; but that if the deed of conveyance be registered, the effect shall be absolutely the same as if there had been an instrument of seisin. Now, it is quite clear that, under that section, the registration of a deed of conveyance by no possibility could be charged with a stamp as an instrument of seisin. That seems to me to be as clear as anything can be. But, then, deeds might be long, many parts of them merely superfluous, many wholly unnecessary for the purpose of being registered; and therefore the 2nd section provides, that as it might be expensive and useless to register the whole deed, it should be sufficient if the effective part of it was registered without the whole, and all the multifarious arrangements that might be made under it or that may be contemplated. Then the statute says that, that being the case, it shall be sufficient if as much of the deed is registered as is necessary to accomplish that which the 1st section provided for, if the whole were registered. If you registered the whole deed, there was the whole of the deed, and nothing more; but if you registered only a part, it was then necessary to have a sort of notarial act done by a notary public, in order that what was extracted should be faithfully extracted; and the registering of a faithful extract was what was really required to be done. Then there comes the claim of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and they say now, "we claim to have this extract stamped as an instrument of seisin." It is very difficult to know why. No doubt, it is something which operates by law in the same way as seisin formerly did; but it is not an instrument of seisin—it has nothing to do with seisin—and all it turns out to be is this: the act says, if you register the deed, no instrument of seisin shall be necessary at all; but the parties shall be in as it were, and have all the benefits as if there had been an instrument of seisin, which was registered. Then the 2nd section says, if a part is registered, the registering of the whole is unnecessary, provided you register it under the authority of a notary. How, then, can the notarial instrument be called an instrument of seisin? The very words of the original Stamp Act, which I well remember from very early association with it, the 53 Geo. 3. c. 184, no doubt, makes the instrument of seisin liable to a stamp; but that act does not make that which is a substitute for it liable to a stamp; and this is not even a substitute for the instrument of seisin—it is a substitute for the registration of the whole deed; and it is admitted the registration of the whole deed would not require a stamp. When you come to examine the case the fact turns out to be that this is not a substitute for the instrument of seisin; it is a substitute for the registering of the whole deed: and it is the register only of a part that requires a notarial act, to say that that part is a faithful extract from the deed itself. Under these circumstances, it appears to me very clear that the Crown cannot claim any duty upon this instrument. No doubt, it is a notarial act; therefore liable to a stamp duty of 1s., which at present is all that can be claimed on the stamping of any notarial act. Upon these grounds, it appears to me that the appeal is well sustained, and that our judgment ought to be for the trustees of the late Earl of Eglinton.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question in this case is, whether the document given in Schedule (H.) of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76. is an instrument of sasine within the Schedule to the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97. That is the question we have to decide. Now the description of the instrument given in the Schedule of the last-mentioned act is this: "Instruments of sasine given upon any charter of clare constat or precept from Chancery, or upon any wadset, heritable bond, disposition, apprising, adjudication, or otherwise, of any lands or heritable subject in Scotland not of burgage tenure."

Now, in the argument of the Attorney General, he very clearly defined to us from Bell's Commentaries what the instrument of sasine was, and it seems, formerly, in Scotland, within the present reign indeed, that the old mode of transferring the absolute fee simple, as we call it, of the property, was by the actual giving seisin of the land by the transferor of the land going upon it and actually giving up possession to the transferee, in analogy and in conformity with the old system of conveyancing. But in Scotland, in consequence of a doubt, the Scotch law being mainly derived from the Civil law, it was not sufficient for the parties themselves to go and deliver seisin, but it was necessary it should be done in the presence of a notary public. It was a very common practice in the Civil law to require the register of the memorandum to be verified by a notary public being present, and the instrument of seisin was a formal statement by the notary public that in his presence seisin of the land was delivered by the transferor to the transferee. And that is what the instrument of seisin is. Now, I find there is an ancient charter, which will be found in the appendix to an old edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 2, in which the original form is given; it is a very short document: it is as follows: "Memorandum—That on the day and year within written full and peaceful seisin of the within-specified acre, with the appurtenances, was given and delivered by the within-named William de Sagenho to the within-named John de Seybroke, in their own proper persons, according to the tenor and effect of the charter within written, in the presence of Nigel de Saleford, John de Seybroke and others." Now, the instrument of seisin in Scotland was nothing more than the document which I have just read. The memorandum I have just read was attested to be true by a notary public. That is what the instrument of seisin was. Now, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 35. was passed, and was intituled, 'An Act to simplify the form and diminish the expense of obtaining enfeoffment of heritable property in Scotland,' and by the 1st section, after reciting that it was expedient to simplify the form and diminish the expense, it enacts how seisin shall be given in future; and it enacts that in seisin it shall not be necessary to proceed on the land in which the sasine is to be given, or to perform any act of enfeoffment therein, but sasine shall be effectually given therein, and enfeoffment obtained, by producing to the notary public the warrants of seisin and the relative rights which is now in use to be produced, the taking enfeoffment and by expediting and recording in the general register of sasines, or the particular register of sasines applicable to the lands contained in the warrant of enfeoffment in manner hereafter directed, an instrument of seisin, setting forth that seisin had been given in the said lands and subscribed by the said notary public and witnesses. So that when the Stamp Act to which I have referred passed, that was then the instrument of seisin, but by the 1st section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76. it was enacted that actual seisin need not be delivered. It is in point of fact making the conveyance in Scotland analogous to our claims by bargain and sale and lease and release, which it is well known, by the application of the Statute of Uses, has that effect. Now I apprehend it is clear enough, as the Attorney General stated, that when the Stamp Act passed, the document or warrant of seisin was not gotten rid of; and in all probability, when that Stamp Act was enacted, the stamp attached to it. But after that came the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76, an act to further simplify the forms and to diminish the expense of completing titles in Scotland, and it gets rid of this instrument of seisin altogether; and instead of this instrument of seisin the 1st section enacts, that it shall be sufficient to record the conveyance, or to record the notarial act of enfeoffment given by the act of parliament in lieu of it. This arises upon the 12th section, which enacts, that "where a party shall have granted or shall grant a general conveyance of his lands, whether by deed mortis causa or inter vivos, it shall be competent to the depones under such conveyance, or to any other party who shall have acquired right to such conveyance, in whole or in part, by service, assignation, adjudication, or otherwise, to expedite and record a notarial instrument in or as nearly as may be in the Form of Schedule (H)." The statute goes on to enact, that it shall have the same force and effect "as if such deposition had been followed by an instrument of sasine of the said lands in his favour, duly expedite and recorded at the date of recording such notarial instrument"; so that, in point of fact, the 12th section gets rid of the instrument of seisin altogether, and substitutes a different document. It would be contrary to all principles of law, after the instrument of seisin had been got rid of altogether as useless that we should construe the act of parliament so as to impose upon that document the same stamp that had formerly been imposed upon the old instrument of seisin. I own, in my judgment, it is a clear case that the trustees of the late Earl of Eglinton were right in insisting that there was no duty of 5s. payable. The plain question we have had to consider has been whether the 5s. duty was payable and rightly demanded. I am of opinion that it was not.

BRAMWELL, B.—I have nothing to add. I agree with my Brother Martin that this is a very clear case.

CHANNELL, B. — I entirely agree now with the judgment that has been delivered by the Lord Chief Baron and my Brother Martin. I am not familiar with the Scotch law, but certainly, in consequence of the argument in this case, I desired further time for consideration, not being quite satisfied on the point. I have had an opportunity of considering the case and of looking more carefully into the statutes. I am now quite satisfied that this instrument is properly stamped with a notarial stamp. Being of that opinion, I agree that we shall give effect to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76. s. 12, which intended to do away with instruments of seisin, and instead thereof to introduce the use of the form of a notarial instrument, by holding that this is not an instrument of seisin.

Judgment for the appellants.

TO THE SUBJECTS OF THE

CASES AT COMMON LAW

IN THE

LAW JOURNAL REPORTS,

VOL. XLIII.—XXXIV. NEW SERIES.

[In the following Index, Q.B. refers to the QUEEN'S BENCH, C.P. to the COMMON PLEAS, EX. to the EXCHEQUER, and M.C. denotes that the case is reported in the MAGISTRATES' CASES.]

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION—Plea in bar. See Libel.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEED—The affidavit accompanying the acknowledgment by a married woman of a deed executed by her, made abroad, may be sworn before a notary public, having authority by the laws of his country to administer an oath. In re Cooper, C.P. 145

— Where the consideration-money for a married woman giving up her interest, in respect of which the acknowledgment is taken under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74, is to be paid into her own hands, the Commissioners should distinctly ascertain from her that she wishes to pass her property without any provision being made for her. In re Dorning, C.P. 173

— The Court will not make an order enabling a married woman to convey, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 91, unless there has been a sale of the property which she is desirous of having the power to convey. Re Graham, C.P. 321

ACTION—Defendants employed a competent engineer and contractor to select a site for and to construct a reservoir on their land. During the construction, the contractor's people met with some old vertical shafts (of the existence of which defendants were ignorant), and they failed to exercise reasonable skill and care, with reference to these shafts, to provide for the pressure the reservoir was intended to bear. The water from the reservoir escaped down the shafts, through certain old coal-workings under defendants' land, and under land between that of defendants and that of plaintiff, into plaintiff's colliery, which was thereby flooded. It was held by Pollock, C.B. and Martin, B., that the damage not being the immediate result of defendants' act, there must be negligence to render them legally responsible to plaintiff; and that defendants, being ignorant of the existence of the circumstances requiring the exercise of unusual care on their part, were not guilty of negligence. But held, by Bramwell, B., that plaintiff having the right to be free from water sent to him through any artificial course by defendants—whether directly or indirectly,—this action was maintainable on that right being infringed; and that defendants' knowledge or ignorance of the damage likely to result from their act was immaterial. Fletcher v. Rylands, Ex. 177

APPEAL—Limitation of time for notice of appeal under General Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118. s. 63. R. v. the Justices of Essex, Q.B. 61; M.C. 41

ARBITRATION—If a party to a reference objects that the arbitrators are entering upon the consideration of a matter not referred to them, and protests against it, and the arbitrators nevertheless go into the question and receive evidence on it, and the party, still under protest, continues to attend before the arbitrators and cross-examines the witnesses on the point objected to, he does not thereby waive his objection, nor is he estopped from saying that the arbitrators have exceeded their authority by awarding on the matter. Davies v. Price (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 8

— Where there was cause to believe that an arbitrator had failed to enlarge the time for making his award within the time provided by the order of reference, and he had refused to give any information as to whether the enlargement had been duly made or not, this Court, upon the application of one of the parties who wished to make the order of reference a rule of Court, ordered the arbitrator to attend before the Master to be examined upon the matter, in order that the order of reference might be made a rule of Court. Roberts v. Evans, Q.B. 7

— Where matters in difference have been referred to an arbitrator by Judge's order, and the arbitrator, after twice enlarging the time, has made his award, the order of reference may be made a rule of Court without an affidavit verifying the dates of the enlargements. Roberts v. Evans, Q.B. 73

— The authority of an umpire appointed under the Public Health Act, 1848, to make an award, endures only twenty-one days from the date of his appointment, unless he enlarge the time, which he may and ought to do during the twenty-one days, notwithstanding the arbitrator's time has not expired. The Court has no power under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, section 15, or otherwise, to enlarge the time in arbitrations under the Public Health Act. Kellett v. the Local Board of Health of Tranmere; the Local Board of Health of Tranmere v. Kellett, Q.B. 87

— The Court will not make absolute a rule nisi calling on a defendant to pay money pursuant to an award unless there has been personal service, or unless it be shewn that personal service cannot be effected because the party is keeping out of the way to avoid service. An acceptance by the attorney of the defendant of the service of the rule nisi, and a consent by him to the rule being made absolute, are not for this purpose equivalent to personal service. Evans v. Prosser, Q.B. 256

— Where two persons agree by deed to refer all matters in dispute which shall arise between them to two arbitrators to be chosen for that purpose, one by one of the parties, and the other by the other of them, and on such disputes arising, in pursuance of such agreement the arbitrators are appointed by parol, the submission to arbitration is a parol submission, and cannot therefore be made a rule of Court. Ex parte Glaysher, Ex. 41

— A dispute arose between plaintiff and defendants, as to whether a certain carriage archway had been constructed in conformity with an agreement entered into between them; and an action having been brought, by an order of Nisi Prius the cause was referred to an arbitrator, who was empowered to direct, if he found for plaintiff, what should be done to make the carriage archway in conformity with the agreement. The arbitrator found for plaintiff, without awarding any damages, and directed certain alterations to be made in the archway. Plaintiff signed judgment for the amount of the damages claimed in the declaration; but it was held plaintiff was entitled only to nominal damages. Brown v. the Somerset and Dorset Rail. Co., Ex. 152

— See Costa.

ARTICLED CLERK—Where an articulated clerk had served for nineteen months under his articles, and had then been compelled from illness and other causes to be absent for more than sixteen months, this Court permitted him to be discharged from the old articles, and to serve the same master under new ones, for such a period as with the time during which he had already served would make up the full period of five years. Ex parte De Jivas, Q.B. 7

— A clerk, under articles for five years, having served for two years and a half, was incapacitated from serving by ill health for more than a year; he then resumed service. Before the expiration of the five years, he applied to the Court that the interval during which he had been unable to serve might be allowed to count as actual service. The Court refused the application as premature. Ex parte Rogers, Q.B. 136

— An articulated clerk having served part only of the five years under his articles, after the expiration of the five years applied to the Court that he might be allowed to enter into fresh articles, and that the time actually served might be counted as part of the necessary time of service. The Court refused to make any order; overruling Ex parte Smith on this point. Ex parte Keddie, Q.B. 136

ASSIGNMENT—What passes. See Bill of Sale.

— When fraudulent and void as against creditors. See Debtor and Creditor.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—An action being brought to recover the price of a piano, plaintiff's attorney agreed to settle by the return of the piano and payment of costs; and it was held, in the absence of a distinct prohibition from his client, he had authority to do so; and defendant was entitled to have all further proceedings stayed. Pristwick (or Prestwick) v. Poley, C.P. 189

ATTORNEY AND SOLICITOR—An attorney having been struck off the roll in Easter Term, 1859, for misappropriating to his own use money received from a client for a particular purpose, the Court, in Hilary Term, 1865, allowed his name to be restored to the roll, on affidavits of numerous attornies to his good character and conduct in the interval. In re Robins, Q.B. 121

— An attorney having been struck off the roll, in order to be called to the bar, was afterwards disbarred for professional misconduct; the decision of the Benchers being affirmed, on appeal, by the fifteen Judges. After the lapse of twenty years, an application was made on his behalf to be re-admitted an attorney; but the Court refused the application, on the ground that there were no affidavits of professional persons and others as to his good conduct and character in the interval. But subsequently, on a second application, it appeared that since his disbarment he had lived a very secluded life; and he had filed affidavits two months before the application, stating every place at which he had lived, and no affidavits were filed impeaching his character. The Court then dispensed with the affidavits usually required of professional and other persons as to his good conduct and character in the interval, and re-admitted him without a re-examination. In re Pyke, Q.B. 121, 220

— Plaintiff recovered judgment and took defendant on a ca. sa.; W, attorney of plaintiff's father, agreed with defendant, that on delivery of certain documents he would discharge defendant; the documents were delivered, and W. gave defendant an order of discharge, directed by plaintiff to his attorney; the sheriff refused to discharge, as the order was not directed to him; and it was held, defendant was entitled to his discharge, on condition that no actions were brought against the sheriff or any one else, and that plaintiff's attorney's remedies on the judgment should not be prejudiced. Langley v. Headland, C.P. 183

— See Articled Clerk. Attorney and Solicitor.

AUCTION—An auctioneer was instructed by the owner of premises to offer them for peremptory sale by public auction, at a named day and place. He issued handbills in which it was represented that the premises would be offered for sale by him in such manner. It was also stated in the handbills, that the premises would be offered for sale by direction of the mortgagee, but without disclosing the mortgagee's name; and there was a notice at the bottom, "For further particulars apply to Mr. Hustwick, solicitor, or the auctioneer." Hustwick was the solicitor of the vendor. Plaintiff attended the auction, and made the highest bid, except that Hustwick bid a larger sum and bought in the premises. Plaintiff brought an action against the auctioneer; but it was held, that upon these facts there was no contract upon which the auctioneer was personally liable. Mainprice v. Westley, Q.B. 229

BAILMENT—A bailee is not estopped from disputing the title of his bailor, and setting up the jus tertii, where the bailment has been determined by what is equivalent to an eviction by title paramount. Biddle v. Bond, Q.B. 137

BANKRUPTCY—Prima facie a trader who, on the eve of bankruptcy, hands over to a creditor assets which ought to be rateably distributed among all his creditors, must be taken to have acted in fraud of the law. But if circumstances exist which tend to explain and give a different character to the transaction, and to shew that the debtor acted from a different motive, such circumstances ought to be left to the jury, and the proper direction in such a case is that, unless the jury come to the conclusion that the debtor had the intention of defeating the law, and preventing the due distribution of his assets, by preferring one creditor at the expense of the rest, the transaction stands good in law. The whole question turns upon the intention of the trader in disposing of his goods to the particular creditor. Bills v. Smith, Q.B. 68

— A debtor, by deed, in consideration of a bygone debt of 230*l.*, assigned to defendants certain property amounting to 160*l.* He had other property, consisting of an equity of redemption valued at 150*l.*, and book debts to the amount of 50*l.*, of which 22*l.* were good. His debts amounted to 1,100*l.*, of which 800*l.* was due to defendants, and the residue to other creditors. At the time the deed was executed the debtor was insolvent, and defendants knew it, and they also knew that if they put the deed in force it would prevent the debtor from carrying on his trade. The deed was put in force by defendants, and the debtor's trade was stopped. It was held, the assignment was an act of bankruptcy, as defendants by putting the deed in force prevented the continuance of the trade, and thereby necessarily defeated and delayed creditors. Young v. Fletcher, Ex. 154

— The liability of a shareholder of a joint-stock company to pay future calls is not a liability to pay money on a contingency within section 178. of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and consequently such shareholder's bankruptcy is no bar to an action for a call made subsequently to such bankruptcy. The General Discount Co. (Lim.) v. Stokes, C.P. 25

— A Commissioner in Bankruptcy made an order, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125, in these terms: "That the household goods, furniture, &c. being in or about the messuage or dwelling-house and premises in the occupation of the said T. Taylor, in Cross Street, Middleton, and known as the Cross Keys, be sold and disposed of by the assignees for the benefit of the creditors of the said T. Taylor." It was held, per

Erle, C.J., and semble per Byles, J., that the order was sufficiently specific. Also, per Byles, J., that the order was not bad upon the face of it; and could not be held to be bad, unless it appeared from the evidence that a more specific order might have been made. Fielding v. Lee, C.P. 143

BANKRUPTCY (continued)—The Court of Bankruptcy is the Court referred to in section 198. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), which provides that, after notice of the filing and registration of a deed of composition, process shall not issue against the person or property of the bankrupt "without leave of the Court." Skellon v. Symonds, C.P. 151

— To a declaration for breaches of covenants contained in a lease, in writing, of certain premises from plaintiffs to defendant, defendant pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy, a refusal by the creditors' assignee to accept the lease, his own execution of a surrender of the lease to plaintiffs, his tender of the deed of surrender, and offer to deliver up possession to them, without, however, alleging that the lease was lost or destroyed, or that he was prevented from giving it up. It was held, the plea was bad. Colles v. Evanson, C.P. 320

— "Possession, order or disposition." See Frauds, Statute of.

— Trust and Composition Deeds. See Debtor and Creditor.

BARON AND FEME—After a divorce à vinculo matrimonii a man is not liable to be sued, jointly with his former wife, for a tort committed by her during the coverture. Capel v. Powell, C.P. 168

— The protection of an order granted to a wife under the 21st section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. is confined to the lawful earnings of lawful industry, and does not extend to earnings (or property purchased with earnings) acquired by her as keeper of a brothel. Mason v. Mitchell, Ex. 68

— A married woman, who had property settled upon her in the usual way to her separate use, in 1837 made a joint promissory note with her husband for 950*l.*, and delivered the same to his bankers as a security for his overdrawn account; from time to time the note was renewed until the death of the husband in 1855, the last renewal bearing date 1848. At the time of his death the debt due by the husband to the bankers was 2,340*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, which was reduced by the realization of certain other securities they held to 917*l.* 11*s.*, for which sum, on the 28th of August 1856, she, after her coverture had determined, made and delivered her promissory note. It was held, there was a good consideration for the last-mentioned note, as the note made in 1848, although made during coverture, was binding on her separate estate in equity, and that it was immaterial whether it was barred by the Statute of Limitations or not. Latouche v. Latouche, Ex. 85

— See Acknowledgment of Deed. Witness.

BILL OF LADING—S. and F. owners of a ship, mortgaged her to the plaintiff, and also assigned to him all the freight to be earned by the ship. S. and F. retained possession of the ship, and sent her to Cuba, expecting to find there a return cargo; but none was ready. The captain of the vessel, therefore, determined to buy for his owners a return cargo for an English port, and he obtained a cargo of wood from T. & Co., who supplied it to him, and took a bill of lading for the wood from the captain, who, by the bill of lading, bound himself "to deliver it in the like good order in the said port, or in such other my manifest may appoint, to order —, who, on faithful delivery being shewn, shall pay me — for freight and conveyance." A black line was drawn through the space in the bill of lading usually filled up with the amount of the freight. T. & Co. sent to M. & Co., of Havanna, the bill of lading, and the invoice of the goods, stating them to be "shipped by order of M. & Co., of Havanna, and for account of risk of whom it may concern." M. & Co. paid T. & Co. for the goods, and drew bills for the price on an English merchant, who refused to accept them. The defendant thereupon accepted the bills for the honour of the drawer, and paid them when due. He also received the bills of lading indorsed in blank to T. & Co. S. & F. became bankrupt. The plaintiff took possession of the ship on its arrival in England and claimed freight for the cargo. The defendant sold the cargo, and paid the freight, under protest, to the dock company, with whom the cargo had been deposited. On an interpleader issue whether the plaintiff was entitled to claim freight, it was held he was so entitled, as the goods remained the property of T. & Co. under the bill of lading. Gusson v. Tyrie (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 124 — Defendant by his bill of lading, signed at Odessa, undertook to convey a cargo from thence to the United Kingdom, to call at Cork or Falmouth for orders, for plaintiffs, merchants residing at Odessa. The ship was a Mecklenburg ship, and the bill of lading contained the following clause, "the act of God, the king's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted, unto order and assigns, paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." In the charter-party the exception was for "the act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of what nature or kind soever during the said voyage." It was held, the words, "the king's enemies" in the bill of lading must be understood to include at least the enemies of the sovereign of the carrier, namely, the Duke of Mecklenburg. Also, that, if defendant required any further protection, he was not entitled to rely on the words "restraint of princes" in the charter-party, for that these words were not incorporated in the bill of lading, by reason of the reference to the charter-party therein contained. Russell v. Niemann, C.P. 10

— See Charter-Party.

BILL OF SALE—Under the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), ss. 2 and 3, it is not necessary that the vendee should state on the bill of sale the name of the person who really advances the money, unless there be some trust in favour of the vendor, although the circumstances be such that a Court of equity would hold the vendee to be a trustee only. Robinson v. Collingwood, C.P. 18

— B, who was yearly tenant of the dwelling-house which he occupied, being indebted to plaintiff, executed a bill of sale, by which he assigned to plaintiff "all the household goods, furniture, stock-in-trade and other household effects and all other goods, chattels and effects in or about the said dwelling-house," "and all other the personal estate whatsoever," of the said B, with power to plaintiff to sell the same in case of default in payment of the debt due to him from B, and to stand possessed of the monies to arise from such sale, upon trust to satisfy the expenses and debt, and to account for the surplus, if any, to the said B. It was held, that notwithstanding the general words used, B.'s term or interest in the said dwelling-house did not pass under such bill of sale to plaintiff. It was held, also, that even if the term did pass, plaintiff could not before entry maintain an action of trespass in respect of such dwelling-house. Harrison v. Blackburn, C.P. 109

— The filing of a copy of a bill of sale of personal chattels is valid and effectual under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, although the original bill of sale has been previously altered or destroyed. The property in the chattels will remain in the person to whom they were conveyed by the deed on its execution. Green v. Attenborough (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 88

— G. K., who was a trader, by a bill of sale, assigned to defendant "all his household furniture, plate, linen, china, glass, all his stock, cattle, horses, farming implements, crops, book-debts, and all other his personal estate and effects whatsoever then being or hereafter to be upon or about his dwelling-house, farm and premises." The bill of sale also empowered defendant, "in case the sum of 300*l.* and interest should not be paid on demand, to enter upon the premises which might be in the occupation of the debtor, and there distrain the goods and chattels there found for the sum of 300*l.* and interest." After the execution of the bill of sale, G. K. purchased goods from time to time in the way of his trade until the 8th of January 1862, on which day a formal demand of the sum of 300*l.* was made on G. K.'s wife, and on non-payment of the same on the same day, the defendant entered and seized all the furniture, goods, chattels and effects found upon the premises. It was held, the demand on the wife was not a sufficient demand, and that the property acquired by G. K. after the execution of the bill of sale did not pass to defendant. Belding v. Read, Ex. 212

— See Cheque.

BILLS AND NOTES—In an action by an indorsee against the members of a firm on a bill accepted in the name of the firm, upon its being proved that the acceptance was by one of the partners in fraud of the partnership and contrary to the partnership articles, the onus is cast on the plaintiff of shewing that he gave value. The case of Musgrave v. Drake commented upon. Hogg v. Skeen, C.P. 153

— An instrument in the form of a bill of exchange, addressed to and accepted by the defendant, but without the names of either a payee or drawer, is neither a bill of exchange nor a promissory note, but only an inchoate instrument. M'Call v. Taylor, C.P. 365

— Defendant, a British subject resident in Florence, signed two promissory notes there, as joint and several maker with his brother in London, to whom he sent them by post. His brother then also signed them, and delivered them in London to the payees. It was held, the cause of action arose when the notes were delivered to the payees in this country, and that defendant could therefore be sued here under section 18. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. Chapman v. Cottrell, Ex. 186

BROKER—Bought and sold notes. See Contract.

BURIAL BOARD—The vestry of a parish, one for ecclesiastical purposes, but divided into two parts for the relief of the poor and other temporal purposes, appointed a burial board, which borrowed a large sum for the formation of a burial-ground, and by deed charged the future rates to be levied on part A, and also the future rates to be levied on part B. for the relief of the poor of the same parish or any part thereof, with the payment of the principal and interest. After a time a sum becoming due for an instalment of the loan and interest, the burial board apportioned the amount between the two parts in the proportion of the value of the property in each part as then rated to the relief of the poor, and demanded payment of the overseers of each part for its respective portion. It was held, the charge was duly imposed by the deed, and the apportionment made on a correct principle, and a mandamus was granted to compel payment. R. v. the Overseers of Colehill (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 96

BURIAL FEES—Where, prior to 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, a township, which was a parish within the meaning of the interpretation clause, was divided into ecclesiastical districts, with separate burial-grounds, and afterwards a burial-ground was provided under the act for the whole township, it was held, that each incumbent of such districts was entitled to the burial fees in respect of the burial service performed by him in the burial-ground provided under the act to which he would have been entitled before the act if the body had been buried in the burial-ground attached to his district. Day v. Peacock; Cobb v. the Same; and Binder v. the Same, C.P. 225

CANAL COMPANY. See Nuisance.

CARRIERS BY RAILWAY—Defendants, a railway company, received certain cattle to be carried for plaintiff to B. station, and induced him to sign a ticket containing certain "special conditions," among others that defendants were not to be answerable for "any consequences arising from over-carriage, detention or delay in, or in relation to, the conveying or delivering of the said animals, however caused." The cattle were sent to another station, more distant than the B. station, where they remained for some hours until they were found by plaintiff, and in consequence of the delay, and from want of food and water, the cattle were injured. There was no consideration for the special contract by charging plaintiff a smaller rate of charge, or anything of the kind; and it was held, the cattle were injured within the meaning of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7, and also that the condition in the ticket was unreasonable within the meaning of that section. Allday v. the Great Western Rail. Co., Q.B. 5

— Under section 7. of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31,—which provides that no greater damages shall be recovered from a railway company for loss of or injury to a horse than 50*l.*, unless the person sending or delivering the same shall at the time of such delivery have declared it to be of a higher value, in which case it shall be lawful for the company to demand and receive reasonable per-centage upon the excess of the value so declared, and which shall be paid in addition to the ordinary rate of charge,—the knowledge of a company as to the value of a horse not derived from a declaration to that effect by the sender does not give the company any right to demand such increased rate of charge under the above section. To entitle the company to demand such increased rate, the declaration must be made with an intention by the sender of the horse that it should so operate. Robinson v. the South-Western Rail. Co., C.P. 234

— An attorney, going by railway to attend a county court, took, in his portmanteau, documents and bank-notes for use in certain causes in which he was engaged as an attorney. The portmanteau was carried under the private act of the railway company without charge as passenger's "ordinary luggage"; it was missing at the end of the journey, and not recovered for some days. It was held, these articles were not "ordinary luggage" of the attorney as a passenger, and that the railway company were not liable in damages for the consequences of the temporary loss of them. Phelps v. the London and North-Western Rail. Co., C.P. 259

— Plaintiff took a ticket from defendants, a railway company, from C. to N; plaintiff, after waiting a long time, was told by a porter that the train was late in consequence of an accident, and the train eventually arrived an hour and a half late. The consequence was that plaintiff was late for the train at G, which would have carried him on to N. The train-bill was not put in, but only some correspondence in which defendants repudiated their liability on the ground that by the train-bills they gave notice they would not be liable for the trains not keeping time. It was held, there was no evidence of a cause of action. Hurst v. the Great Western Rail. Co., C.P. 264

— A, a carrier, was in the habit of carrying goods for B; the ordinary course was to deliver the goods to B. immediately on their arrival at M, where B. carried on business. B. requested A. to employ C. as his agent, and afterwards, without notice to A, arranged with C. not to deliver in due course, but to give him notice of the arrival of the goods, and to keep them till he sent for them. C. on one occasion forgot to give notice pursuant to this arrangement, and B. brought his action against A. for such neglect. It was held, A. was not liable. Butterworth v. Brownlow, C.P. 266

— Effect as an estoppel of a declaration of the value of the thing carried. M'Cance v. the London and North-Western Rail. Co. (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 39

— Goods were delivered to P. & Co., agents at Worcester for the Great Western Railway, to be carried to Chester "via Stafford." The goods were conveyed over the line of the Great Western Railway from Worcester to Stafford, and thence to Chester over the London and North-Western Company's line, the Great Western Railway Company having no line between Stafford and Chester. The waggons of the Great Western Company travelled the whole journey P. & Co. were also agents for the London and North-Western Company, whom they favoured rather than the Great Western Company. It was held, that there was evidence of one contract with the Great Western Company to carry the whole journey from Worcester to Chester, and that they were therefore liable for any damage done to the goods during the journey. Webber v. the Great Western Rail. Co., Ex. 170

CERTIORARI—A provisional order of a Secretary of State empowering a local board to put in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, with respect to the purchase of land, has no validity until it has been confirmed by act of parliament, and cannot be brought up by certiorari in order that it may be quashed. Frewen v. the Local Board of Health of Hastings, Q.B. 159

— A prosecutor removing an indictment into the Court of Queen's Bench by certiorari is only liable to pay costs to defendant, if acquitted, by virtue of the recognizance to pay costs in such event as required by section 5. of 16 Vict. c. 30; and if the prosecutor has entered into a recognizance only to prosecute with effect, and to do and perform such order as the Court shall direct, he is not liable to costs, and the Court has no power, under section 6, to order costs to be taxed against the prosecutor. R. v. the Inhabitants of East Stoke, Q.B. 186; M.C. 190

— See Conviction.

CHARTER-PARTY — By a charter-party, made at Liverpool by the plaintiff, chartering his ship to the defendant for a voyage from Liverpool to Sydney, the defendant was to pay for the use of the vessel in respect of the voyage a lump sum in full, "on condition of her taking a cargo of not less than 1,000 tons of weight and measurement." The plaintiff placed the vessel at the disposal of the defendant, who loaded her with 525 tons weight and 330 tons measurement goods. The ship could not safely carry any more. There were left 150 tons vacant space. The ship sailed with this cargo. A cargo of 1,000 tons of weight and measurement is usually, and at Liverpool, loaded one-third weight goods and two-thirds measurement goods; but the ordinary cargo for the Sydney market reverses these proportions, being two-thirds weight and one-third measurement. The vessel was capable of carrying 1,000 tons of weight and measurement in the ordinary proportions of one-third weight and two-thirds measurement. In an action by the plaintiff for the freight, it was held that the defendant was liable; that the condition was not broken, since the charter-party meant that the ship was to be capable of taking an ordinary cargo of 1,000 tons weight and measurement at the port of loading, and not a Sydney cargo; and further, that even if the condition had meant a Sydney cargo, and had not been complied with, and was in terms a condition precedent to the right to the freight, still, as the defendant had received part of the consideration for the contract in having the ship placed at his disposal, and in having loaded her with his goods, with which she had sailed, he could no longer treat it as a condition precedent to defeat the claim to the freight wholly, but must avail himself of the breach of the condition in reduction of the amount claimed. Puat v. Dowie (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 127

— A ship was chartered out and home at a lump sum, bills of lading to be signed by the shipowner or agent at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter. At an outward port, the agent of the charterers advanced money to the master for the ship's use, on condition of the ship taking goods on the return voyage under bills of lading making the freight payable to them (the agents) or their assigns at the port of delivery. It was held, the master had no authority to make such bills of lading, and that the shipowner retained his lien on the goods put on board for the freight. Reynolds v. Jex, Q.B. 251

— A charter-party stipulated that a certain steamer then at N, being tight, staunch, and in every way fitted for the voyage, should proceed to the usual place of loading at N, or as near thereunto as she could safely get (guaranteed for cargo in a certain month), there load, and then proceed to A. It contained the usual exception of dangers and accidents of seas, rivers and navigation during the voyage. It was held, the voyage commenced from her starting from her then berth for the loading place, and that the exception applied to that portion of the voyage. Barker v. M'Andrew, C.P. 191

— Defendant chartered a vessel, freight to be paid in bills at six months' date from date of sailing or in cash (less discount equal thereto), less, in either case, the cost of insurance, to be effected by charterers at ship's expense, and also 800*l.* to be paid on delivery of cargo. It was held, such advanced freight was not to be returned, and that defendant was liable to contribute to general average in respect thereof. Trayes v. Worms, C.P. 274

— A, of Alexandria, bought coals of B, of London, which were to be delivered at Alexandria, price to be paid on delivery of bill of lading, less balance of freight payable at Alexandria. B. chartered C's ship to carry the coal, "coal to be delivered on freight being paid,..... freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo, less advances, in cash, at current rate of exchange,..... half the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading; owner to insure amount and deposit with charterer the policy and to guarantee the same." The bill of lading was signed. B. gave his acceptance for the half freight, the receipt of the half freight was indorsed on the bill of lading, and the bill of lading was indorsed in blank by B. and given to A. The average length of the voyage was two months; before the ship arrived B. became insolvent, and on arrival of the ship and before the acceptance was due, the master refused to deliver the cargo to A. unless the whole of the freight was paid or payment guaranteed. A guarantee was given by D. for A. under protest, and the cargo was delivered; D. then by A.'s direction refused to pay. An action was brought in the Consular Court against D, who then, by A.'s direction, paid under protest. A. repaid D. C. knew nothing of the arrangement between A. and B. It was held, that A. was entitled to recover the half freight from C. Tamvaco v. Simpson, C.P. 268

— See Bill of Lading.

CHEQUE—A cheque payable to bearer, and stamped with a penny stamp, was, on the 22nd of June, drawn by defendant and given by him to G.

It was at the time dated the 22nd of July. On that day G. indorsed it to W, who handed it to plaintiff, and received in return plaintiff's cheque for the same amount. Plaintiff took defendant's cheque without notice or knowledge that it had been post-dated. It was held, the cheque appearing to be correctly stamped according to its purport, and having been taken by plaintiff without notice that it was post-dated, and innocently, he was entitled to recover upon it against the defendant. Austin v. Bunyard, Q.B. 217

CHURCH-RATE—Power of Justices under a local act to enforce rate against a Quaker disputing the rate. Appeal to the Quarter Sessions. Jurisdiction of Justices to inquire into validity of rate. "Inhabitant." Wilson v. the Churchwardens of the Parish of Sunderland-near-the-Sea, C.P. 256; M.C. 90

COMMON—To a declaration in trespass defendant pleaded thirty years' enjoyment of right of common of pasture over the locus in quo for the cattle levant and couchant upon the toftstead belonging to him as appurtenant thereto. It was held, that the number of commonable cattle not being in question, it was not necessary for the support of the plea, that the cattle should actually be fed upon the produce of the toftstead; and that there is no distinction, in this respect, between a plea, founded on the Prescription Act, and a plea grounded on prescription properly so called. Carr v. Lambert, Ex. 66

COMPANY—Defendant authorized his name to be inserted as a director in the prospectus of a joint-stock company, limited. The prospectus was sent to defendant, who suggested alterations to it. The secretary gave orders to plaintiff to advertise the prospectus, which was done at an expense of 236*l*. The company was never registered; and it was held, in an action by plaintiff against defendant, to recover the expenses of the advertisements, that defendant, by consenting to act as a director, had not authorized the secretary of the company to pledge his credit, and that he was not liable. Burbidge v. Morris, Ex. 131

CONTRACT—Defendants, a public company, employed plaintiff, a broker, to dispose of their shares, on the terms that he should be paid 100*l*. down, and 400*l*. in addition, upon the allotment of the whole of the shares of the company. Plaintiff disposed of a considerable number of shares, when defendants wound up the company; and it was held, by the Court, which had power to draw inferences of fact, that plaintiff was prevented earning the 400*l*. by the act of the company, and was therefore entitled to recover a proportion of the 400*l*. Inchbald v. the Western Neigherry Coffee, Tea and Cinchona Co. (Lim.), C.P. 15

— A declaration, after setting out an agreement by which the plaintiffs contracted with the defendants to do certain works for a certain sum to be paid them by the defendants on production by the plaintiffs of the certificate of the surveyor of the defendants that the works had been efficiently performed to his satisfaction, averred that, although all things had been done by the plaintiffs to entitle them to such certificate, yet the said surveyor had not given such certificate, but had wrongfully and improperly neglected and refused so to do, and the defendants had not paid the money payable on such certificate. This was held, on demurrer, bad as not disclosing any cause of action against the defendants. Clarke v. Watson, C.P. 148

— In a contract to sell "500 bales of cotton to arrive in Liverpool per ship or ships from Calcutta," there was the following stipulation: "the cotton to be taken from the quay; customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from date of delivery of last bale." It was held, the stipulation, "the cotton to be taken from the quay," was an independent stipulation for the seller's benefit, and not a condition precedent, which the purchaser had a right to insist on being performed. Neill v. Whitworth, C.P. 155

— Plaintiffs were owners of ship W. and one M. of ship G, which was insured in two companies, one of which was represented by defendants, the other by M. himself. The G. ran into the W, and was arrested in the Admiralty Court; an agreement was entered into by plaintiffs, M. and the insurers, that plaintiffs would release the ship, and the other parties would "pay the amount of damage which the ship W. had received from the collision," and that in case of dispute about "the amount of damages claimed by Heard Brothers (the plaintiffs) by reason of the collision," the matter should be referred. It was held, that "ship" in the first clause must be read "owner of ship," and that plaintiffs were entitled to recover for loss of profits as they would have done in the Admiralty Court. Heard v. Holman, C.P. 239

— By indenture of the 15th of May, plaintiff covenanted with defendant to procure a ship, to stow on board a certain telegraphic cable then lying at M. Wharf, to provision and rig the vessel, to provide and pay the crew and workmen, &c., to lay down the cable, and that he, plaintiff, would perform the several acts aforesaid and have the ship ready equipped for sea at the Nore on or before 15th of July, and would proceed forthwith to T. and lay down the cable; and if plaintiff made default in having the ship ready with the cable on board at the Nore by 15th of July, defendant might deduct and retain as liquidated damages 20*l*. a week. Defendant covenanted, subject to his right to deduct and retain, as liquidated damages, to pay plaintiff 5,000*l.*, by instalments, that is to say, 1,000*l.*, part thereof, on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the ship at M. Wharf; 2,000*l.*, further part, on or before twenty-one days after the arrival of the ship at the wharf; the remainder when the ship should put to sea from the Nore. And it was by the same indenture agreed and declared, that for the true performance of the covenants by plaintiff thereinbefore contained, and for securing the penalties which he might incur under these presents, plaintiff and two responsible sureties should, within ten days of the execution of these presents, give and execute to defendant, his executors and administrators, a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.*; and for the due performance of the covenants on the part of defendant thereinbefore contained, defendant and two responsible sureties should, within ten days from the execution of these presents, give and execute to plaintiff, his executors and administrators, a bond in the penal sum of 5,000*l.* It having been held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that the giving of the bond with sureties by plaintiff to defendant was a condition precedent to his right to recover against defendant for not performing his part of the contract with relation to stowing the cable and paying the money, that decision was affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal; and it was also held that plaintiff was not released from his obligation to give a bond by reason of defendant not having given a bond. "Forthwith," held not to mean "immediately." Roberts v. Brett, (House of Lords) C.P. 241

— Plaintiff having instructed defendants, who were brokers, to purchase for him fifty bales of cotton, and paid to defendants 800*l.*, part of the purchase-money, they made a contract in their own names for the purchase of a much larger quantity, viz., 300 bales, on account of plaintiff and other principals; and it was held, in an action for money had and received, that plaintiff was entitled to recover back the money paid, as defendants had not made a contract on which plaintiff could sue as a principal. Bostock v. Jardine, Ex. 142

— A contract made by defendants, who were brokers, in their own name, for the purchase of iron for plaintiffs, was contained in bought and sold notes. The notes differed only in these particulars, that while the bought-note delivered by the brokers to plaintiffs had the words "Deposit 5*s.* per ton, brokerage 0 per cent.," the sold-note contained the words "Deposit (blank), brokerage half per cent." It was held, that parol evidence was admissible to shew an arrangement between the brokers and plaintiffs, by which they required the latter to pay a deposit of 5*s.* per ton, and that the apparent variances, so explained by the usage of the parties between the notes, was not material. Kempson v. Boyle, Ex. 191

CONVERSION OF GOODS—Defendant had obtained a judgment in the county court against plaintiff. At the time the judgment was obtained he had in his possession goods belonging to plaintiff, which he had no right to retain. After judgment in the county court plaintiff demanded his goods, which defendant refused to deliver up. After the demand, defendant issued execution on the judgment in the county court, seized and sold the goods in his possession, and applied the proceeds in satisfaction of the debt. It was held, plaintiff was entitled to recover, in an action for the conversion, the full value of the goods, and that the jury ought not to take into consideration, in mitigation of damages, the fact that the goods had been subsequently applied in satisfaction of plaintiff's debt to defendant. Edmundson v. Nuttall, C.P. 102

CONVICTION—Upon an appeal to the Quarter Sessions against the conviction of the appellant, as a rogue and vagabond under 5 Geo. 4. c. 83, the Sessions have power to give costs against the prosecutor; and the Justices who have convicted the appellant, and who do not appear to support the conviction, are not the parties against whom an order for costs can be made. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45. s. 7, no objection on account of any omission or mistake in any order brought up upon a return to a writ of certiorari shall be allowed, unless such omission or mistake shall have been specified by the rule for issuing such certiorari.—Scoble, per Mellor, J., that the appellant could not upon a motion to quash the order, object that it was bad for not finding as a fact that the person against whom the order was made was the prosecutor, unless the omission so to find was specified in the rule. R. v. Purdey, Q.B. 48; M.C. 4

COPYHOLD—A custom in a manor that copyholders of inheritance may break the surface and dig and get clay, without stint, out of their copyhold tenements, for the purpose of making bricks, to be sold off the manor, is good in law (dubitante Lord Wensleydale). *Salisbury v. CORONER—If a coroner's inquest on a dead body be adjourned, and on the day appointed the Court be not opened and further adjourned, the proceedings drop and the Court is dissolved, and everything else done in the matter of the inquest, without commencing afresh, is coram non iudice; and this is the case even where the adjournment takes place only for the purpose of drawing up a formal inquisition after the jury have, in substance, agreed upon their verdict. R. v. Payn, Q.B. 59

costs of the cause to abide the event of the award; and the arbitrator finds all the issues for plaintiff, and awards that a sum not exceeding 20l. is due from defendant to plaintiff in respect of the breaches of contract alleged in the declaration, plaintiff "recovers" that sum within the meaning of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11, and is deprived of costs by that section. Cowell v. Amman (Aberdare Colliery Co. (Lim.), Q.B. 161

COSTS (continued)—Where the matter of an appeal at Quarter Sessions is referred to an arbitrator, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45. s. 13, and the order of reference is silent as to the costs of the arbitration, the subsequent sessions at which the award is entered as the judgment of the Court have no power to order either party to pay the costs of the reference. R. v. the Justices of the West Riding, (The Sheffield United Gaslight Co. v. the Overseers of Sheffield,) Q.B. 165; M.C. 142

— Defendant had two residences, one in London, which was within, and the other in the country, which was more than twenty miles from plaintiff's residence. At the time the action was brought, defendant was at his London house, but two days before he had written to plaintiff's attorney from his house in the country. It was held, the superior Court had concurrent jurisdiction with the County Court. Pigram v. Knatchbull, C.P. 257

quality at a certain price, to be delivered at a future time, the measure of damages for non-delivery is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time limited for the delivery; and the buyer cannot recover for the loss of profit which he would have made by carrying out a re-sale at a higher price made in the interval between the contract and the time of delivery. Williams v. Reynolds, Q.B. 221

— In an action against a carrier for the loss of a parcel of goods, the measure of damages is, in general, the market value of the goods at the place and time at which they ought to have been delivered. If there is no market for the sale of such goods at the place, then the jury must ascertain their value by taking the price at the place of manufacture, together with the cost of carriage, and allowing a reasonable sum for importer's profit. *Price v. — Plaintiffs bought caustic soda of defendant, part to be shipped in June, part in July, and the rest in August. Defendant knew at the time of the sale that plaintiffs bought to sell again on the Continent, and that the soda was to be shipped from Hull, but not that it was for Russia, although he learned this also before the end of August. Defendant neglected to deliver any such soda during the time contracted for, but he delivered a portion in September and October. There was no market for caustic soda, and plaintiffs, who had contracted for the re-sale of the soda to H, in Russia, lost the profit on such re-sale in respect of the soda, which was not delivered at all, and, by reason of the approach of winter in the Baltic, were obliged to pay an increased rate of freight and insurance on the shipment of the soda, which was delivered in September and October. It was held, the damages which plaintiffs were entitled to recover for defendant's breach of contract were the loss of profit on the sale to H, and also the cost of such increased rate of freight and insurance, but not the damages plaintiffs paid H, in respect of a sub-sale made by him to a consumer of the article. *Borries v. DEBTOR AND CREDITOR—To a declaration upon a bill of exchange, defendant pleaded a composition-deed executed by himself and three-fourths in value of his creditors whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards. By the deed, set out in the plea, defendant agreed to set apart half his income until a composition of 5*s.* in the pound should be paid to all the creditors respectively. The creditors who executed the deed agreed thereby to accept "these presents in full discharge and satisfaction of their respective debts, claims and demands" against defendant; and they, by the deed, released defendant from all their debts and claims against him, and agreed that the deed might "operate as a defence pleadable in bar to or be otherwise set up as a defence to any action," &c. The deed also contained a proviso that it should not operate to prevent any of the creditors from claiming or realizing any security held by them, or from suing any person, other than the said debtor, liable for payment of such security, nor in any way prejudice or affect the rights or remedies of any such creditors, except as against the said debtor (the defendant). The plea then alleged performance of the several requirements of section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861:—Held, that the plea disclosed a good defence to the action. Keyes v. Elkins, Q.B. 25

— A deed is valid within section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, if it sufficiently shows that it was intended to be an arrangement between the debtor and the whole body of his creditors, and all had the option of coming in and signing it; such a deed is not unequal, although there is no compulsory clause directing the debtor to pay the composition; and it is not necessary to the validity of a composition-deed that there should be any cessio bonorum. Clapham v. Atkinson (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 49

— A deed of composition by a debtor with his creditors under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, containing a release of the debtor, by each of the creditors, from all debts due from him to them respectively, cannot be pleaded in bar by a joint debtor to an action by a non-assenting creditor; for if it extends to joint debts so as to release a joint debtor, it is bad, and not binding on non-assenting creditors. Andrew v. Macklin, Q.B. 89

— A deed, under section 192, and in the form Schedule D. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, by which the debtor assigned all his estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of creditors, if it contain no release, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action by a creditor who has assented to and underwritten the deed. Jones v. Morris, Q.B. 90

— A deed of inspectorship, purporting to be made under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, provided "that in case any dividend shall be declared before all the creditors shall have executed or assented to these presents, or before the amount of dividends payable on all their respective debts shall have been ascertained, the said inspectors shall retain sufficient sums for the purpose of paying a like rateable dividend to any creditor or creditors who shall not have assented to or executed the same, or the amount of dividend payable on whose debts shall not have been ascertained, and shall afterwards pay or cause to be paid such dividend to such creditor or creditors, upon his or their request in writing," &c. And the dividends were made payable unconditionally, and no necessity was imposed upon assenting creditors of making a demand in writing for the payment of their dividends. It was held, that no such inequality was created by the above clause between the two classes of creditors, as would make the deed invalid. Hernulewicz v. Jay, Q.B. 201

— To a declaration for a debt due on a foreign contract entered into with plaintiff abroad, a plea of a composition-deed made and registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, whilst plaintiff resided abroad, by which defendant covenanted to pay a certain composition in the pound to his creditors on a day since passed, must shew that defendant paid or tendered such composition to plaintiff, notwithstanding plaintiff was abroad when it became payable. The want of an averment in such plea of payment or tender of the composition was held to be not cured by an averment that defendant was always ready and willing to pay to plaintiff the said composition according to the provisions of the deed, and that all conditions having been performed and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, plaintiff became bound by the deed, as if he had executed the same. Fessard v. Mugnier, C.P. 126

— A composition-deed, made between defendant, a debtor, of the first part, certain trustees of the second part, and the creditors whose names were thereunto subscribed in the schedule of the third part, contained a clause, whereby the parties of the third part covenanted with defendant that they would not sue, &c. him, and that if they did, defendant should be discharged from all actions, suits, debts and demands of those by whom he was so sued, &c., and the deed be pleaded in bar. It was held, that if, on the true construction of the deed, this clause applied to non-assenting creditors, it was unreasonable, and that if it did not, there was no release by non-assenting creditors, and that in either view it was not pleadable in bar of an action by a non-assenting creditor. Lyne v. Wyatt, C.P. 179

— After action commenced and before judgment a deed of inspectorship, executed by defendant, was duly filed and registered, and a certificate thereof obtained; judgment was signed and defendant's goods taken under a f. fa. On an interpleader summons the sheriff was ordered to withdraw on the payment into court by the inspectors of a certain sum of money. Plaintiffs obtained a rule to shew cause why part of this money should not be paid to them in satisfaction of their judgment, on the ground that the deed ought to have been pleaded; and it was held, that without leave of the Court of Bankruptcy they could not make their execution available, and that the inspectors were entitled to the money. Whitmore v. Wakerley distinguished. Hartley v. Mare, C.P. 187

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR (continued)—A clause in a deed of assignment, registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, by which the trustee is empowered to require any creditor of the debtor to verify the nature and amount of his debt, with full particulars, by statutory declaration proved before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, "or otherwise as the trustee may think fit," is unreasonable, and a deed with such a clause is not binding on a non-assenting creditor. Cole v. Turner, C.P. 198

— By composition-deed made between an insolvent, defendants as sureties, plaintiff as trustee, and the body of creditors, defendants covenanted to pay to plaintiff certain instalments; and it was provided that, as between them and the creditors, defendants should be deemed principal debtors, also that on non-payment of the instalments, adjudication of bankruptcy against the insolvent, or any different arrangement by him with his creditors, the release, the deed, and all its clauses and provisions should be at an end and void. After payment of the first instalment the insolvent was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. In an action by plaintiff against defendants for the second instalment, it was held, that "void" meant "voidable" at election, and that defendants were liable. Hughes v. Palmer, C.P. 279

— By a deed of composition registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the creditors agreed to accept payment of their debts by certain instalments, and they covenanted, "while the said instalments were duly and regularly paid by the debtor, not to sue the said debtor or enforce any judgment or other proceeding against him or his estates." It was held, such deed could not, in the absence of any express stipulation to that effect, be pleaded as a bar to an action brought by a creditor before the instalments were payable. Ray v. Jones, C.P. 306

— A debtor arrested on a ca. sa., after executing a good deed of arrangement under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is, according to section 198, entitled to his discharge from custody on the deed being duly registered. Baerelman v. Langlands, Ex. 3

— It is not essential to the validity of a deed of composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, that it should contain a schedule of creditors. A deed of composition may be valid, although the only effect of non-payment of the composition-money be to remit the creditors to their original demand. If a valid deed of composition be executed and registered as required by the Bankruptcy Act, a writ of f. fa. issued by a non-assenting creditor after notice of the deed will be set aside. Stone v. Jellicoe, Ex. 11

— W. B. on the 3rd of December 1862, in pursuance of a resolution passed, on the 25th of November 1862, at a meeting of his creditors, executed an assignment of the whole of his property to plaintiffs, as trustees, to pay and discharge rateably all the debts due and owing from W. B. to his creditors (being such persons as would have been entitled to rank as creditors in bankruptcy if the said W. B. had been adjudged bankrupt upon a petition for that purpose filed on the 25th of November 1862). It was held, that the deed was not void and fraudulent as against creditors within 13 Elis. c. 5. Evans v. Jones, Ex. 25

— By a composition-deed between a debtor of the one part, and the several creditors who signed the deed respectively of the other part, after reciting that the debtor was unable to pay his debts in full, the latter covenanted with the several persons parties thereto of the second part, to pay to all his present creditors a composition of 5s. in the pound on their respective debts. It was held, that the deed was not valid, since the non-assenting creditors were not in an equally advantageous position with the executing creditors, for the deed gave to each individual creditor who had executed the deed the right of action for the composition of his individual debt, while a non-assenting creditor had no power of suing either personally or by means of any one as trustee on his behalf. Benham v. Broadhurst (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 61

— To a declaration by indorsee against drawer and indorser of a bill of exchange, defendant pleaded a plea setting out a composition-deed, whereby a majority in number and three-fourths in value of his creditors, in consideration of the payment of the composition agreed upon before the 10th of April then next, agreed to accept a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound in discharge of their respective debts, so far as they were able to do so without the consent or permission of, and without prejudice to the rights of third parties or sureties, but no further. The plea also alleged compliance with the requisitions of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and a tender to plaintiff of the composition in respect of his debt. On demurrer, it was held that this deed, although containing no actual release in terms, was good under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, so as to bind plaintiff, as if he had executed it; and the plea alleging a tender of the composition shewed a good defence to the action. Garrod v. Simpson, Ex. 70

— A deed of composition and inspection entered into by defendants and their creditors, and purporting to be made under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, shewed that there were joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates of the compounding debtors, and that both classes of creditors were to receive a uniform composition of 18s. in the pound; and it was held, that although the deed placed the joint and separate creditors on the same footing, it was a valid deed under sections 192. and 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Quarr—whether the deed would have been valid if it had been a deed of assignment, and for a distribution of the debtor's estate. A plea of arrangement by deed, under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, between defendants and their creditors, shewing that there were joint and separate creditors and joint and separate estates, averred that "a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the said creditors of defendants, and each of them, &c. executed the indenture." It was held, it was sufficiently averred in the plea, that the requisite majority of each class of creditors had assented to the deed, so as to make the deed binding on non-assenting creditors. A deed of composition and inspection contained a covenant on the part of the creditors not to sue within a time limited, viz. before the 20th of May 1865, accompanied by the following stipulation: "That these presents shall and may be pleaded and allowed in any court of law or equity as a bar, or in discharge of all and every action or actions, suit or suits, or other proceedings, judgments and executions which shall or may be brought, commenced, prosecuted, or taken against the debtors, or either of them, or their, or either of their, goods or estates by the said several creditors, or any of them . . . contrary to the true intent and meaning of these presents. It was held, that although a covenant not to sue for a limited time cannot be pleaded in bar, yet such a covenant, accompanied by an express provision that during the limited time it may be so pleaded, can be pleaded in bar. The affidavit required by the fifth condition of section 192. to be delivered to the chief Registrar, stating a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtors . . . have in writing assented to or approved of such deed, and also stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the debtor comprised in such deed, need not distinguish the joint from the separate debts of the debtors. Walker v. Nevill, Ex. 73

— A defendant who did not plead a composition-deed, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, when he had the opportunity, will not be allowed afterwards to avail himself of it for the purpose of defeating execution. Whitmore v. Wakerley, Ex. 83

— A composition-deed, made between defendant of the first part and the undersigned J. F., one of the creditors of defendant, and also all the other undersigned creditors of defendant of the second part, recited, that defendant was unable to pay his several creditors the full sum of 20*l.* in the pound, but was able and willing to pay each and all of them, on signing the deed, the composition of 5*s.* in the pound; and that defendant had applied to the several parties of the second part to receive and take the composition of 5*s.* in the pound, payable on signing the deed, in full satisfaction and discharge of their several respective debts, which the parties of the second part had agreed to accept in full satisfaction and discharge, proceeded in consideration thereof to release the debts:—Held, that the deed was invalid, and not binding on the non-assenting creditors, as by the terms of the deed the composition was to be paid only to the creditors who signed, and therefore those who assented were in a better position than those who dissented. Martin v. Gribble, Ex. 108

— A deed of composition was made between certain persons, whose names and seals were subscribed and affixed in the schedule thereunder written, being creditors in their own right solely, or in co-partnership with others, of the debtor, of the first part; the debtor of the second part; and two sureties for securing the composition of the third part; and in which the parties of the second and third parts covenanted with the parties of the first part, and with all the other creditors of the debtor, to pay them a composition of 10*s.* in the pound on their respective debts. It was held, that as the non-assenting creditors were not parties to the deed, but only covenantees, they could not sue for the composition, and had not an equal advantage with the assenting and executing creditors, and that, therefore, the deed was not valid. The Chesterfield and Midland Silkstone Colliery Co. (Limited) v. Hawkins, Ex. 121

— A composition-deed was made between certain persons, whose names were subscribed and seals affixed in the schedule thereunder written, on behalf of themselves and all and every other the creditors of defendant of the first part, and defendant of the second part, which, after reciting that defendant was indebted to the said persons parties thereto of the first part in the several sums set opposite to their respective names in the said schedule thereunder written, and was also indebted to other persons in divers sums of money, and being unable to discharge his said debts in full, had agreed to pay a composition of 5*s.* in the pound, such payment or composition to be made and paid to all and every the creditors of defendant, whether executing the deed or not, to be paid and payable on the 22nd of September 1865, and to be in full discharge of all and every the debts due and owing at the time of the executing of the said deed, provided that the said parties of the first part thereby did accept the said composition and release the debts. It was held, the non-assenting creditors were not bound, as the release was absolute, and the deed did not provide any means by which these creditors could obtain their composition. Gurris v. Ropera, Ex. 128

— A trust-deed was in the form given in Schedule D. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and was registered, &c., pursuant to section 192. of that act, but was not assented to by the prescribed majority of creditors. It was held, that such deed was valid to pass the property. Symons v. George (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 187

— A deed was executed by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The deed did not contain a clause of release. It was held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer (Ex. 60), that such a deed cannot be pleaded in bar to an action. Clarke v. Williams (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 189

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR (continued)—A deed of composition made between J. B. (the debtor) of the first part, J. K. and B. B. (two sureties for securing the composition) of the second part, and the several other persons whose names are hereto subscribed and seals affixed, of the third part, after reciting that the parties of the second and third parts, creditors of J. B., had agreed to accept a composition of 8s. in the pound, on having the same secured by the joint and several promissory notes of J. B., J. K. and B. B., payable in two equal instalments on the 20th of August and the 20th of September, and that J. B., J. K. and B. B. had made and delivered to each of the parties of the third part, their joint and several promissory notes, contained the following covenant and release: J. B., J. K. and B. B. do and each of them doth covenant with the parties of the third part, and with each and every of them, that they, J. B., J. K. and B. B., or one of them, shall pay the several promissory notes as they shall respectively become due, and shall also make and deliver to all the other creditors of the said J. B. like joint and several promissory notes, payable at the several times, and in manner aforesaid, for the like composition of 8s. in the pound upon their respective debts, and shall pay such composition to each of the last-mentioned creditors at the several times and in manner aforesaid, and the several parties of the third part and J. K. and B. B. do and each of them doth covenant with J. B. that they and each of them have accepted and will accept the said promissory notes by way of composition and payment of 8s. in the pound upon the amount of their several debts in full discharge of their debts, and that upon the payment of the said promissory notes they and each of them will execute to J. B. a general release and discharge from their debts. Three-fourths in value of J. B.'s creditors had in writing assented to and approved of the deed, but the only parties who had executed the deed were the debtor and the two sureties. It was held, that as the assenting creditors had not executed the deed, and the non-assenting creditors were not parties to it, neither class of creditors could sue on the deed, and that both classes were on an equality, and that the deed was valid. Scott v. Berry, Ex. 193

— By a composition-deed purporting to be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 192, it was covenanted that "no creditor who shall have executed or otherwise assented to these presents shall negotiate any bills of exchange, or other negotiable instrument on which the debtor is liable, without having first indorsed thereon a memorandum of the execution of or other accession to these presents by such creditor." A second covenant was in these terms: "And in consideration of the premises, it is hereby declared and agreed, (but each of the creditors who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to or be bound by these presents, agreeing and declaring for himself and his partners, and his and their respective heirs, executors and administrators, and so far as relates to his and their respective acts and defaults,) that if the said trustees shall, within the time aforesaid, certify under their hands to the effect hereinbefore mentioned, the creditors of the debtor who shall have executed or acceded to or be bound by these presents shall not, nor shall any of them, nor shall their respective heirs, executors, or administrators, or partners or assignees, at any time (except in respect of the covenant or agreements herein contained, or any of them, or in respect of the aforesaid promissory notes, or except so far as may be necessary in order to enforce any mortgage, lien or security, or any rights or remedies against any persons other than the debtor) commence or prosecute any action or suit at law or in equity, or other proceeding, or obtain any act or adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor or his heirs, executors or administrators, or make or sue out any attachment or requisition of or upon him or them, or his or their property, credits or effects, for or on account of all or any part of the debts now due from the debtor to the said creditors who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to or be bound by these presents, or any of such creditors, or for or on account of all or any claim of such creditors proveable under these presents, and that this present agreement may be pleaded to any action brought contrary to this agreement as if the same were an actual release." It was held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, that the first covenant was valid, as it applied to and bound those creditors only who assented to it by executing or assenting to the deed, and did not bind non-assenting creditors. And, further, that the second covenant was a reasonable and proper covenant. Hidson v. Barclay (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 217

DEED—To trespass for entering plaintiff's land, described as land on each side of a certain slip, defendant pleaded that before plaintiff was possessed of the land, in which &c., a certain railway company were the owners in fee of the said land and slip, and that they demised the land in which &c., "excepting and reserving thereout the said slip, and the dues payable for the use thereof, and excepting and reserving to the said company, their assigns, officers, servants and workmen, free access to and from the said slip, for the purpose of using and working the same or otherwise," and that the said company granted their licence to defendant to work and use such slip, and the plea justified the trespass as being committed in the exercise of such licence. This was held a good defence, as the reservation in the demise enabled the company to use the slip by themselves or their licensees, and the word "assigns" was not to be construed as limited to persons taking an estate in the land. *Micalfe v. DOMICIL—Testatrix, an unmarried Englishwoman, in 1849 went to reside abroad at the house of her married sister at B, in Germany. She resided there, contributing towards the expenses of housekeeping, until 1863, in which year she died. Her property consisted of money invested in English securities, but she also possessed a valuable library, which she caused to be transported to B. She occasionally came over to England with her married sister to visit her friends, and while in England in May 1854 she made her will, describing herself as now on a visit to my sister C, bequeathing her property to trustees to pay the annual income to her sister for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, with power of appointment to her sister by deed or will. The female defendant, as sole executrix, proved the will in the Probate Court. The testatrix told her sister that if she survived her she should continue to live in Germany, and that nothing would induce her to return to England, except on an occasional visit. She also named the churchyard where she wished to be buried, and where she was afterwards buried. It was held, that her acts and declarations did not shew a sufficient intention to change her domicile; and, assuming she intended to give up her English domicile, that until she acquired a new domicile, her English domicile continued; and that the Crown was entitled to legacy duty. And, also, on the authority of Re Capdevielle and Wallop's Trusts, that the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51.) applies to all persons wherever domiciled. The Attorney General v. Blucher, Ex. 29

had from time to time repaired the fence belonging to the inclosure between it and the common waste land of the manor, it was held, the proper inference for a jury to draw was that at the time the lord granted the exclusive possession of the land, he granted it subject to the obligation on the part of the grantees to keep it fenced as against the cattle of the lord and the other copyholders turned out on the wastes of the manor, and that the owner or occupier was therefore bound to keep up the fence as against adjoining occupiers after the wastes of the manor were inclosed under a modern Inclosure Act. Barber v. Whiteley, Q.B. 212

— G, the owner of certain land, sold it in lots, subject to conditions, by which, inter alia, the purchaser of lot 6, was required to covenant to build according to a certain elevation. Plaintiff, who was the purchaser of the adjoining lot 7, altered, with G's consent, an old building standing on such lot, by raising its wall several feet on the side next to lot 6. Defendant, who was the purchaser of lot 6, excavated the land, as required, to build according to the conditions, and in consequence of this plaintiff's building fell. It was held, that as the excavations were authorized by the conditions of sale, and were made therefore with the licence of G, the vendor, plaintiff could not sue for the injury he had sustained by his building being so deprived of the lateral support of the land in lot 6. Semble, that plaintiff, assuming he had the right to such support, lost it by raising the old wall and so increasing the superincumbent weight. Murchie v. Black, C.P. 337

— A. was the owner and occupier of a house of three stories which had an ancient window on each floor. He altered the windows in the two lower floors, leaving the window in the third floor unaltered. He also built two new stories to his house, with windows intended to be permanent. A. did not intend by making these alterations to abandon any privilege of his ancient windows. B, the owner of adjoining premises, could not obstruct the new windows in the upper floors without also obstructing the old windows, and he built on his own land a wall which had the effect of obstructing all A.'s windows. A. afterwards blocked up his new windows, and sued B. for continuing the obstruction of the wall, which the defendant refused to remove. It was held, that B. had not at any time the right to build a wall which would have the effect of obstructing the ancient lights in A.'s house, although the new windows could not otherwise have been obstructed. The right to an ancient light since the Prescription Act depends upon the statute, and does not rest on any presumption of a grant or fiction of a licence having been obtained from the adjoining proprietor. Renshaw v. Bean and Hutchinson v. Copstake overruled. Tapling v. Jones (House of Lords), C.P. 342

EQUITABLE PLEA—P. borrowed a sum of money from a loan society of which he was a member, and defendants, who were not members of the society, joined him in a bond and promissory note for the amount. By the terms of the loan P. was to repay the money by weekly instalments. One of the society's rules directed the managing committee to inform the sureties when the instalments were four weeks in arrear, and empowered them to commence legal proceedings against the sureties. P. died in 1859, after having repaid a portion of the loan, but being at the time of his death more than four weeks in arrear. Defendants were not informed of this till an action was brought in 1862 on the bond and note. It was held, the rules of the society formed no part of defendants' contract so as to afford them any ground of equitable defence to the action. Price v. Kirkham, Ex. 35

ERROR—Error will lie on a special case stated in proceedings on an interlocutory issue. Gusson v. Tyrre (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 124

ERROR IN FACT—Upon a judgment for defendant, plaintiff assigned as errors in fact, that defendant obtained a rule for a special jury, whereupon twenty-four special jurymen were duly struck, pursuant to 6 Geo. 4. c. 50, as the jurors to be returned for the trial of the issue; that eight of this special jury so struck were not summoned, and the names of the special jurors not having been called over in court, at or after ten o'clock, the hour named in the summons, only ten of the special jurors appeared and were sworn on the said jury. It was held, the errors so assigned were invalid, as they contradicted the record, which must be considered as containing a statement that all the requisites for having a sufficient jury had been observed, and that the Court sat at a time when, and was otherwise constituted so that it could properly exercise jurisdiction. Also, that these and like objections are not, for all purposes, admitted by demurring to the assignment of errors, but only so when properly assigned and lawfully assignable as ground of error. Semble—If plaintiff had sustained any real injustice by the errors complained of, his remedy was to have applied by motion to the Court, when the Court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, would have interfered, if necessary. Irwin v. Grey, C.P. 313

L., evidence was offered and received of a distinct oral agreement to settle that action, made on the same occasion as, and immediately before the written agreement; and the jury found that such an oral agreement was made. FIXTURES—By a lease of land intended to be used for saltworks, the lessees covenanted that they would erect certain buildings and works, and that they would at the determination of the term "leave at the disposal of the lessors all the fixed materials of what nature or kind soever that should be in or about the said intended wrychhouses or saltworks, or anyways relating thereto, save and except all the salt-pans and other movable articles made use of at all or at any of the said wrychhouses or saltworks," which they the lessees were to take away for their own use and benefit. The interest of the lessees became afterwards vested in the defendants, who took upon themselves the performance of the above covenant, and who also covenanted that they would yield up possession of the premises, with all erections, buildings and improvements, together with the cisterns, doors, &c., and "also all other fixtures and appurtenances of what kind or nature whatsoever which should be used in or about the buildings," but as to the salt-pans and other articles made use of at all or any of the said wychhouses, &c., and belonging to the defendants and their assigns, they should be at liberty to take and carry away from off the said premises, upon making good all such injury or damage as the said wychhouses, &c. might sustain in consequence of such removal, "with an option to the lessors of purchasing any part of the salt-pans or other movable articles." The defendants sunk a brine-shaft and erected an apparatus for working it, and underlet the premises on the 13th of December 1861. The plaintiffs, on the 23rd of June 1862, wrote a letter demanding possession, as the underletting gave them a right of re-entry on the land, and an action of ejectment was brought on the 7th of July 1862. Between the 18th of January and the 17th of March 1863, defendants sold and removed a number of fixtures, &c., and on the last-mentioned day they confessed judgment in the action of ejectment. It was held, that under the above covenants, defendants had a right to take away such fixtures as could properly be called tenant's fixtures, and they were entitled to a reasonable time after the receipt of the letter of the 23rd of June 1862, within which they might remove them. Sumner v. Bromilow, Q.B. 180

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT—Proceedings by foreign attachment in the Mayor's Court of the city of London, commenced after the death of the creditor of the garnishee, whose debt is attached, are null and void. In an action by an administratrix for a debt due to M, the intestate, defendants pleaded to the further maintenance that the debt sued for had been attached in the Mayor's Court, in a suit instituted by K. against the intestate, that a regular judgment had been obtained by K. in such court, and that execution had issued thereon against defendants as garnishees, and that after the commencement of this action defendants as garnishees paid the said debt to K. for the purpose of satisfying such judgment. Replication, that at the time of affirming the plaint in the Mayor's Court, M, the intestate, was dead. Rejoinder, that at the time of affirming the said plaint, no one had administered to the estate of M, the intestate, but that before execution was had by K. plaintiff took out letters of administration to the estate of K, and might, according to the practice of the Mayor's Court, and the custom of the city of London, have appeared to the said plaint and defended the same, or might have dissolved the said attachment and defended the said plaint. It was held, on demurrer, that plaintiff was not estopped as against defendants from shewing the nullity of the proceedings in the Mayor's Court, and defendants could not avail themselves of the payment to K. as any defence to the action. Quere—whether the debt sued for by the administratrix was attached at all, inasmuch as there was no debt due to the intestate at the time of the attachment as the intestate was then dead. Matthey v. Wiseman, C.P. 216

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—To make a valid verbal contract for the sale of goods above the value of 10*l.* where nothing has been given to bind the bargain or by way of part payment binding upon the vendee, there must be an acceptance and actual receipt, and such acceptance must be made with the consent of the vendor; and until such acceptance, the property in the goods is not changed and the vendor may exercise his right to rescind the contract. And if, under such circumstances, the contract has been rescinded, no act on the part of the vendee, or of his assignees in case of his subsequent bankruptcy, can affect an acceptance so as to change the property in the goods. Goods purchased under such a contract and sent by the vendor to a railway station, consigned to the order of the vendee, are not, whilst lying at the station, waiting the order of the vendee, and before any order given or other act done by him constituting an acceptance of the goods, in his "possession, order or disposition," with the consent of the true owner, so as, upon his bankruptcy, to give his assignees any right to them under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125, notwithstanding the goods were no longer in transitu, and the right of stoppage therefore did not exist. Smith v. Hudson, Q.B. 145

— Defendants agreed by parol to purchase of plaintiff four specific stacks of cotton waste at 1*s.* 9*d.* per pound. They sent their own packer with their sacks and their own carts to fetch it; their packer packed the waste into eighty-one sacks, twenty-one of which were weighed and then loaded on defendants' cart and taken to defendants' premises; the rest of the sacks were not weighed. On arrival of the twenty-one sacks at defendants' premises they refused to accept any portion of the waste, on the ground that it was of inferior quality; and it was held, the property in the waste passed to defendants, and that there was sufficient evidence of an acceptance and receipt to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Kershaw v. Ogden, Ex. 159

GAME—The 30th section of 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32, which makes it an offence to "commit a trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land in search of game," does not apply to a case where the game alleged to be searched for was dead at the time. Kenyon v. Hart, Q.B. 153; M.C. 87

— The tenant of P. shot game upon land which was occupied by him as tenant. Before the commencement of the tenancy P. had granted the right of shooting over the land to G. The tenant having been summoned before Justices was convicted of killing game upon the evidence of G. that he had the exclusive right of shooting over the land; that he preserved the game there; that he had given no permission to the tenant to shoot; and that the tenant had killed game at the time in question. It was held, that upon this evidence the Justices ought not to have convicted the tenant, inasmuch as there was not sufficient evidence that the right of shooting was in G. without the production of the deed. Barker v. Davis, Q.B. 163; M.C. 140

GAME (continued)—The appellant was found with a net, and for the purpose of taking game, upon certain land, which had a hedge on either side, and a metalled road running through it. Between the road, on both sides of it, and the hedges the land was waste land varying in extent; and it was held, this land was not either open or inclosed within the meaning of 9 Geo. 4. c. 69. s. 1. *Vesey v. B. shot rabbits and grubbed up a large quantity of gorse, &c., whereupon C. brought an action against A. It was held, first, that B. had no right to shoot rabbits, and that his act therefore was a wrongful one, for which A. was not liable; secondly, that B. was entitled to grub up the gorse, &c. in the reasonable use of the land as a farm, and that there was no implied covenant with C. that this should not be done, and that A. was therefore not liable for such act of B. Jeffries v. Evans, C.P. 261

— Game started and killed on the land of another becomes the absolute property of the owner of the land, and not of the captor, even though it may be killed and carried away in one continuous act. Quære—whether there would be any difference if the game were started on the land of one person and killed on that of another. *Blades v. GAMING—Persons tossing up halfpence and betting money on the number of heads and tails, are not guilty of an offence under the 5 Geo. 4. c. 83. s. 4, which makes liable to be convicted of being a rogue and vagabond "every person playing or betting in any highway, at or with any table or instrument of gaming, at any game or pretended game of chance." Watson v. Martin, Q.B. 74; M.C. 53

— Defendant was in the habit of resorting to a certain tree in Hyde Park for the purpose of making bets on horse races. He there received deposits on such bets from many persons, and from the plaintiff among others. It was held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas (page 46), that defendant was not a person from whom plaintiff could recover his deposit under section 5. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, since the spot in Hyde Park which the defendant frequented was not a "place" within the meaning of the act. *Doggett v. GUARANTEE—The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97). s. 4,—which enacts that no promise for the debt or default of another made to a firm consisting of two or more persons, or to a single person trading under the name of a firm, or for the debt or default of such a firm, shall be binding in respect of anything done after a change in any one or more of the persons constituting the firm, or the person trading under the name of the firm, unless the intention of the parties that such promise shall continue notwithstanding such change, shall appear either by express stipulation, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise,—is only an affirmation of the law of England previous to the statute. Three persons carried on the business of ship-builders under the name of "G. W. & W. J. Hall." No person of that name had been in the partnership for some time, and the plaintiff and defendant being both aware of the constitution of the partnership, the defendant gave the plaintiff the following guarantee:—"In consideration that you have at my instance and request consented to open an account with the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall, ship-builders, I hereby guarantee the payment to you of the monies that at any time may become due not exceeding 5,000*l.*" It was held, the guarantee ceased on the death of one of the partners, as a contrary intention did not appear by express stipulation, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise. Backhouse v. Hall, Q.B. 141

— P. was employed by plaintiffs, who were coal-merchants, to sell their coals on commission, on the terms that he was to be answerable for the price of the coals sent out to customers on his order, and to pay for them monthly. T.

guaranteed the due performance by P. of his engagements to the amount of 300*l.* After some years, P. not paying for the coals supplied according to his agreement, and owing plaintiffs, on the coal account, above 1,300*l.*, plaintiffs required further security. P. having stated to the plaintiffs that defendant would become surety for him, plaintiffs prepared an agreement, which, after reciting the original agreement between P. and plaintiffs, the guarantie by T, and that P. had for some time been salesman to plaintiffs on the terms stated, and that in order to induce plaintiffs to continue the arrangement with P. defendant had agreed to guarantee, went on to provide that defendant should give a floating and continuing guarantie to plaintiffs for three years to secure the amount of any balance that might at any time during the three years be due from P. to plaintiffs. This agreement was sent to defendant by plaintiffs, and executed by defendant. It, however, did not recite that any debt was then due from P. to plaintiffs, nor did plaintiffs inform defendant of the fact. Defendant made no inquiry of plaintiffs. In an action against defendant on his guarantie, he pleaded that the guarantie was obtained from him by fraud of plaintiffs, and by the fraudulent concealment by plaintiffs of material facts. It was held, by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that there was some evidence, taking the circumstances of the case and the recitals in the agreement together, from which a jury would be justified in saying that plaintiffs had been guilty of intentional fraudulent misrepresentation to induce the defendant to sign the agreement. Lee v. Jones (Ex. Ch.), C.P. 131

— Defendant covenanted with plaintiffs that, in consideration that the plaintiffs would give credit to one Taylor, he would be surety to the extent of 100*l.* for any sum which might from time to time be owing by Taylor. The deed provided that no indulgence, time, credit or forbearance given or shewn to, or security taken from, or composition with Taylor, should be any discharge of any liability under the deed, or should release defendant from observing the provisions thereof. Taylor entered into a deed of composition with his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which contained an unconditional release, which plaintiffs executed. It was held, on the authority of Cowper v. Smith, that the composition deed was no defence to plaintiffs' claim for 100*l.*, as by the terms of the guarantie the surety was not discharged by the release of the principal debtor. The Union Bank of Manchester (Lim.) v. Beech, Ex. 133

HACKNEY CARRIAGE LICENCE—The possession of a revenue licence to let horses and carriages for hire, under 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 120, does not supersede the necessity of the proprietor having a licence for his carriage to ply for hire under the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), sections 37. and 45. *Buckle v. INSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENT—A policy for insuring payment of a sum of money in case the insured should be injured by accidental violence and die from the direct effect of such accident, was subject to the following condition: "this policy insures against all forms of cuts, stabs," &c., when accidentally occurring from material and external cause, where such accidental injury is the direct and sole cause of death to be insured," but it does not insure against death or disability arising from rheumatism, gout, hernia, erysipelas, or any other disease or cause arising within the system of the insured before or at the time or following such accidental injury. It was held, the insurers were liable under such policy where the insured died from hernia caused by external violence. Fitton v. the Accidental Death Insur. Co., C.P. 28

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE—A damage sustained by atmospheric concussion caused by an explosion of gunpowder at a distance, is not a damage insured against by a policy for the payment of such loss or damage as should be occasioned by fire to the property thereby insured. *Everett v. the London Assur. INTERROGATORIES—In allowing a party to deliver interrogatories to the opposite party, the Court will take as a guide the rules and principles acted upon in the courts of equity as to bills of discovery, although it will not consider itself to be fettered by those rules. In an action of ejectment the Court will not compel the defendant to answer interrogatories where the answer would tend to shew that he had incurred a forfeiture of his lease by reason of his having underlet the premises. *Pye v. LANDLORD AND TENANT—One or two joint-tenants may demise his or their portions to another, so as to create the relationship of landlord and tenant between them, with a right to distrain in respect of rent in arrear. Thus, three co-executors may agree that one shall hold land, devised to them in trust, at a fixed rent, and if the rent falls into arrear, he may be distrained upon in respect of it. Scoble, also, that when he has taken possession and has paid rent, he would be estopped from denying their right to distrain. Cowper v. Fletcher, Q.B. 187

— Goods in the possession of a pawnbroker as security for money advanced cannot be distrained for rent. In an action by the pawnbroker to recover goods distrained under such circumstances, the pawnbroker is entitled to recover the full value of the goods. Swire v. Leach, C.P. 150

— Defendant was lessee of a house, and plaintiff one of the reversioners and lessors. Before the end of the lease the lessors agreed verbally with M. that he should have a lease, to commence at the end of that of defendant, the house to be pulled down by M. and new premises built by him. Defendant left the house out of repair at the end of the lease. M. afterwards entered, and some time after that the verbal agreement was put into writing, and the house pulled down. Plaintiff brought an action against defendant on a covenant in his lease for not keeping and yielding up the house in good repair; and it was held the jury were not compelled to give only nominal damages. Rawlings v. Morgan, C.P. 185

— Where a tenant is allowed to hold over after the expiration of his lease, it is a question of fact for the jury on what terms he continues to hold. Receipt of rent by remainderman no evidence of a holding over under the terms of the lease. Oakley v. Monck, Ex. 137

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT—Where lands have been taken, the claimant, in order to bring himself within section 68. of 8 Vict. c. 18, must give, in his notice for a jury, such reasonable information as to his interest as will enable the promoters to judge whether they will pay the whole claim, or what amount they ought to offer; and where the claimant is occupier under a lease for years, it is not sufficient to state in the notice that he "holds under a lease." Cameron v. the Charing Cross Rail. Co. commented upon. Healey v. the Thames Valley Rail. Co., Q.B. 52

— By the 216th and 217th sections of a local act for making a railway (containing similar provisions with those in the 127th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act), lands acquired by the company under the provisions of the act, but which should not be required for the purposes thereof, were to be sold within ten years after the passing of the act, and if they were not so sold, they were to vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto, in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same. It was held, that this applied to all lands acquired under the provisions of the act, for the purpose of making the railway, and not used for that purpose, whether the land were actually in the possession of the company, or in the occupation of their tenants. In the year 1861 plaintiff brought an action to recover the possession of lands which, under the act, would become vested in him as the owner of adjoining land; in 1863, the company, in promoting another private act, got a clause inserted, to the effect that the respective periods limited for the sale of superfluous lands were to be extended for five years from the passing of the act. The vested interest of plaintiff, if he had any at all, had vested in him in the year 1854. It was held, the clause so inserted in the year 1863 had no operation upon the claim of plaintiff. Also, that the proper way to apportion the superfluous lands among the owners of the land adjoining thereto, was by drawing a line from the point where the boundaries of two adjoining owners meet, to the nearest point of the land actually used by the company. Moody v. Corbett, Q.B. 166

— If a railway company during the execution of their works under their special act place a bridge on a highway, up and down and over which bridge passengers must pass, instead of along the level highway, and so render the access to a public-house more difficult, and passengers are thereby deterred from going that way, and there is in consequence a loss of trade to the public-house, the tenant of the public-house cannot sustain a demand for compensation, under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, on the ground that his land has been injuriously affected by the works; for no action would have lain against the company had they not been authorized by their special act; and even if an action might have been supported, still no compensation is claimable, since the damage, if any, is of a personal character, and not an injury to the land. So held in the Exchequer Chamber (reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench) by Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B., dissentientibus Byles, J. and Keating, J. Senior v. the Metropolitan Railway Company and Cameron v. the Charing Cross

— A party who has a right of shooting over land by an agreement with the owner, not under seal, has not such an interest as to entitle him to compensation under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in respect of such land being taken by a railway company for the purposes of their railway. *Bird v. the Great Eastern Rail. LEASE—Plaintiff being in occupation of premises under a lease from J. F. which would expire on the 4th of December 1864, obtained from J. F. a reversionary lease for twenty-one years and twenty-one days, to commence from the said 4th of December 1864, on payment of a premium. In November 1863 J. F. died, and it turned out he had no power to grant this reversionary lease. F. V. who was entitled to the premises on the death of J. F. refused to ratify the said lease, and the plaintiff was obliged to accept a lease from F. V. to commence on the 25th of December 1864, for seven years only, at a greater rent. Plaintiff brought an action against the executor of J. F. on a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in the void lease; and it was held, first, that a plea that plaintiff had never entered into possession of the premises under such lease was bad; secondly, that on a plea that F. V. did not claim the premises from plaintiff or threaten to oust him from the possession thereof, plaintiff was entitled to judgment; thirdly, that plaintiff was not merely entitled to recover the premiums and expenses of the void lease; but was entitled to recover the difference between the expenses of the void lease and the lease granted by F. V. and also the difference between the respective values of such leases, but that in calculating such differences in value, the transaction was not to be considered in the nature of a compulsory sale, and that the expenses of counsel, &c. were not recoverable. Lock v. Furze, C.P. 201

— Declaration for breach of covenants contained in a farming lease, dated 24th of December 1851, and made between plaintiff of the first part, defendant of the second and Y. of the third part, whereby plaintiff and Y. (so far only as they legally could or might, according only to their respective estates and interests) demised to defendant a farm for a term of fourteen years from the 25th of March 1851. Plea, that at the time of execution of the deed plaintiff was possessed of the premises for the residue of a term of years in case plaintiff should so long live, and the reversion of the premises after the expiration of the estate of plaintiff then was vested in Y. and that the indenture was never executed by Y. as his deed, and that there never was any demise by plaintiff and Y. to defendant of the premises, and that there never was any consideration for the execution of the indenture, or of defendant's part of the same. On demurrer, it was held the plea was bad, as it was expressly stated in the lease that plaintiff and Y. demised so far only as they legally could or might, according only to their respective estates and interest, and that therefore defendant had received the consideration for which he stipulated, viz. a lease for fourteen years, if plaintiff should so long live. Hov v. Greek, Ex. 4

LEASE (continued)—A lease for twenty-one years, expressed to be "determinable, nevertheless, in seven or fourteen years, if the said parties hereto shall so think fit," is determinable only by consent of both the parties, although it may have been their intention to give the option to either alone. Fowell v. Franter, Ex. 6

— To detain by an administrator for a title-deed whereby defendant demised land and premises to the intestate for an unexpired term of fourteen years, defendant pleaded that the deed was a farming lease, at a yearly rent, with various farming covenants, and that after the death of the intestate, and upon grant of administration, defendant, pursuant to the terms of the lease, re-entered for breach of covenants, and, thereupon, the title-deed became defendant's title-deed, and the lessee ceased to have any interest in it. It was held, this plea was no answer to the action, and that plaintiff was entitled to the deed. Elworthy v. Sandford, Ex. 42

LEGACY DUTY—Under section 8. of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, the Court will grant an attachment absolute in the first instance, against a person withholding legacy duty, who has failed to shew cause why he should not pay the money to the Receiver General of Inland Revenue. In re Eaton, Ex. 87

LIBEL—Plaintiff charged, as a libel upon him, a notice published by defendants, a railway company, which stated that plaintiff had been convicted by Justices of an offence against defendants' by-laws and fined, with an alternative of three weeks' imprisonment; the alternative in the conviction was really fourteen days. It was held, it was a question for the jury whether the statement charged as libellous was or was not substantially true, and that the inaccuracy of the statement did not necessarily make it libellous. Alexander v. North-Eastern Rail Co., Q.B. 152

— What amounts to defamatory matter, as being a disparagement to character. Fray v. Fray, C.P. 45

— To an action for libel defendant pleaded that, after the commencement of the suit, plaintiff and defendant agreed to accept certain mutual apologies to be published by plaintiff and defendant respectively, in certain weekly journals belonging to plaintiff and defendant respectively, in full satisfaction and discharge of all causes and rights of action in the declaration mentioned, and all damages and costs sustained by plaintiff; and that in pursuance of the agreement defendant did publish his part of the mutual apologies in the weekly journal belonging to him, and that plaintiff did also in pursuance of the agreement publish his part of the apologies in the weekly journal belonging to him. It was held the plea was a bar to the action as an accord and satisfaction. Boosey v. Wood, Ex. 65

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF—If by the act of A. an injury is occasioned to the foundations of the house of B, of which B. has not at the time any knowledge, but which afterwards exhibits itself by creating actual mischief to B.'s house, B. is not prevented by the Statute of Limitations from maintaining an action for damages, though more than six years have elapsed since the doing of the act which was in reality (though unknown at the time) the origin of the mischief, for the cause of action really accrued when the actual damage first exhibited itself. Backhouse v. Bowmi (House of Lords), Q.B. 181

LOAN SOCIETY. See Equitable Plea.

LOCAL MARINE BOARD—A local marine board appointed under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, to inquire into a charge of alleged misconduct against the master or mate of a vessel, has a discretionary power as to granting summonses for witnesses for the defence: it is a proper course for such Court before granting the summonses to inquire who the witnesses are and what they are expected to prove, and to refuse the summons in respect of any witness who can only speak to matters clearly irrelevant. The witnesses summoned for the defence are witnesses of the Court, and their expense is to be borne not by the defendant but by the public. R. v. Collingridge, Q.B. 9

MARINE INSURANCE—By a policy of insurance a ship was insured from Liverpool to any port in the Pacific Ocean, "and during thirty days' stay in her last port of discharge." In another part of the policy there was the usual printed clause, by which she was to be insured "until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." She arrived at M, her port of discharge, at 7 p.m. on the 25th of May, and anchored there, and at 3.45 a.m. on the 24th of June she was driven ashore and lost. It was held the loss was covered by the policy, as the thirty days had not expired when it occurred. The Mercantile Marine Insur. Co. v. Titherington, Q.B. 11

— Sufficiency of declaration of risk with knowledge of loss at time of granting the policy. Gledstanes v. the Corporation of the Royal Exchange Assurance, Q.B. 30

— The "seaworthiness" of which, in the absence of express stipulation, there is an implied warranty in every voyage policy, is a relative term depending on the nature of the ship as well as of the voyage insured for. Therefore, on a policy "on a voyage from the Tyne to Odessa," it being shewn that the vessel was an iron steamer of very light draught of water, constructed for river navigation only, that this was disclosed to the underwriters before the policy was effected and the dimensions of the vessel then stated to them, and that (though it was impossible to make her fit to encounter the ordinary perils of ocean navigation) the ship had been made as seaworthy as her size and construction would admit, the underwriters were held liable on her being lost by the perils insured against. Clapham v. Langton (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 46

— To a declaration on a policy of insurance upon freight on a voyage from R. to Liverpool, averring a total loss by perils of the sea, defendant pleaded, fourthly, that the cargo consisted of timber and wood, that R. is a port in British North America, that the voyage commenced after 1st of September and before 1st of May, and the master stowed a portion of the cargo on deck contrary to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. ss. 170-2, and sailed without the certificate required by that statute, and that plaintiff was the owner of the ship. Fifth plea, the same as the fourth, with a further averment that plaintiff intended that the vessel should sail so loaded, and made the policy for the express purpose of protecting the adventure. At the trial the following facts appeared: the whole of the cargo that was on freight was properly stowed below deck, but the master placed some spars on deck to be carried to Liverpool for the owner, having no instructions from the owner to do so. The vessel was not made unseaworthy by the mode of loading, nor did the owner know of it till after the policy was made and the ship had sailed. It was held, first, that these spars were within the meaning of the Customs Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. s. 71; secondly, that the fifth plea was good, but not proved; thirdly, that no authority from the owner to the master could be implied to do that which was unlawful, though the act might be otherwise within the ordinary scope of the master's authority, and though it might be done for the benefit of the owner; that the master, therefore, in stowing the cargo on deck contrary to the statute, could not be taken to be acting by the authority of the owner, nor was the owner bound by the knowledge of the master; and that consequently, on the authority of Cunard v. Hyde, the fourth plea was bad, and the plaintiff entitled to recover on the policy. Wilson v. Rankin, Q.B. 62

— If a ship is submerged with cargo on board and cannot be got out without raising the ship, the cost of raising is general average, to which the cargo must contribute. In such a case, in order to ascertain whether a ship is a constructive total loss, the sum to be contributed by the cargo as general average must be taken into consideration; and if, after deducting that sum, the remaining cost of raising, together with the cost of repairs of the ship, is less than her value when repaired, the ship is not a total loss. So held by Blackburn, J., Shree, J. dissenting on the latter points. Kemp v. Halliday, Q.B. 233

— A policy of insurance for twelve months on ship and cargo, the ship being intended for the barter trade on the coast of Africa, contained a stipulation that "outward cargo should be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after arrival at the first port or place of trade." By a subsequent clause the policy was declared to be "on the ship valued at 2,000*l.*, cargo valued at 8,000*l.*" There was liberty given to the insured "to discharge, load, unload, reload, sell, barter, exchange and trade" any part of the cargo. The ship arrived at a place on the coast of Africa and there discharged a large part of her cargo, and after a stay of more than twenty-four hours proceeded towards other ports in order to take in other cargo; before arriving at her next port of destination she was totally lost. It was held, the insurers were not liable to pay the whole 8,000*l.*, but a proportion only; that the valuation in the policy was applicable to what was substantially a full cargo, whereas here there was not substantially a full cargo. It was held, also, that the proportion of the 8,000*l.* which the underwriters were liable to pay, was to be ascertained by finding the proportion which the goods on board at the time of the loss bore to a full cargo, and if this proportion could not be found, that then the underwriters would be liable as upon an open policy underwritten for 8,000*l.* Tobin v. Harford (Ex. Ch.), C.P. 37

— Declaration on a policy of insurance on goods from London to a port not alleged to be neutral, was in the usual form, and alleged a loss by a peril insured against. Defendant pleaded that the goods were contraband of war, and were shipped for the purpose of being sent to and imported into a belligerent port, and also that the ship was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized, and that she was seized accordingly, which was the loss complained of; of all which defendant, at the time of signing the policy, was ignorant. It was held, that the plea was bad, as, upon the true interpretation of the first allegation, it was consistent therewith that the ship was on her voyage to a neutral port, in which case there was no breach of neutrality; and that the allegation that the ship was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized was insufficient, because it was not shewn that the goods were plaintiff's goods, or that he was responsible for the state of the ship's papers. Defendant also pleaded, by way of estoppel, a judgment, by a foreign Court, of condemnation of the ship and cargo, in which it was found, as a ground of condemnation, that the ship was laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea; and that she was not truly destined to the port of Matamoras, but to some other port, and in aid and for the use of persons then at war with the United States, and in violation of the law of nations; and that the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination. It was held, this judgment did not conclusively find that the ship had not sailed for Matamoras, or that she had deviated from her voyage, but only that the ultimate destination of the ship, or goods, or both, was some other port than Matamoras, and that upon this interpretation of the judgment the facts conclusively found were insufficient. And it was held, also, per Erle, C.J. and Byles, J., that such a judgment could not be pleaded as an estoppel. Hobbs v. Henning, C.P. 117

MARINE INSURANCE (continued)—Where a stranded vessel was in danger of falling to pieces, and the captain sold her cargo, consisting of timber, because the expense of forwarding it to its destination would have exceeded its value there, when so forwarded, the assured was held entitled to recover against the underwriter on a policy on such cargo, for a total loss without having given notice of abandonment. Farnworth v. Hyde, C.P. 207

— By a policy of insurance on a vessel against capture and detention the insurers contracted "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation." The vessel having been detained under an embargo within the meaning of the policy, it was held, that when the thirty days after receipt of official news of such embargo had expired, the assured was entitled to recover for a total loss, although before action, but subsequently to such thirty days, the embargo was taken off and the vessel was restored to the assured. *Fowler v. the English and Scottish Marine Insurance Co. MASTER AND SERVANT—S, the agent of an insurance company, being indebted to the company, and being pressed for payment, it was arranged that plaintiff should pay the money to the company, and that the company should appoint him and S. as joint agents, with the same rates of payment and remuneration as before. A deed was executed, containing a covenant that in case the company should at any time thereafter "displace" S. from his appointment as agent, then that they should and would forthwith repay to plaintiff the money so paid by him.

Subsequently, the company transferred the whole of their business and liabilities to another company, and refused to pay plaintiff the money so advanced by him; and in an action to recover the amount it was held, there was an implied covenant on the part of the company that they would not do anything of their own voluntary act, by which it should be impossible for them to keep S. in their employ any longer, and therefore they were liable in the action. Stirling v. Maitland, Q.B. 1

— A master cannot maintain an action per quod servitium amittit against a railway company for an injury to his servant whilst a passenger on the company's railway, caused by a neglect of their duty to safely carry the servant according to their contract with him as such passenger, unless the master was a party to such contract. *Alton v. the Midland Rail. — Some bales of cotton, sent by defendant to a warehouse and packed there carelessly by his servants under the direction of the warehouse-keeper, afterwards fell on plaintiff, a servant of the owner of the warehouse, who was passing by in the course of his duty; and it was held, that defendant was not responsible. Randelson v. (Lim.), Ex. 208

— Plaintiff, a workman in a coal-mine of defendants, received damage from the fall of a stone from the roof of the mine, which had lost its support by reason of the removal of the coal below in the ordinary course of working the mine. Defendants' underlooker, whose duty it was to superintend the mining operations, had negligently, though the danger had been pointed out to him, omitted to prop up the roof. The removal of the coal and the propping up of the roof ought, in the exercise of due and reasonable care, to be nearly contemporaneous operations. It was held, that as there was no evidence that defendants had not exercised due care in the selection of their underlooker, nor in putting the mine into a proper condition before the miners were sent into it, they were not answerable for the injury caused to plaintiff by the negligence of the underlooker, his fellow-labourer. Hall v. Johnson (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 222

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT ACT. See Guarantee.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS, 1862— By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. s. 67, a shipowner is empowered to land goods imported in his ship from foreign parts subject to the condition, that "if before the goods are landed the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he lands or unships the same without such notice do so at his own risk and expense." It was held, the owner of the goods when he makes an offer to take delivery of them must be in a condition to receive the same if the offer be then accepted in order to entitle him to the benefit of such condition. And, further, that when such offer is made, the shipowner, if he then fails not only to make delivery of the goods, but also to give such owner of the goods information of the time at which they can be delivered, is bound to give the twenty-four hours' notice above specified before he lands the goods, although he was never asked to give such information. Beresford v. Montgomerie, C.P. 41

— The 29th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. does not authorize the making of rules which, abolishing the distinction between paddle-wheels and screws, in estimating the deduction to be made for space occupied by boilers and machinery, substitute one uniform allowance for all classes of steam vessels, together with a new mode of ascertaining by admeasurement such allowance. The City of Dublin Steam-Packet Co. v. Thompson, C.P. 316

MERGER—Plaintiffs lent M. 650*l.* on security of mortgage of certain property, with a covenant by M. to repay the 650*l.* with interest at 5*l.* per cent., on 22nd of June 1864; and as the mortgage was not a sufficient security for more than 500*l.* the loan was made on further security of the promissory note of M. and two sureties for 150*l.* payable on demand, with interest at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. The promissory note, which it was agreed between plaintiffs and M. should be a collateral security to the mortgage-deed, was made and given to plaintiffs on the 7th of December 1863, when 150*l.*, part of the loan, was advanced to M.; but the mortgage-deed was not executed until the 22nd of December 1863. The deed contained no reference to the note, and the sureties who signed the note were not parties to the deed. It was held, the debt secured by the note did not merge in the deed, and that, though the remedy on the covenant could not be enforced before the 22nd of June 1864, time was not given to M. so as to discharge the sureties on the note. Boaler v. Mayor, C.P. 230

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT—The 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix. contains (amongst other things) powers for the suppression of nuisances, within a certain district of the metropolis, and by section 68, the keeping of pigs within forty yards of any street is prohibited, whether the same be a nuisance or not. By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 73, the powers of improving and regulating streets, and for the "suppression" of nuisances contained in the 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix. are applied to a larger district. It was held, dubitate Keating, J., that section 68. of 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix., being a power of prevention and not of suppression, did not apply to the larger district. *The Vestry of Chelsea v. METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT—The lessee of a house for a long term of years, who has underlet it in different portions to different tenants, and who is in receipt of the rents from such underlettings, is the "owner" of the party-wall of such house within the meaning of the Metropolitan Buildings Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), notwithstanding the underlettings create a greater interest in the under-tenants than that of a yearly tenancy, and he is liable as such owner to pay the adjoining owner a proportion of the expenses incurred by the latter in repairing the wall in obedience to the requisition of the Commissioners of Sewers made under that act. Hunt v. Harris, C.P. 249

MINES—Damage by working. See Limitations, Statute of.

MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED—K. had chartered a vessel of defendant at the hire of 30*l.* per week, payable every four weeks in advance, with liberty for defendant in case of non-payment to retake the ship. A month's payment of 120*l.* in advance being due, K. applied to plaintiff to assist him, and plaintiff gave K. a cheque for 60*l.* payable to defendant or order, on the terms that K. should inform defendant that the cheque was given on the consideration of defendant's allowing the vessel to proceed on a certain voyage. K. paid the cheque to defendant, but did not tell him of plaintiff's conditions. As the whole of the 120*l.* was not paid, defendant stopped and retook the vessel. The cheque being presented at plaintiff's bankers, on the part of defendant, was duly cashed. It was held, that as defendant had received plaintiff's cheque, which was a negotiable security, without notice of any conditions, and for a valuable consideration, the debt due to him from K. plaintiff was not entitled to recover from defendant any portion of the proceeds. Watson v. Russell (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 93

MONEY PAID. See Charter-Party.

MORTGAGE — B, in consideration of a sum of money lent to him by defendants, who carried on business under the name of "The City Investment and Advance Company," assigned by deed certain goods of his to the said company to hold as their own proper goods; nevertheless, by way of mortgage for securing the repayment of the said loan, with full power to the mortgagees to sell the goods, and out of the proceeds to reimburse themselves the said loan and costs of sale, and to pay the residue, if any, to B. It was held, the property in the goods passed by such deed to the mortgagees, and that plaintiff, who claimed the same goods under a subsequent assignment to him from B, could not maintain an action against them for selling the goods without taking reasonable care to obtain the best prices for them. Also, that defendants need not be described in the deed by their christian names or surnames, and that the conveyance of the property to the said company as above mentioned operated as a conveyance to defendants on its being ascertained that they were the persons described under the name of such company. Maughan v. Sharpe, C.P. 19

NEGLIGENCE—Defendant, the owner of a house in the metropolis, employed a contractor to make a drain from his house to the main sewer, under the powers of the Metropolis Local Management Act. The contractor made the drain, but filled up the ground so negligently where it crossed a public footway, that it subsided and left a hole, into which plaintiff fell and was injured. It was held, by the Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench (see page 17), that defendant was liable for the injury; that as the statutable power for making the drain also imposed on defendant the duty of filling up the cutting across the footway properly, he was not excused by reason of his having employed to perform the work a contractor who omitted to do his duty. Gray v. Pullen (Ex. Ch.), Q.B. 265 — Declaration that defendant knowing that certain of his dogs were accustomed to hunt for and pursue game, and that plaintiff preserved game in a certain wood, so negligently controlled and restrained his said dogs near to the said wood, that they entered the said wood and hunted and destroyed the game therein. It was proved defendant had a dog of a peculiarly mischievous disposition, being accustomed to chase and destroy game on its own account, and that that vice was known to defendant, who, notwithstanding, allowed the dog to be at large in the neighbourhood of plaintiff's wood, and that the dog consequently entered the wood and did the damage complained of. It was held, the declaration was proved in an actionable sense, and was also good after verdict. Quare—whether the owner of a dog is answerable in trespass for every unauthorized entry of the animal into the land of another. Read v. Edwards, C.P. 31

— Defendants' railway crossed a carriage road on a level; there were locked carriage gates and swing gates for foot passengers, the trains were frequent, the crossing was on a curve, and a bridge near to it over the line obstructed the view in that direction. Two trains passed about the same time, and whilst plaintiff's attention was directed to one the other knocked him down. It was held, that, although there might be no statutory provisions for the safety of such a foot-passenger, yet under the circumstances there was evidence of negligence to go to the jury, and the Judge was not bound to nonsuit. Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Rail. Co., C.P. 182

— Through the defect of a gate which defendant was bound to repair, defendant's horse got out of defendant's farm into an occupation road and strayed into plaintiff's field, where it kicked plaintiff's horse; and it was held, defendant was liable for the trespass by his horse, and that it was not necessary for the maintenance of the action to prove defendant's horse was vicious and that defendant was aware thereof. Also, that the damage plaintiff had sustained by the injury to his horse was not too remote, but was sufficiently the consequence of defendant's neglect to be recoverable in such action. Lee v. Riley, C.P. 212

— Defendants contracted with the Lords of the Admiralty for the erection of docks and works in Plymouth harbour, and for that purpose sunk piles in the navigable part of the channel. After the completion of the works, and after a reasonable time for the removal of the piles, defendants sold the piles to J, who undertook to remove them by a certain date, or sooner if required by the Lords of the Admiralty. The Admiralty subsequently required J. not to draw the piles, and J, acting under those orders, cut the piles off on a level with the bed of the channel. The soil was subsequently washed from around the stumps, and plaintiff's vessel struck against them and was injured. In the position in which the piles existed at the time defendants delivered them up to J, the damage could not have been done without plaintiff's gross negligence. It was held, there was no cause of action against defendants. Bartlett v. Baker, Ex. 8

— The level crossing between the platforms at a railway station, which formed part of the "way out" for passengers arriving at the south platform, was blocked for more than ten minutes by the train in which plaintiff arrived there. Under such circumstances, it was usual for the arriving passengers—and the railway company did not object to the practice—to walk alongside and round the end of the train in order to cross the line. Plaintiff in so doing, in the dark, stumbled over a hamper which had been taken out of the train, and placed at the side of the line, some distance from the platform, and was injured. It was held there was evidence of negligence on the part of the railway company. Nicholson v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co., Ex. 84

— Plaintiff, a custom-house officer, while on defendants' premises in the execution of his duty, was injured by some bags of sugar falling on him from a crane fixed over a doorway, under which he was passing. It was held, by the majority of the Court, Crompton, J., Byles, J., Blackburn, J. and Keating, J., that as the accident was such as did not in the ordinary course of things happen to those who have the management of machinery, and use proper care, it afforded reasonable evidence of negligence in the absence of any explanation by the defendants (dissentientibus Erle, C.J. and Mellor, J.). Scott v. the London Dock Co. (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 220

NEW TRIAL—Where a country cause was tried at Westminster on the last day but one of Hilary Term, the Court held that an application by defendant for a new trial, made on the 4th day of the ensuing Easter Term was too late, notwithstanding that defendant's attorney resided at Sandwich in Kent, and that his London agent lost no time either in obtaining the necessary instructions from him or in acting upon the instructions when received. Pain v. Terry, Ex. 224

NOTICE OF ACTION—A notice of action signed by B, the plaintiff, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 188, was, "It is my intention at the end of one calendar month from the date hereof to commence an action against you" (the high bailiff) "in the Court of Queen's Bench, to recover compensation in damages for a trespass and excessive levy committed by you and your officers on the 8rd of December 1863, by selling and disposing of certain goods upon the premises, No. 80, Derbyshire Street, &c., to satisfy debt and expenses under an order recovered against me in the S. county court." It was held the notice was sufficient. Burton v. Le Gros, Q.B. 91

NUISANCE—A canal company were empowered by an act of parliament to take the water of certain brooks and use it for the purposes of their canal; the water in one of the brooks at the time the act passed was pure, but it afterwards became polluted by drains, &c. before it reached the canal, and it was then penned back in the canal and became a public nuisance. It was held the company were liable to be indicted for the nuisance, as there was nothing in the act compelling them to take the water, or authorizing them to use it so as to create a nuisance. The King v.

PARLIAMENT—borough vote: non-payment of poor-rate: assistant overseer joining in making rate]—A poor-rate allowed by two magistrates was made by the majority of the parish officers, but such majority was obtained by an assistant overseer joining in making the rate. This assistant overseer had been appointed by the vestry to perform all the duties incident to the office of overseer, except the collection of rates. It was held that this rate was so far presumably valid that its non-payment by a party claiming a borough franchise was a disqualification to his being on the register of voters. Baker v. Locke, C.P. 49

— borough vote: payment of proportionate part of poor-rate by incoming tenant]—A person is not disqualified by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. from being on a borough register of voters because he has not paid some arrear of a poor-rate in respect of which he was not rated, and which had never been demanded of him, but which had been made on the qualifying premises prior to his occupation, and which by 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. the incoming tenant is liable to pay in proportion to the time he occupied. Flatcher v. Boodle, C.P. 77

— borough vote: "building": occupation as tenant]—A, a market-gardener, who claimed to vote for the borough of K, occupied as tenant land of the yearly value of 20*l.* within the borough. When he first took the land there was no building upon it, but he erected a wooden structure with boarded sides, and a thatched roof supported by wooden posts let into the ground; there was a door to the structure fastened by a padlock, and it was used for storing potatoes. The revising barrister found that this structure was a "building" within the meaning of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, and that A. occupied it as tenant, and was entitled to be registered as a voter; and it was held, upon the principle laid down in Watson v. Cotton, that there was nothing in the description as given by the barrister to warrant the Court in disturbing his decision. Quere—whether a pigstye is a "building" within the meaning of the Reform Act. *Powell v. — borough vote: "building": occupation as tenant]—The claimant for a vote in the borough of K. occupied, as tenant, land of the yearly value of more than 10*l.* within the borough. When he first took the land there was no building upon it. In 1862 an electioneering agent, having no interest of any sort in the land, caused a shed to be erected made of boards nailed to posts, and the claimant had used the shed, by keeping therein some of his agricultural — borough vote: "building": occupation as tenant—The claimant for a vote in the borough of K. occupied, as tenant, land of the yearly value of more than 10*l.* within the borough. When he first took the land there was no building upon it. In 1862 an electioneering agent, having no interest of any sort in the land, caused a shed to be erected made of boards nailed to posts, and the claimant had used the shed, by keeping therein some of his agricultural implements. There was no evidence that the landlord had any knowledge of the shed having been placed on the land. It was held, first, that though, as a fact, the revising barrister had found otherwise, this shed was not a "building" within the meaning of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, not being used either for residuary or for commercial purposes; and, secondly, that the claimant did not occupy it in the capacity of tenant; for there was nothing to shew that it had become parcel of the freehold so as to vest in the landlord subject to the interest of the tenant during the term. Powell v. Boraston, C.P. 73

PARLIAMENT (continued)—borough vote: occupation for twelve months: full age—If a claimant for a borough vote has occupied the premises for which he claims for twelve months previous to the last day of July in the year in which he claims, and is of full age previous to the day of registration, it is sufficient, though he was not of full age during the whole year of occupation. Powell v. Bradley, C.P. 67

— borough vote: break of residence by imprisonment—G, who claimed to have his name retained upon the register of voters for the borough of K, had been imprisoned for six months in a gaol more than seven miles from the borough, for an assault, without the option of paying a fine. The six months expired on the 25th of August in the year for which he claimed to be entitled to be so registered; and it was held, that as G. by his own criminal act had debarred himself of the power of residing within the borough, he had not the necessary qualification. Powell v. Guest, C.P. 69

— borough vote: freemen by birth—In a borough in which freemen by birth were entitled to vote before the passing of the Reform Act, the right is preserved by section 32, not only to those whose fathers were entitled to their freedom previously to the 31st of March 1831, but to the lineal descendants of all persons entitled to their freedom before that day. Gaydon v. Pencraft, C.P. 53

— borough vote: notice of objection—In the borough of D. there were two townships, S. and E., and there was a separate list of voters for each township. The notice of objection described the objector as "on the list of voters for the borough of D. and township of E."; and it was held, the notice sufficiently indicated on which of the two lists the voter's name was to be found. Oram v. Cole, C.P. 52 — power of barrister to re-hear—A. and B. were appointed to revise the list of voters for the county of L. At a court held by A. the name of a voter was duly objected to, and the voter not being present, his name was struck off. The Court was adjourned, and on the following day the voter came before B, who was then presiding, and explained the cause of his absence, and prayed for a re-hearing. B. consented to re-hear the case, and eventually restored the voter's name to the list. Upon an appeal to this Court, the case not stating whether the objector was present or not, it was held the decision of the revising barrister could not be supported. Blain v. the Overseers of Pilkington, C.P. 55

— incomplete appeal: consent to waive formal objections—At an adjourned Court held by the revising barrister for a borough, on the 29th of October, he decided in favour of one of several objections taken to certain votes, and expunged the voters' names from the list; but, on application by such voters for a case, he consented to grant one if a point of law could be raised, provided the case were shewn to the objector's attorney, in order that he might raise in it the points which had been decided against the objector. The directions in sections 42, 43, 44. of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. as to giving notice in writing of appeal, reading statement in writing in open court, signing the same then and there by the barrister, and appointing respondent to consolidated appeal, were not complied with, but both parties agreed at such court to waive all objections in point of form, and that the objector should appear as respondent, and the appeals be consolidated. There was no further adjournment of the Court, but the barrister directed the parties to come to him at his chambers, which were out of the borough. A case was afterwards prepared, and given to the objector on the 9th of November, but as he was then unable to shew it to his attorney, he refused to sign it, and returned it unsigned on the 5th of November; the barrister signed at his chambers, making the objector respondent, and it was transmitted on the same day to the Masters of the Court, that being the last day for doing so; a copy of the case and notice of appeal were served on the same day on the objector, who refused to be bound thereby. It was held, that there was not a completed appeal, and the Court therefore made absolute a rule to strike the case out of the list of appeals. Scott v. Durant, C.P. 81

— borough vote: proof of service by the post of notice of objection—Service of notice of objection, addressed to a borough voter, and sent by the post, pursuant to section 100. of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, is proved by producing a duly stamped notice signed by the objector, although it be headed with the word "copy"; such heading not vitiating the document as a duplicate, if in all other respects it corresponds with the notice left with the postmaster. Bence v. Booth, C.P. 99

— county vote: inmate of hospital: freehold interest in land—An hospital was founded, and lands were devised to trustees upon trust to permit the rectors of two parishes to make certain fixed payments out of the profits to the inmates to the hospital. The inmates had each a separate room, and were removable for misbehaviour; and there was a surplus income after making the specified payments not disposed of by the deed which created the trusts. It was held, that the inmates of the hospital were not entitled to the surplus, and had not any equitable freehold interest in the lands of the charity, and were, therefore, not entitled to a county vote. Steele v. Bosworth, C.P. 57

— county vote: freehold for life: eleemosynary institution: practice: decision of Court when not final—An hospital was founded for certain bedesmen, who are appointed for life, and who inhabit separate rooms into which the hospital is divided, and each of which is of the annual value of 4*l*. The hospital was founded before 29 Eliz. c. 5, which enables hospitals for the poor to be incorporated, and it is governed by rules made before that act which refer to fees and their heirs, but none are known, and the warden and bedesmen manage the property without anybody interfering with them, and when a portion of it was lately sold for a railway they signed the conveyance and received the proceeds, which they expended in erecting buildings on the land for their own benefit. The rules give power to remove a bedesman for certain offences, but no instance has ever occurred of a bedesman having been removed during his life. It was held, that each bedesman had an equitable freehold estate in his room, which entitled him to be registered as a freeholder. Simpson v. Wilkinson affirmed; and the case distinguished from those of Heartley v. Banks and Freeman v. Gainsford. The decision of this Court on appeal, though made final by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 66, does not prevent the revising barrister from entering into a case in all respects similar to the one so decided, but affecting a different register and a different voter. Roberts v. Percival, C.P. 84

— county vote: shares in a bridge: Commissioners appointed by statute for public purposes—By an act of Geo. 1. Commissioners were appointed for building a bridge across the Thames from Fulham to Putney, after compensating the proprietors of the then existing ferries, and a pontage or toll was granted and vested in the Commissioners, to be applied as directed by the act; and by a subsequent act of Geo. 2, for more effectually enabling the Commissioners to complete such work, they were empowered to convey in perpetuity the tolls and income of the said bridge or ferries to such persons as would undertake to erect and maintain the bridge. The Commissioners accordingly contracted with certain persons, who subscribed the necessary funds and became the shareholders of the bridge to build and maintain the bridge and compensate the proprietors of the said ferries; and afterwards, the bridge having been built, the Commissioners, by a deed which recited the above acts of Geo. 1. and Geo. 2. and their powers thereunder, conveyed the said bridge and tolls and all such ground adjacent and belonging to the said ferries and every other matter which they were empowered to convey, by virtue of the said acts, to certain trustees in fee in trust to permit the said shareholders to receive the said tolls and income, and have the sole management thereof. It was held, the Commissioners had no power to convey the land belonging to the bridge, which had become vested in them by virtue of the said acts, and that the said shareholders having knowledge of the Commissioners' title under the said acts, acquired nothing more under the said deed than the Commissioners could lawfully convey, namely, the tolls and income; and, consequently, none of the shareholders had, as such, any freehold estate which could qualify him for a county vote. Tepper v. Nichols, C.P. 61 — county vote: interest in land: freehold shares in a music hall—Shareholders of a freehold music hall, who were thereby qualified to be on the register of county voters, vested the fee of the hall by deed in trustees, who were to manage the hall and pay to the shareholders proportionate sums out of the profits: and it was held, on the authority of Bennett v. Blain, that the shareholders had, after the execution of such deed, no direct interest in the land, but only a right to a share in the profits, and were therefore not entitled to vote as freeholders. Freeman v. Gainsford, C.P. 95

— county vote: rentcharge by conveyance under Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. s. 1: possession in law—Though the grantees of a rentcharge under a grant at common law is not entitled to be registered before he has been in the actual receipt of the rent (since until then he has only a possession in law, and not the actual possession required by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 26), it is otherwise where the rentcharge is by a conveyance operating under the Statute of Uses; for then the person, to whose use the rentcharge is so limited is, by virtue of the Statute of Uses, at once in actual possession, and he may be entitled to be registered if the rent be of sufficient value, though he has not received any part of it. Heelis v. Blain, C.P. 88

— county vote: occupation as tenant: annual rental under different holdings—A person who occupies as sole tenant land for which he is liable to a yearly rent of less than 50*l*., and also, as tenant jointly with another, land at a yearly rent of less than 50*l*. for each joint tenant, is not, under 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20. or 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 78, entitled to a county vote, though both tenancies are under the same landlord, and the share of the rent under the joint tenancy added to that under the sole tenancy exceeds 50*l*. a year. *Smith v. PARTNERS—S. entered into an arrangement with F, whereby F. was to manage an underwriting business in the name of S, S. finding the funds.

Defendant guaranteed S. to a certain amount; and in consideration thereof S. agreed to pay him an annuity, which, on a given state of the profits, was to be increased to a yearly sum equal to one-fourth of the profits; defendant, however, not to be considered as a partner. S. afterwards married, and by the marriage settlement all the profits were assigned to defendant and D. on certain trusts, the first trust being to pay out of the profits the said annuity. It was held, that the defendant was liable as a partner on a policy underwritten in the name of S. Bullen v. Sharp, C.P. 174

PATENT—The executors of a patentee assigned the patent, and registered the assignment, but the probate was not registered until afterwards. It was held, the assignment was good, and that the title of the assignee was completed in accordance with 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 35. The Court, in making an order for an account under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 42, will only direct an inquiry into the profits actually made by defendant, and will not direct a general inquiry into any other damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the infringement. The assignee of a patent is only entitled to an account of profits from the time that his title is complete, that is, when the assignment is completely registered. Ellwood v. Christy, C.P. 130

PAYMENT INTO COURT—A declaration contained a count upon a policy of insurance upon a ship and cargo, and also the usual money counts. Defendants, as to the first count, pleaded that they had not broken their covenants, and they also paid into court, under the money counts, the amount of the premiums, and plaintiffs took the money out of court. The cause having been referred to arbitrators to fix the amount of the loss which they had done irrespective of the amount which had been paid into court, it was held, the Court had power to prevent injustice being done to defendants, and that plaintiffs were only entitled to judgment for the balance which remained after deducting the amount of premiums paid into court. *Carr v. the Royal Exchange Assur. — The occupation of property which is liable to be rated under the 1st section of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. is an occupation yielding or capable of yielding a net annual value, that is to say, a clear rent over and above the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the property in a state to command such rent, and it is not necessary that the occupation should be beneficial to the occupier, so that trustees, who are, in law, tenants and occupiers of valuable property upon trust for charitable purposes, such as hospitals or lunatic asylums, are rateable, notwithstanding that the buildings are actually occupied by paupers who are sick or insane. The only occupiers exempt from the operation of the act are the Sovereign, because he is not named in the statute, and the direct and immediate servants of the Crown, whose occupation is the occupation of the Crown itself; and the only ground of exemption from the statute is that which is furnished by the above rule; and, consequently, when property yielding a rent above what is required for its maintenance is sought to be exempted on the ground that it is occupied by bare trustees for public purposes, the public purposes must be such as are required and created by the Government of the country, and are, therefore, to be deemed part of the use and service of the country. *Jones v. the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. PRACTICE—Though it is a matter of discretion whether a Judge at chambers will order an attorney to disclose the name and place of abode of his client, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1858, s. 7, the motives of the party making the application ought not to be narrowly inquired into; and it is not sufficient to deprive the party of his right to such information, that he will thereby be enabled to enforce some other right against the party whose name and abode he seeks to obtain. Cox v. Bockett, C.P. 125

— The Court refused to interfere with an order made by a Judge (under the 40th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852,) for consolidating two actions, in one of which the husband claimed damages for injury done to his house and trade, while in the other both the husband and wife claimed for injury to the wife, and the husband also claimed for consequential damage to himself. Hemstead v. the Phoenix Gas Co., Ex. 108

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—The corporation of Oxford, to whom certain open land belonged, were in the habit of allowing annual races to be held upon part of it, under the management of a committee. Before the races, plaintiff, an auctioneer issued an advertisement—"Oxford Races. The ground for booths, &c. will be let by auction by Mr. J. F. (the plaintiff), on Monday next. Conditions for letting standings for booths, &c. The highest bidder to be the taker, and he shall, immediately the lot is knocked down, give the number of feet required, and pay for the same immediately after the letting." Defendant was the highest bidder for a lot of the land, and took possession of and occupied it during the races, without having previously paid for it. Plaintiff having brought an action in his own name for the hire of the land, it was held, there was evidence on which the jury might find the contract was with plaintiff himself. Fisher v. Marsh, Q.B. 177

— Plaintiff placed goods in the hands of H. to sell in his own name, and defendants bought them of H. through C, their broker. Defendants did not know that the goods belonged to plaintiff, but C. did, from having been previously in the employ of H, but not from anything which was communicated to him while acting as defendants' broker in the transaction. It was held, reversing the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that defendants were affected by such knowledge of their broker, and were therefore not entitled to set off a debt due to them from H. against plaintiff's claim for the price of the goods. Dresser v. Norwood (Ex. Ch.), C.P. 48

— D, a merchant in London, was in the habit of shipping salt for exportation at the port of Liverpool. He usually employed plaintiff to purchase the salt, and plaintiff shipped it, taking receipts in his own name from the mate for each delivery, and when the cargo was complete, taking bills of lading in his own name, which he remitted to D, in exchange for D.'s acceptances for the price of the salt. Plaintiff was paid no commission, but he charged D. an advance on the price of the salt. On the present occasion D. had chartered a ship to load a full cargo of salt for Calcutta, and plaintiff had placed on board her, in accordance with instructions from D, 1,000 tons of salt which he had purchased for that purpose, and for which he had taken the mate's receipts in the usual course. When this quantity had been placed on board D. stopped payment, and plaintiff then ceased loading, and demanded bills of lading for the salt already on board in his own name. Defendant, the shipowner, refused to allow them to be given and filled up the ship, and sent her with the salt to Calcutta. The jury found that when plaintiff put the salt on board he did not intend to pass the property therein to D, but to retain it himself. It was held this was the proper question for the jury, and that on this finding and these facts there was a conversion of the salt by the defendant at Liverpool. Falke v. Fletcher, C.P. 146

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—In an action of slander, laying special damages, it was proved that plaintiff, a trustee of a charity, asked C, by whom he was employed as bailiff, to obtain signatures to a protest against his being turned out of the trusteeship. C. asked defendant for his signature, which defendant refused; and on being pressed to give his reasons, said that he would not keep a big rogue like plaintiff in the trust; and he explained the reasons for his opinion, which were that plaintiff had left the parish under discreditable circumstances, and without settling with his creditors, including defendant. He also added, that he was surprised that C. kept such a man on with his son. The whole of what was said about plaintiff's character was said with reference to the discussion whether it was proper that he should be continued as a trustee of the charity. In consequence of what defendant said, C. dismissed plaintiff from his employment. The jury found that defendant had not acted with malice. It was held that, assuming that the words were bona fide spoken with reference to the propriety of taking steps to retain plaintiff in the trusteeship, as they were pertinent to the question whether he was fit to be trusted or not they were to be regarded as a privileged communication, and therefore that defendant was entitled to have the verdict entered for him. *Coveles v. It was held, this enactment applied to a general district rate made by the board, and that the want of the seal and signatures was fatal to the validity of the rate. Semble—that one general district rate may be made under section 89. to

SALE OF GOODS—A. bought coal of B. to be shipped in a ship chartered by A. payment in cash against bill of lading in the hands of B.'s agent. Before shipment A. sold to plaintiff, and at the time of both sales the coal was unascertained. The coal was shipped, and three bills of lading signed for delivery to A. or order; one only was stamped and retained by B, another was sent to A. Not being paid, B. sent the stamped bill of lading to defendant and the captain delivered the coal to him. It was held, plaintiff had no right of action against the defendant. Moakes v. Nicholson, C.P. 273

— Defendants entered into a contract with G. as follows: "21st of September 1864. Sold to G. the oak timber offered to him at the prices stated in his letter of the 12th of September, viz., trees of 60 feet and upwards at 2s. 8d. per foot; trees under 60 feet 2s. 5d. per foot, delivered to boats. The above to be 12 inches girth and upwards; and two coffin logs at 4s. per foot. Payment, 100l. by bill at one month, and balance by bill at four months from measurement." The timber had been brought by de-defendants to certain wharves belonging to the Herefordshire Canal Company. On the 7th of October G.'s agent measured the timber, marked it and had it "squared," paying 5*l.* to the persons employed. On the 15th of October G. gave a 100*l.* bill at one month, which was paid, and two other bills, one for 100*l.* and the other for 75*l.* at four months. While these last bills were running G. became insolvent and made an assignment of his estate to plaintiffs as trustees for the benefit of creditors; defendants took possession of the timber and claimed to retain it as unpaid vendors. It was held, in an action by plaintiffs, the Court having power to draw inferences of fact, that there was a transfer of the possession of the timber to G, the vendee, and that the vendors had no lien for the price. *Cooper v. SETTLEMENT. See Statute, Construction of.

SEWERS—A natural stream, supplied by natural and artificial drainage of cultivated soil, belonging to private individuals, was cleared out and partially widened and deepened by Commissioners acting under a private inclosure act, powers being given to them to do so at the expense of the proprietors. In its passage to the river, into which it ultimately flowed, it passed through a town, and received the drainage of two or three inhabited houses. Semble—That this stream was not a sewer, within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1848; but even if it was, held that it came within the exception in section 43, and that it was not vested in the local board of health, and that they were not liable to cleanse and repair it. R. v. the Local Board of Health of Godmanchester, Q.B. 13 — Plaintiff was owner of land through which the P. river flowed, such land being beyond the district of the board of works for L. The board executed drainage works within their district, by means of which the sewage was carried into a stream which flowed into the P. river. The sewage had for many years been carried into the stream, but only so as to pollute the water in an inappreciable degree. The result of the new works of the board was to do substantial injury to plaintiff. It was held, by the Court of Queen's Bench, that under the 86th section of the "Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855," plaintiff had a right to obtain compensation for the damage done in the manner provided by the act, and, therefore, that the board were not liable in an action. But it was held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the local board were not authorized by any provision of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, to carry the sewage of the district by means of a new system of sewers into plaintiff's stream, and that plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against them for the nuisance. Cator v. the Lewisham Board of Works, (Ex. Ch.). Q.B. 74

— Sewerage expense how raised: rateable value. Pew v. the Metropolitan Board of Works, Q.B. 160; M.C. 97

— By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. s. 38. power was given to the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers to construct sewers under any lands whatsoever, "making compensation for any damage done thereby," and by other clauses of that act the Commissioners were empowered to levy rates retrospectively, as well as prospectively, for the payment of such compensation. By the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120.) the powers of such Commissioners are put an end to, and the Metropolitan Board of Works is to stand in their place; and by section 148. the property vested in such Commissioners is transferred to the Board of Works, and all persons who owe money to the Commissioners are to pay the same to such board, and all monies recoverable from the Commissioners are to be recoverable from the board; and by section 181. "all mortgages, annuities, securities, and other debts and liabilities," which before the determination of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. might be charged on or payable out of any rates authorized to be levied thereunder, are to continue in full force and be a charge on the districts in which such rates would have been authorized to be levied. It was held, that a liability of such Commissioners to make compensation for land taken by them for a construction of a sewer under the powers of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, was transferred by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and was, therefore, recoverable from such board, although at the time of the determination of the powers of the Commissioners the existence of such liability was not known, and no claim was made for compensation until several years afterwards. Re the Arbitration of Pettitward v. the Metropolitan Board of Works, C.P. 301

— A vestry of a parish mentioned in Schedule (A.) to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, having resolved, under section 73, that the drainage of several houses into an old sewer was insufficient, and that such sewer should be discontinued, gave notice to the owners of such houses to make new drains into a new sewer, and upon default of the owners, the vestry made them themselves.

They then attempted to recover the expense from the house-owners (by summons against the occupier under section 96. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102.) before a Magistrate, on the ground that they were acting under section 73. The Magistrate decided that the facts brought the case within section 69, and refused to make any order. It was held, that there was nothing to shew that the drains were insufficient; that the vestry could not by their finding conclusively bring the case within section 73; that it was competent for the Magistrate to refuse his order on the ground that the case fell within section 69; and that his decision on this matter (which was partly a question of law and partly one of fact) was right, as the facts shewed that the new drains were rendered necessary by the draining into the new sewer, and not by the insufficiency of the old drains. The Vestry of St. Marylebone v. Viret, C.P. 312; M.C. 214

SHERIFF—Plaintiff having recovered judgment against D. for 22l. 5s. 10d., sued out a ca. sa., and had him arrested by defendant the sheriff. B. had previously entered into a deed, which purported to be a deed of arrangement with his creditors under the Bankrupt Act, 1861, but which was in fact an invalid deed. It was nevertheless duly registered, and the Chief Registrar gave a certificate to that effect to B, with a notice that the certificate was available as a protection in bankruptcy. The sheriff allowed B. to go at large, and made a return that he was entitled to protection from arrest, and that he was not found in his bailiwick. An action being brought against the sheriff for making a false return, and also for an escape, it was held, by Crompton, J., Mellor, J. and Shee, J., that, under the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the certificate was an answer to the action; but it was held, by Cockburn, C.J., that the deed being invalid, the sheriff was liable. *Lloyd v. SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—On the occasion of settling personal property upon a marriage, it is the professional usage for the lady's solicitor to draw the settlement, and for the husband to pay for it, although the only property settled is the husband's. legally liable, in the event of the marriage taking place, to pay the lady's solicitor his costs of the settlement if the retainer was by the lady, or else to indemnify whoever on her part properly incurred expense by retaining a solicitor to prepare such settlement. An infant, who has no property of her own to settle, may contract with a solicitor for the preparation of a marriage settlement by her intended husband, under which proper provision is made for her benefit, as such may be considered a necessary suitable to her estate and condition. *Helps v. STATUTE, CONSTRUCTION OF—By a private Estate Act of 1720 (6 Geo. 1. c. 29.) a family settlement of certain lands was confirmed, with a restriction on alienation; and a power to grant leases "at the usual and accustomed rents, boons and services," was conferred on each tenant in tail when in possession under the limitations of such settlement. By section 1. of an act of 1803 (43 Geo. 3. c. 40.) a portion of these lands was vested in trustees for sale, "freed, released and discharged, and absolutely acquitted, exempted and exonerated of and from all and every the uses, trusts, estates, entails, remainders, charges, powers, provisos, limitations and agreements, in and by," inter alia, the said Estate Act of 1720 created and declared, except only such leases as had been theretofore made in pursuance of the powers contained in the said settlement and act, and the trustees were to re-invest the proceeds of the sale in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses and subject to the same powers as the lands so sold. The 7th section of the act of 1803 enacted, that until sale the said lands should be held and enjoyed, and the rents, issues and profits thereof should be received by such person as would have been entitled thereto in case such act had not been made. It was held, the power of leasing given by the Estate Act of 1720 was destroyed as to the lands vested in the trustees for sale by the act of 1803, with the exception only of the leases which had been then made; and therefore a lease made in 1838, in conformity with such power, was void as against the heir, notwithstanding section 7. of the act of 1803, and the fact that the lands had never been sold. The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Keightley, C.P. 322

— By a private act of parliament certain lands were, in 1720, settled on those who should be Earls of Shrewsbury. In 1803 a portion of these estates, by another act, were vested in trustees for sale, freed from the uses, &c. of the prior act, with a provision that till sale they should be held for the benefit of those who but for the act would be entitled. In 1843, by a third act, which provided for the sale of another portion of the above estates, it was also provided that those to whom the estates limited by the first act were successively limited when by virtue of the limitations they came into possession or were entitled to the profits of the lands which should for the time being stand limited and settled to such of the uses of the said first act as should then be subsisting or capable of effect, might lease them in a particular way. It was held, on the construction of the acts, that this power of leasing extended to lands vested in trustees under the second act and still unsold. The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Beazley, C.P. 328

Andrews*, and Longland v. Doling, Ex. 90

TRESPASS. See Action. Game. Negligence.

TRESPASS FOR MESNE PROFIT—A county court order for giving up possession of premises, made against a person holding under the tenant, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 50, is not conclusive evidence of title in a subsequent action against him for mesne profits. The Court refused to go into the question of improper rejection of a document, on the ground that it did not appear by the Judge's notes that the document had been formally tendered in evidence at the trial. Campbell v. Loader, Ex. 50.

TROVER—Plaintiff when a young child resided with her aunt in the house of defendant's testator, where the aunt lived as housekeeper, and plaintiff was almost adopted into testator's family. The aunt was a married woman living apart from her husband, who had deserted her, and previously to her death she gave plaintiff some articles of jewelry and apparel; part of these plaintiff gave testator to keep for her, and the rest she placed in her own boxes in testator's house. Upon the aunt's death her husband once called and claimed her effects, but testator repudiated the husband's right, and the husband never afterwards claimed them or interfered further in the matter. When testator died, which happened whilst plaintiff was away at school, defendant as executor took possession of the articles which had been so given to plaintiff, and refused to restore them to her. It was held, plaintiff was in possession so as to be entitled to maintain an action against defendant for these articles; and that it was not competent to defendant to set up the right of the aunt's husband as an answer to the action. Bourne v. Fosbrooke, C.P. 164

— Wine, the property of plaintiff, being in the warehouse of defendant, a wharfinger, notice from the Lord Mayor's Court was served on defendant, attaching in his hands all the goods of H, from whom plaintiff had purchased the wine, and at the same time defendant was informed that the attachment had reference to the wine. Plaintiff demanded the wine from defendant's clerk, producing the delivery warrant which had been issued by defendant to B, a former owner, and indorsed by him to H, and by H. to plaintiff. Defendant's clerk said that there was a difficulty in consequence of the attachment, and referred plaintiff to defendant, whom he could not find. Plaintiff's attorney thereupon wrote, demanding the wine before eleven o'clock the next morning. Defendant's attorney replied, asking for time for inquiry; but a writ was issued before that answer was received. It was held, there was some evidence of a conversion; that the conduct and position of defendant was evidence from which the jury might infer whether or not he had been guilty of a conversion of the wine, and that before arriving at a conclusion it was proper for the jury to consider whether defendant had a bond fide doubt as to plaintiff's title to the wine, and whether a reasonable time for clearing up that doubt had elapsed before the action was commenced. Pillot v. Wilkinson (Ex. Ch.), Ex. 22

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—In a deed of conveyance in fee from defendant to plaintiff of a house and premises then in the occupation of defendant, "together with all lights, liberties, privileges, easements and appurtenances to the premises belonging or in anywise appertaining or usually held and enjoyed therewith, or deemed or taken as part, parcel or member thereof," the defendant covenanted "that notwithstanding any act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever made, done or permitted by him, or any person claiming through him, he, the defendant, then had good title to convey the messuage and premises with the appurtenances." Some years before this conveyance defendant, being then owner in fee and occupier of the same house, &c., in the same condition, entered into a contract in writing with the owners of the adjoining premises that the cornice and spouts and three windows of defendant's house overlooking the adjoining premises were encroachments, and agreed to pay an annual sum of 5s. so long as he was permitted to use the said cornice, spouts and windows. Defendant had never acquired any easement in respect of the cornice, spouts or windows by twenty years' user. It was held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that there was no breach of covenant for title by defendant, for that he only conveyed the premises so far as he was possessed or could convey them, and that his qualified covenant for title limited his covenant to that which he actually had, or but for any act of his would have had, and that he had not and never would have acquired any easement in the windows, &c., inasmuch as the adjoining owners would have interfered to prevent him but for his acknowledgment. *Thackeray v. VENUE—An action for damage arising from a public nuisance on real property, as on a public highway, is a local action; and if there is no local description in the body of the declaration, the county in the margin must be taken as repeated in the declaration, and it is a material allegation; and on a plea traversing the existence of the highway, proof that the highway is in another county is a fatal variance and ground of nonsuit. Richards v. Locklin, Q.B. 225

WAGER. See Gaming.

WARRANTY OF TITLE—On the sale of goods there is a warranty of title, if the seller, at the time of the sale, either by words or conduct, affirm the goods to be his. Richhols v. Bannister, C.P. 105

WATER AND WATERCOURSE—A plaintiff, who was the occupier of certain clay-works, had enjoyed as of right for twenty years, without interruption, a watercourse, called the clear-water leat, which brought water to such works. Part of this water had been collected from natural springs, from whence it had been brought over defendant's land by an artificial channel made by plaintiff's predecessor at the clay-works. The rest of the water had been obtained by plaintiff from a stream brought artificially to the surface by the operation of miners who had not permanently abandoned their right to the same. Plaintiff claimed also a prescriptive right by twenty years' uninterrupted user to another watercourse, called the foul-water leat. There was evidence at the trial that plaintiff's predecessor at the clay-works had leave from the tenant and owner of the land which had since become defendant's, to cut such watercourse from a brook down to the clay-works on the terms of paying a peppercorn rent, and that such tenant might stop it whenever there was a scarcity of water for his own purpose. It was held, that as to such foul-water leat there was evidence on which a jury might find that plaintiff's enjoyment thereof was not under a claim of right, but precarious, and that, therefore, a twenty years' user by the plaintiff under such circumstances, though without interruption, was not an enjoyment as of right within the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. Held, also, that as to that part of the water in the clear-water leat which had an artificial origin from mining, plaintiff could not by twenty years' user acquire an easement therein under 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71, but that as to that part which had been collected from natural springs plaintiff had, as against defendant, acquired by user a right to its flow, notwithstanding that the land in which such supply was obtained was within the district of tin-bounds, and subject therefore to the contingent rights of the owners of such bounds, inasmuch as such owners have by custom a right to use all water in their district for mining operations. Held, further, that plaintiff as such occupier of the clay-works to which the water was brought, had a sufficient interest to enable him to maintain his claim to a prescriptive right to the flow of such water. Gaved v. Martyn, C.P. 353

WILL—By his will testator devised the C. estate to the use of his eldest son J. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to his (testator's) second and third sons R. and J. and their issue male, with remainder to every other son of testator in tail male, with remainder to the first and other sons of his eldest son J. in tail general, with similar limitations in favour of the sons of testator's second and third and other sons, with remainder to the use of the first and other daughters of his eldest son J. in tail male, with similar limitations in favour of the daughters of testator's second and third sons, with remainder to the use of the first and other daughters of his eldest son J. in tail general, with similar limitations in favour of the daughters of testator's second and third sons, with remainder to the use of all and every testator's sons to be thereafter born successively in tail general, with remainder to the use of his eldest daughter E. for life, with remainders over. The will, by a shifting clause, directed that so often as the G. estates should come to any of his sons or daughters or their issue being in possession of the C. estate, then that the persons next in remainder, according to the limitations in the will, should be entitled to and come into possession of the C. estate for the estate and interest thereby limited to him or her respectively, and so from time to time as often as the event might happen, in such manner and as if the person so becoming possessed of the G. estates had died or was then dead without issue. Testator's eldest son J. came into possession of the G. estates, and by a decree of the Court of Chancery it was declared that testator's second son R. became entitled to the C. estate for life with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with such remainders over as in the will mentioned. R. dying without issue, was succeeded in the C. estate by testator's third son, who also died without issue. There being no other sons, testator's eldest daughter E. then claimed the C. estate in preference to the eldest son of J., and contended that the will was to be construed as if J. had died without issue. It was held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that the shifting clause did not operate to prevent the eldest son of J. from taking the C. estate under the limitation in remainder to his first and other sons in tail general in priority to testator's daughter E. Quare—as to the correctness of the decree in Chancery. Jellicoe v. Gardiner (House of Lords), C.P. 282

— C, by his will, gave his estate to his grandson T. C. for life, with remainder to "the first son of the body of the said T. C. severally and successively in tail male" of the name of C; and for want of such lawful issue of that name, either by his said grandson T. C. or his son J. C, then amongst his "daughters and their children" in fee. It was held, that estates tail were given to the first and other sons of T. C, and that the gift over to the daughters and their children was a gift to a class, and that a child of a daughter who died before the date of the will was not within the gift. Semble—that estates tail by implication were given to T. C. and J. C. after the estates tail of the sons of T. C. Parker v. Tootal (House of Lords), Ex. 198

WINDING UP OF COMPANIES—If a joint-stock company, registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, while it is in debt, obtains registration as a company with limited liability under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, and proceedings are afterwards taken to wind it up, the liquidators appointed under the last-mentioned act may make a call upon the old shareholders for a sum per share exceeding the amount of the sum remaining unpaid on such share, and for any sums per share that may be requisite to discharge the old debt, as if the company had been registered as one of unlimited liability. *Garnett and Moseley Gold Mining Co. v.
